The decree enjoined not only the principal due, but the damages which accrued during the pendency of the previous injunction. As that injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed, the defendants insist on their right to those damages, and that their claim to them rests on the same foundation with their claim to the costs incurred in that suit. The question seems not to have been expressly decided, though it was presented in the case of Carter v. Campbell, before cited. In that case there had been a previous injunction, which had been dissolved, and a suit and judgment on the injunction bond. A deficiency being made out in the second suit, both damages and principal were enjoined. The decree as to this was affirmed, but the particular question now raised was not discussed. It seems to me there is nothing in it. The interest accrued is always enjoined. And damages are given in lieu of interest. They are entire. The court has no right to divide them, and say that 6 per cent. as interest shall follow the principal, and 4 per cent. be recovered as a penalty. Being allowed by way of interest, though denominated damages, they are an incident to the main subject. The last suit

455 *ascertains that the money was never due; and damages ought not to be allowed for withholding money to which the party was not entitled.

So far I think the decree right. But errors have been committed in the details, for which it must be reversed.

The vendees purchased from three individuals and their wives, the husbands holding in right of their wives. A bond executed by the purchasers to one of the vendors, was by him assigned to another of the vendors and a third person. A portion of this bond (600 dollars) being unpaid, the assignees recovered a judgment for the amount against the purchasers. This judgment was enjoined. It is ascertained that on allowing for the deficiency, the bond is extinguished, and the purchasers have overpaid for the land actually conveyed. So far as the decree enjoins the judgment, it was correct. In the actual condition of the cause, it would have been improper to decree over in favour of the assignees, against the assignor of the vendors. One of the assignees occupied both relations, of vendor and assignee. There was nothing to shew the state of accounts between the vendors; and the purchasers had nothing to do with this matter. By taking the assignment, the assignees occupy the position of the assignor, so far as the purchasers are concerned. Whether the assignees will be entitled to recover from the assignor, will depend on the contract between them. No issue is made up in this case between them, nor any admissions made, which would justify the court in decreeing over against the assignor for the amount of the bond.

But the decree not only enjoins the judgment, but makes the assignees liable for the amount overpaid by the purchasers. It does not appear upon what ground they were held responsible for this excess. The bond assigned to them had been partially paid, though to whom does not appear. The court, perhaps considering that they had received all but the balance, held 456 *them liable for that reason. As assignees they had a right to receive all that was voluntarily paid to them. It was paid without any notice of the plaintiff's equity, and they are entitled to hold what they legally received. The remedy of the plaintiff for the excess is against the vendors, and not the assignees, who have equal equity and the legal possession.

It seems to me that the court also erred in rendering any decree without having the representatives of Jones before it. M'Daniel and Jones were joint purchasers, received a joint conveyance, executed their joint notes for the purchase money, were jointly sued, and were joint plaintiffs in the first injunction. Jones afterwards died, and M'Daniel filed the present bill without joining the representatives of Jones as plaintiffs, or making them parties.

The general rule that all persons materially interested should be made parties, is too familiar to require authority to support it. And in regard to the nature of the interest, it is wholly unimportant whether it be a legal or an equitable interest of the absent parties in the subject matter of the suit. Story's Eq. Pleading 137. This constitutes one of the leading distinctions between proceedings at law and in equity. A person with a mere equitable or remote interest cannot sue at law, and if he be improperly joined, the suit may fail. The analogies, therefore, derived from legal proceedings do not apply. Conceding that the right to recover here was a joint right which survived, and that M'Daniel might therefore have sued at law, it is equally clear that the representatives of Jones had an interest in the suit, so far as it went to establish a deficiency, and, for any thing appearing, a right to a moiety, possibly to the whole, of the money overpaid. Serious injustice might be sustained by them if the question of deficiency is to be determined in their absence; and a total loss inflicted on them, if the survivor be permitted to pocket the excess 457 *recovered. Whenever there is a community of interest between the parties, which may be affected by the decree, they should all be before the court. Thus in case of joint bonds or obligations, all the parties, obligors and obligees, are required to be made parties to the suit. 16 Vesey 326; Story's Eq. Pleading 159. And the same rule is applied where one of the obligors is dead; for in such case his personal representatives, as well as the survivors, must be made parties to a suit in equity brought for payment of the debt, whether it be for payment by the survivors alone, or out of the assets of the deceased. It seems to me that the correlative of the rule thus laid down is equally true, and that the representatives of the joint purchaser should be made parties here. In reality, this case is stronger than cases growing out of joint bonds, partnerships, and the like. These were joint purchasers of land. The right of survivorship as to the land is taken away; and though the breach here may have been incurred in the lifetime of both, yet it was an incident to a subject which did not survive, and in a suit to ascertain the extent of the breach, the amount of the deficiency, the representatives of the decedent were necessary parties. For this cause also, I think that the decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded in order that the representatives of Jones may be brought before the court.

BROOKE and BALDWIN, J., concurred in the opinion of Allen, J.

STANARD, J. Notwithstanding I dissented from the majority of the court that decided the case of Blessing's adm'rs v. Beatty, and still retain the opinion I formed of that case, I entirely concur in the opinion of my brother Allen on the main question in this case, respecting the right of the purchaser to an abatement from the purchase money for the deficiency of 458 the land. In this *case the proof is satisfactory that the sale was by the acre, and not in gross. I think it a sound general rule, that where the purchase money of a tract of land is a multiple of the number of acres specified as the contents of the tract, at a rate per acre in pounds, shillings and pence, or dollars and cents, corresponding with coins in use, or not being fractional, the just implication is, that the purchase money is ascertained by the multiplication of a rate per acre by the number of acres specified, and that the sale and purchase is by the acre; and in such a case the purchaser is entitled to an abatement for a deficiency, and is chargeable for the excess, unless such implication be controlled by express stipulation, or other satisfactory evidence ascertaining that such was not the real contract. This case furnishes this ground of implication, and much to strengthen, and nothing to impair or control it. On the contrary, where a tract of land by given metes and bounds, the contents or supposed contents of which are specified, is sold for a gross sum, not a multiple of the specified number of acres, but which would make a fractional rate per acre, not corresponding with any coins in use, or aggregations thereof, the just implication is, that the sale is by the tract in gross, and the specification of the number of acres but descriptive of the tract; and in such case the purchaser is entitled to the land comprehended within the designated metes and bounds, without right to abatement if the quantity be less than that specified, and without liability if it be greater. Such, I thought, was the nature of the sale in the case of Blessing's adm'rs v. Beatty, furnishing an ample foundation for the implication that the sale was in gross, and consequently that the purchaser was only entitled to have the land within the specified metes and bounds, and getting that, was not entitled to recover for the deficiency of quantity, and would not have been responsible had there been an excess. I thought there was nothing in the case to control *that implication, but much to reinforce it, and require the application of the general rule I have before indicated.

I do not concur in that part of the opinion which respects the necessity of making the representatives of Jones parties. The claim is for money jointly paid, or paid on joint account, upon a joint contract with M'Daniel and Jones, the consideration of which has failed. While Jones lived, it was a joint demand of himself and M'Daniel on the vendors, for money, and for money only. That demand, and the right at law to sue for it, survived to M'Daniel. It may be, that on adjusting the account of the joint purchase between the joint purchasers, they would be entitled to the amount of this demand in moieties, or in unequal shares, or one of them be entitled to the whole. But in this the vendors liable to the demand have no interest. They are discharged by accounting to the survivor, to whom the legal right to this joint pecuniary demand has survived. The only plausible reason for requiring that Jones's representatives should be parties would be, that the rights of the joint purchasers in the money that may be recovered should be adjusted, and their respective shares thereof decreed. Now this could not be done without involving in this case a settlement between the joint purchasers. In this settlement the vendors have no interest. On the one hand, this absence of interest precludes the parties liable to the demand from the right to require Jones's representatives to be made parties. On the other hand, I apprehend, those parties might justly object that the case should be incumbered with such an account, or that it and they should be retained in court until that account might be adjusted.

The decree of the court of appeals declared, that there was no error in the decree of the circuit court in allowing for the deficiency of quantity of the land, 460 and in *perpetuating the injunction; but that the said decree was erroneous in proceeding to decree in the cause before the representatives of Richard Jones were made parties, and also in decreeing against the appellants for the sum of 292 dollars 50 cents, the amount overpaid by the purchasers of the land for the quantity actually conveyed: therefore it was decreed and ordered, that the said decree, so far as the same is above declared to be erroneous, be reversed and annulled, and that the residue thereof be affirmed, with costs to the appellants. And the cause was remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to make the proper parties, and to be further proceeded in pursuant to the principles of the foregoing opinion and decree.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Principal and Surety—Subrogation*—Case at Bar.—

A personal decree against an administrator being recovered by a creditor of the decedent, the administrator appeals, giving an appeal bond with surety; the decree being affirmed, an arrangement is made between the creditor and the surety in the appeal bond, by which the decree is transferred to the surety, who makes a part of the amount due thereon by execution against the administrator, and then brings an action on the administration bond, in the name of the creditor as relator, against the surety therein bound, in which action a judgment is recovered for the balance due on the affirmed decree, being less than the amount of damages incurred by the appeal. HELD, the surety in the administration bond has no claim to be substituted to the remedy of the creditor on the appeal bond, and equity will not interfere in his favour by injoining the judgment.

In April 1820, Joseph Fauntleroy recovered a personal decree against Samuel Templeman administrator of Peter Northern deceased, in the superior court of chancery for the Fredericksburg district, for 1815 dollars 68 cents, with interest on 1398 dollars 47 cents from the 25th of April 1816, on account of a debt due to Fauntleroy from Northern in his lifetime; from which decree Templeman prayed and obtained an appeal to the court of appeals, upon giving bond with security to prosecute his appeal with effect, or to satisfy and pay the decree with damages and costs, in case the same should be affirmed. Templeman gave bond accordingly, with Richard T. Brown his surety therein. The decree was affirmed by the court of appeals, (see Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434,) after which, Brown the surety, having made an arrangement with Fauntleroy by which he procured from him a transfer of the decree, sued out execution upon it against Templeman, on which the

made by the sale of property of Templeman, and applied to the discharge of the decree on the 28th of May 1827, leaving the balance then due 882 dollars 8 cents, being less than the amount of damages and costs incurred by the appeal, which was 1079 dollars 6 cents. Brown then caused an action to be instituted on the administration bond of Templeman, in the name of Fauntleroy as relator, against George Glascock administrator of Richard M. Glascock, who was one of Templeman's sureties therein, in which action a judgment was recovered against the defendant for 882 dollars 8 cents, the balance remaining due as aforesaid on the decree, with interest from the 28th of May 1827 till paid, and the costs of suit.

Glascock's administrator thereupon filed his bill in the superior court of chancery for the Fredericksburg district, against Brown, Fauntleroy, and the justices to whom the administration bond was taken (nominal plaintiffs in the action at law), setting forth the foregoing facts, insisting that Brown, as surety in the appeal bond, was bound to indemnify the sureties in the administration bond against the decree appealed from, and therefore praying that all proceedings on the judgment might be enjoined.

The injunction was awarded.

Brown answered, controverting the claim of equity asserted by the plaintiff in his bill, and insisting on his right to enforce the judgment. As to the other defendants, the bill was taken pro confesso.

At the final hearing on the 28th of June 1833, the circuit superior court of law and chancery for Spotsylvania county (to which the cause had been transferred) decreed that the injunction be perpetuated with costs. From which decree Brown appealed to this court.

C. and G. N. Johnson, for the appellant, said, the court below had perpetuated 463 the injunction upon the *authority, no doubt, of Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vern. 608, and the cases in this court decided upon the same principle. But this case was plainly distinguishable from all of them. In Parsons v. Briddock, the original surety was bound in an obligation for the payment of an ascertained sum of money acknowledged to be due from the principal; and the undertaking of the bail to the action against the principal was strictly an additional security acquired by the creditor for the same debt. Here the surety in the administration bond was not bound for the payment of a debt to Fauntleroy, or any other creditor of the decedent; this obligation was only for the administrator's performance of his duty by faithfully administering the assets, and the extent of his responsibility was measured by the amount of assets which the administrator might misapply. In case of such misapplication, the surety would at all events be liable to those entitled to the estate, whether Fauntleroy succeeded or failed in his claim. When the administrator appealed from the decree in favour of Fauntleroy, the surety in the appeal bond undertook to satisfy the amount of that decree with damages and costs, in case of affirmance. His responsibility was to be measured by the decree alone; that of the surety in the administration bond by the amount of assets misapplied, without any reference whatever to the amount of the decree. Glascock and Brown, then, being subjected to liabilities different in amount, which were to be enforced upon wholly different events, and for the benefit, it might be, of different persons, could not be regarded as occupying the same mutual relation as the successive sureties in Parsons v. Briddock. They were in no sense sureties for the same debt. Again, in Parsons v. Briddock, the demand against the principal was for his own individual debt, which he must have known to be justly due, and the interposition of the bail enabled him, it

464 may be, to protract a vexatious litigation, and certainly *deprived the creditor and the original surety of that security for the payment of the debt which was afforded by the imprisonment of the debtor. Here, the principal debtor is an administrator, charged in his official, not in his individual character, with a demand the justice of which he could not personally know; and the due performance of his official duty justified if it did not absolutely require him to take the opinion of the court of last resort as to the validity of the claim against the estate, and for that purpose to give the bond and security demanded of him. And it cannot be said that any security which the sureties in the administration bond possessed has been withdrawn from them by the appeal, or their rights in any wise impaired thereby. Notwithstanding the appeal, they had at all times their remedy under the statute or by bill in equity, to exonerate themselves from responsibility or secure the assets of the estate. The principle of Parsons v. Briddock ought not to be farther extended, since its operation is to throw the whole burthen on one surety in exoneration of another. No case has hitherto occurred, in which the court has actively interposed to charge a subsequent for the benefit of a prior surety, by taking from the subsequent surety, a legal advantage fairly obtained, even though both of them were strictly sureties for the same debt, which it has been shewn that Glascock and Brown are not. Brown has fairly obtained the advantage of a judgment at law against Glascock, ascertaining a devastavit by the administrator Templeman, for which Glascock as one of his sureties is legally responsible: he seeks no aid of equity, but merely asks that the court will leave him to the undisturbed prosecution of legal rights, which he insists it was nowise against conscience for him to secure.—As to the principle on which sureties for the payment of money are held to be exonerated by a new contract giving indulgence to the principal debtor without their con-

465 currence, it could *have no application to this case, though the introduction of the surety in the appeal bond were considered to produce the same effect on the rights of the prior sureties, as a new arrangement entered into by the creditor himself with the administrator would have. It would be most mischievous to deny the creditor the privilege of making such arrangement unless at the peril of discharging the sureties in the administration bond. Those sureties have no right to interfere with the question whether the debt claimed be justly due or not, or to call upon the administrator to pay it.

Berry, for the appellees, argued, that the decree against Templeman, being personal, ascertained that he had in his hands assets sufficient to discharge the claim of Fauntleroy, and properly applicable to that purpose. If he failed to make the application, the sureties in his administration bond would become responsible. The effect of the decree, therefore, was to make them sureties for the payment of an ascertained sum of money due from Templeman in his individual character to Fauntleroy. Being thus invested with the character of ordinary sureties for the payment of a debt, they were consequently invested with all the rights appertaining to such sureties. Glascock, as one of these sureties, thus acquired in equity a right to the benefit of all additional securities for the debt, obtained by Fauntleroy the creditor in the prosecution of his claim against the principal debtor. The obligation of Brown in the appeal bond was such additional security: and therefore Brown was in equity liable to discharge the debt for the relief of Glascock. Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vern. 608; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 22; M'Mahon &c. v. Fawcett &c., 2 Rand. 514; Douglass v. Fagg, 8 Leigh 588; Givens & al. v. Nelson's ex'or & al., 10 Leigh 382.—Further, the sureties in the administration bond had a right to pay off the decree, and take a cession of the creditor's rights in the same for their indemnity. The effect

466 of giving *the appeal bond was to suspend the remedies of the creditor, and consequently those of the sureties, to enforce payment of the decree from Templeman the principal debtor; an effect which, had it been produced by the act of the creditor himself, would in equity have discharged Glascock the surety. This effect having been produced by the voluntary act of Brown in becoming surety in the appeal bond, he could acquire no right in equity to enforce payment from Glascock the first surety; particularly when the whole balance unpaid by the principal debtor, and sought to be recovered from Glascock, consists of damages incurred by the appeal, and so is an accretion of the debt resulting from the interference of Brown himself. It is conceded that an arrangement by a creditor of a decedent with the administrator, for forbearance of suit, will not in general have the effect of discharging the sureties in the administration bond. But it is otherwise when the administrator has become liable for a devastavit, and the responsibility of the sureties has become direct to the particular creditor; which is the case here.

STANARD, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The court is of opinion that the sureties in an administration bond are not to be regarded as sureties for the debts due from the estate, but for the due application of the assets that may come to the hands of the administrator, and that the remedies of such sureties to be relieved from or indemnified against their responsibilities are provided by statute, and such remedies are not impaired or delayed by an appeal of the administrator from a judgment or decree charging him to any one creditor in respect to such assets. The result of any such appeal does not affect the measure of the responsibility of the sureties in the administration bond, because whether the appeal be or be not successfully prosecuted, the responsibility of the sureties, being measured by the assets, is not enlarged or diminished. If the administrator succeeds in such appeal, the assets would be liberated from the claim of the particular creditor, but would still remain liable to other creditors, or to legatees or distributees, and the sureties would remain liable for the application of them to such other creditors, legatees or distributees: if the administrator fails, the liability of the sureties still remains restricted to the measure of the assets, and if those assets be not sufficient to pay the costs and damages on the appeal, in addition to the judgment or decree appealed from, the sureties could not be made responsible therefor. The court is further of opinion that as the sureties have been charged by the judgment at law with the amount of the decree, damages and costs, it must be intended that assets to that amount were in the hands of the administrator, for the due application of which the sureties were responsible; and it cannot be material whether that responsibility be made subservient to the claim of the creditor in this case, or, by a liberation from that claim, left chargeable by other creditors, or legatees and distributees: that the principle of the case of Parsons v. Briddock, and other kindred cases, does not warrant the claim of sureties such as the appellee, to be substituted to the remedy of the creditor on the appeal bond; and that the decree in this case, founded on such supposed right of substitution, is erroneous. Therefore,

Decree reversed with costs, and bill dismissed.

January, 1843, Richmond.

Mills and Milldams—Judgment—Validity of.—A judgment granting leave to the proprietor of the lands

Mills and Milldams—Erection of Dam—Eminent Domain—Constitutionality of Statute.*—See foot-note to

on both sides of a stream to erect thereon a mill and dam, is valid and sufficient, though the record does not set forth to whom the bed of the stream belongs, and though the owner of the land which the inquisition finds will be overflowed had no notice of the time of making the application for the writ of ad quod damnum, or of the time of executing the same.

Same—Same—Same—Ownership of Damaged Land.—

Where, upon an application to a county court for leave to erect a mill and dam, the inquisition finds that a certain quantity of land not belonging to the applicant will be overflowed, and assesses damages to the proprietor, it is erroneous for the judgment granting leave to erect the mill and dam, to provide, that upon payment of the damages so assessed, the land overflowed shall become vested in the applicant in fee simple: and upon appeal to the circuit court by the proprietor of the land, that court must reverse the judgment with costs, though the appellee himself suggest the error and move that it be corrected.

Same—Jury of Inquest—Communication with—Setting

Aside Inquisition.—The jury impaneled under a writ of ad quod damnum awarded on an application for leave to build a mill, having found difficulty in agreeing upon the damages to be assessed for the overflowing of certain land, it is announced by the sheriff that they are not likely to agree in a verdict; whereupon the applicant requests that the jury will make another effort to come to an agreement, saying the business is a tedious and troublesome one, and he is willing to pay whatever damages they may think reasonable. A juror then states, that the other jurors wish to assess an amount of damages which he himself thinks too large, and that he is unwilling to concur with them, unless the applicant will consent to pay the damages; and he puts the question to the applicant, whether he is willing to pay the amount (naming it) which the other jurors have fixed upon? The applicant replies that he is; and this juror thereupon concurring with the others, the inquisition is completed. The communications aforesaid take place openly, before the sheriff and all the jurors, as well as other persons assembled: though the owner of the land to be overflowed is not present at the taking of the inquisition. HELD, this is not such an interference of the applicant with the jury, as to make it proper to set aside the inquisition.

On the 9th of August 1841, the county court of Campbell, on the application (ore tenus) of Washington *Hunter, "setting forth that he is the owner of the land on both sides of Archer's creek in the county of Campbell, where he proposes to erect a water grist and saw mill and dam," made an order that a writ of ad quod damnum be awarded him, returnable to the next term of the court, the jury to meet on the 19th day of the said month of August.

The writ of ad quod damnum was accord-

Mairs v. Gallahue, 9 Gratt. 94. The principal case is cited in Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 546. See monographic note on "Mills and Milldams" appended to Calhoun v. Palmer, 8 Gratt. 88; monographic note on "Eminent Domain" appended to *James River & Kan. Co. v. ingly issued, and an inquisition taken in the usual form: whereby it was found, that the applicant might erect a dam across the creek at the place proposed, of the height of 22 feet, and that the health of the neighbourhood would not be annoyed by the stagnation of the water, but that five acres of the land of Edwin Matthews would be overflowed; for which damages were assessed to the amount of 239 dollars 81 cents.

At the return of the writ and inquisition, it was ordered that Matthews be summoned to shew cause why Hunter should not have leave to build the mill and dam. The summons being issued and served upon Matthews, he appeared at December term 1841, and was entered defendant to the application. The cause was continued from time to time until April term 1842; when Matthews moved the court to quash the writ of ad quod damnum, on the grounds, 1st, that neither the writ, nor the record awarding it, stated that the land at the bottom of the stream across which it was proposed to erect the dam belonged to the applicant or to the commonwealth; and 2dly, because the defendant had no notice of the time of making the said application. He also moved to quash the inquisition, because he had no notice of the time when the same was taken. The court overruled both motions, and the defendant filed a bill of exceptions to the opinions overruling the same. Whereupon, on consideration of the inquisition, and on hearing the examination of sundry witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff and defendant, and all cir-

470 cumstances being weighed," *the court ordered, that Hunter have leave to build his mill and dam pursuant to the inquisition; that he become seized in fee simple of the five acres of land therein mentioned, upon his paying to the defendant the sum of 239 dollars 81 cents, the valuation thereof found by the jury; and that he recovered against the defendant his costs about his motion expended.

Matthews appealed from the judgment to the circuit superior court of Campbell. In that court no evidence was adduced by either party as to the ownership of the bed of the watercourse. There seemed to be no controversy on that point. But on the questions, whether the amount of damages assessed to Matthews by the inquisition was sufficient and whether the health of the neighbours, particularly the health of Matthews and his family, was likely to be annoyed by the stagnation of the waters in the mill pond, numerous witnesses were examined on both sides; and there was great discordance in their testimony. This court, it will be seen, was of opinion that upon the whole the evidence justified the finding of the inquisition and the judgment of the county court in those particulars. The only part of the testimony which it is material to set forth related to still a different matter, and was to the following effect.

the inquisition, being examined as a witness for the appellant Matthews, deposed, that after the jury had agreed (which they did without difficulty) upon the damages for overflowing the land of Matthews, they differed in opinion as to the damages which ought to be awarded him for stopping up his road, and attempted to come to an agreement by putting down the amount which each juror was willing to assess, and dividing the aggregate of all the assessments by twelve. When the result was ascertained, which the witness thinks was something upwards of 80 dollars, Fariss, one of the jurors, said he was not satisfied; that the damages were too low.

471 *After some conversation among the jury, they concluded that they could not agree upon a verdict, and leaving the place where they had been consulting, came up to the rest of the company some 40 or 50 yards distant. Witness announced that the jury would not probably agree upon a verdict. Hunter then remarked, that he should be much pleased if the jury could agree upon a verdict, as it was a tedious and troublesome business; that he was willing to pay whatever damage they might agree upon: and he requested the jury to retire again, and make another effort to agree. The jury did accordingly retire, and again attempted to come to an agreement by the same method as before. On this second trial, the aggregate of their estimates divided by twelve amounted to something upwards of 100 dollars. After this result was ascertained, David Pugh, another of the jurors, refused to concur in a verdict for that amount of damages, saying it was too high. The jury thereupon returned to the company, and Pugh stated in the presence of Hunter, that the jury were not likely to agree unless Hunter was willing to pay the amount of damages which the eleven other jurors wished to assess; that he himself (Pugh) would not sign a verdict for more than 100 dollars for the road, unless Hunter would consent to pay it. Hunter said, he was willing to pay any damages which the jury thought fair and reasonable. Pugh then asked him if he was willing to pay the sum (naming it) which the other jurors had agreed upon? He said that he was. Pugh thereupon concurred with the other jurors, and the inquisition was completed; the damages for overflowing the land and for the road being added together, and the aggregate inserted in the inquisition. Hunter did not interfere with the jury in any other way than as above mentioned; and every thing said or done by him on the occasion was public, and in the presence of the sheriff and the whole jury.

472 *Testimony in substance the same with that of the deputy sheriff was given by two other witnesses examined for Matthews, of whom the juror Fariss was one. Fariss proved also that Matthews was not present when the inquisition was taken.

On the 27th of April 1842, the parties appeared in the circuit court, and it being suggested by the appellee Hunter, that an error was made in the form of the judgment and order of the county court, in providing, that on the payment of the damages which had been assessed by the jury of inquest to the appellant Matthews, for the five acres of his land to be covered by the appellee's proposed pond, the said five acres of land should become vested in fee simple in the said appellee;* "on the motion" (the record states) of the appellee by counsel, that error is now corrected by this court." The court then proceeding to consider the case upon the evidence adduced and the arguments of counsel, delivered the following opinion and judgment:

"The court is of opinion that the interference on the part of the appellee Washington Hunter, and the remarks made by him to the jury of inquest on the day on which they met to execute the writ of ad quod damnum, and the influence thereof on the jury, and the conduct of the jury, which are disclosed and set forth in the evidence, vitiate the verdict and all the subsequent proceedings had in pursuance of said writ of ad quod damnum; and without considering any other question in the case, or intimating any opinion whatever on the merits of the controversy, it is therefore consid-

473 ered by *the court, for the reasons above stated alone, that the judgment of the county court be reversed and annulled, that all the proceedings in that court, back to the awarding the writ of ad quod damnum, be set aside, and that the appellant recover against the appellee his costs about his appeal in this behalf expended, and his costs about his defence in the county court expended. And it is further ordered that the motion of the appellee Hunter be sent back to the county court for further proceedings to be had therein."

On the petition of Hunter, a supersedeas was awarded to the judgment of the circuit court.

Cooke, for the plaintiff in error, maintained that the interference of Hunter with the jury of inquest, as shewn by the evidence, was in no degree improper, and did not warrant the judgment of the circuit court. Upon the merits, he said, the evidence greatly preponderated in favour of the application.

Garland, contra, insisted that the interference of Hunter was improper, and that the judgment was sustainable on that ground. But however that might be, there was another ground on which the circuit court might properly have made the very same disposition of the cause. The petitioner had neither stated in his application, nor offered any evidence to shew, in whom was the title to the bed of the watercourse on which he proposed to erect his dam. Unless the property of the bed were in himself (wholly or in part) or in the commonwealth, the leave he asked could not properly be granted. This was an essential ingredient of his title, and ought to appear on the record. Richards v. Hoome, 2 Wash. 36; Home v. Richards, 4 Call 441; Martin v. Beverley, 5 Call 444; Mead & others v. Haynes, 3 Rand. 33.

He submitted, without argument, the other objections taken in the county court to the writ and inquisition.

474 *Upon the evidence, he said, it was most probable that the millpond would injuriously affect the health of Matthews and his family, and that the damages awarded to Matthews were insufficient. Under such circumstances, the application ought not to be granted.

Cooke, in reply to the objection that it did not appear to whom the bed of the stream belonged, cited and relied upon Wroe v. Harris, 2 Wash. 126, as directly in point to the present case. In the cases cited by the defendant's counsel, the applicants did not own the lands on both sides of the stream. According to the opinion of judge Green in Mead & others v. Haynes, and the universal practice of the country, no form is necessary in making the application to the court; it may be made ore tenus, and the applicant may shew, at any stage of the proceedings, that the circumstances of the case justify his claim for leave to build the mill.

The judgment of the court of appeals was as follows:

The court is of opinion that the judgment of the said circuit superior court is erroneous; therefore it is considered that the same be reversed with costs. And this court proceeding to give such judgment in the premises as the said circuit superior court should have given, it seems to the court here that the county court erred in deciding that the plaintiff should become seized in fee of the land overflowed, upon payment of the damages found by the inquest: therefore it is further considered that so much of said judgment as directs that the plaintiff should become seized in fee of the land overflowed be reversed and annulled, and that the residue thereof be affirmed; and that the defendant recover against the plaintiff his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal in the said circuit court.

Ca. Sa.—Motion to Quash—Oath of Insolvency—Charging Debtor in Execution.—After a ca. sa. against a judgment debtor has been returned non est inventus, and a scire facias sued out against the special bail, the debtor and the bail move to quash

*2 Rev. Code, ch. 235, § 6, p. 227, provides, that "if the party applying obtain leave to build the said mill, machine or engine, and erect the said dam, he shall, upon paying respectively to the several parties entitled, the value of the acre located" (see Id. § 2, p. 226), "and the damages which the jurors find will be done by overflowing the lands above or below, become seized in fee simple of the said acre of land, and be authorized to proceed to erect such mill, machine or engine, and dam."—Note in Original Edition.

the ca. sa. upon the ground that before the same was issued, and since the judgment was rendered, the debtor took the oath of insolvency at the suit of another creditor, and that the said ca. sa. was issued without the direction of the court. The creditor, plaintiff in the execution and scire facias, resists the motion. It appears that the debtor, having been surrendered to the sheriff by his special bail at the suit of the other creditor, and brought before two justices of the peace, subscribed and delivered in a schedule of his estate, made oath thereto in due form of law, and was thereupon discharged by warrant from the justices, which recited that he had "complied with the directions of the general assembly for the relief of insolvent debtors." No other evidence is adduced to shew that the debtor was ever charged in execution by the creditor at whose suit he was surrendered. Held, the motion to quash the ca. sa. must be overruled.

On the 31st of May 1823, Lemuel Turner recovered a judgment in the county court of Nelson against Richard H. Burks and William B. Jacobs, for 1400 dollars and costs, to be discharged by the payment of 700 dollars with interest from the 27th of November 1821 till paid, and the costs; subject to credits for payments made at different times amounting to 537 dollars 17 cents. Pending the action, William Lee Harris had become special bail for the defendants. On the 24th of November 1823, ca. sa. was issued upon the judgment, directed to the sheriff of Nelson and returnable to January term 1824, on which the sheriff made the following return: "29th November, 1823, executed on Jacobs and committed to jail; Burks not found." On the 11th of December 1824, after the death of William Lee

Harris the special bail, a writ of scire facias was sued out *against Lee W.

Harris his executor. Various proceedings were had upon the scire facias, and it was still pending and undetermined on the 27th of August 1834. On that day, Harris's executor and Richard H. Burks moved the county court of Nelson to quash the ca. sa. so far as it affected the said Burks, upon the ground that before the same was issued, and since the recovery of the judgment, Burks had taken the oath of insolvency at the suit of other creditors, and that the said ca. sa. emanated without the order of the court. This motion was resisted by Turner, the plaintiff in the execution and scire facias.

In support of the motion, Harris's executor and Burks produced a warrant under the hands and seals of two justices of the peace for Amherst county, dated the 23d of August 1823, and directed to the keeper of the jail of said county, in the following terms: "We hereby command you, in the name of the commonwealth, forthwith to release and set at liberty Richard H. Burks, a prisoner now in your custody by virtue of the following bail pieces: One in the name of William Morgan &c. against the said Richard H. Burks &c. for 4800 dollars, to be discharged by the payment of 2400 dollars with interest &c. and costs; John Van Lew Burks before the justices, and the 477 schedule subscribed *and delivered in by him, were also produced; and it was proved by the testimony of two witnesses, that Burks, previous to his discharge under the warrant first above set forth, made oath to the said schedule in due form of law. But except the warrant of discharge itself, there was no evidence proving, or tending to prove, that Burks was charged in execution by any of the creditors in the said warrant mentioned, when he took the oath of insolvency and obtained his discharge as aforesaid.

Upon this evidence the county court of Nelson held that the execution ought to be quashed, so far as Burks was concerned, as it had been issued without the direction of the court, and after Burks had taken the oath of insolvency at the time and in the cases above stated; and ordered that the same be quashed accordingly. This order was affirmed by the circuit superior court of Nelson, on a supersedeas thereto obtained by Turner; and thereupon, on his petition, this court allowed him a supersedeas to the judgment of affirmance.

Rhodes, for the plaintiff in error, submitted, that Burks was not duly discharged, not having been charged in execution by any creditor, and consequently that Turner's ca. sa. was rightfully issued.

There was no counsel for the defendants.

PER CURIAM. Judgments of both courts reversed, and motion to quash the ca. sa. overruled.*

Sale of Land—Equity Jurisdiction—Rescission—Quiet-ing Title—Decree between Codefendants:—The owner of a tract of land conveys the same in trust to secure a debt, and afterwards, in May 1819, sells 100 acres of the tract to a party having notice of the incumbrance, who receives from the vendor a deed and the possession of the land, pays him a part of the purchase money, and engages to pay the residue when the vendor shall make him a good title: no time being limited for perfecting the title, and both parties believing that several years will elapse before it is perfected. The whole tract is sold under the trust deed, and conveyed by the trustee to the purchaser; who, in 1820, brings suit in chancery against the original owner, his vendee of the 100 acres, and a third person, by whom a lien on the land is claimed under a trust deed prior in date to that under which the plaintiff purchased: the object of the suit being to have the plaintiff's title quieted, and possession of the land delivered to him. The vendee of the 100 acres, having failed to answer the bill though duly served with process, is brought into court in June 1833 to answer interrogatories, and the plaintiff thereupon offering him the election, to take a conveyance from the plaintiff of his title to the 100 acres, and pay him the residue of the purchase money stipulated with the vendor, or else to surrender his own title under the vendor's deed, he answers, declining to have his contract with the vendor carried into execution, and reclaiming the purchase money he has paid him. The land has then become greatly depreciated in value. In 1833 it is decided that the first deed of trust has been satisfied, and that the defendant claiming under it has no lien. In 1834 the court not only decrees that the plaintiff be quieted in his title and possession against all the defendants, but, holding that the vendee of the 100 acres has been unreasonably delayed in his title, and that the tender by the plaintiff was too late, proceeds to decree that the contract and deed for the 100 acres be annulled, and that the vendor repay to the vendee the purchase money he has received. The vendor appeals from the decree, and in the court of appeals objects, 1. That equity has no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's case. 2. That the vendee ought to have been required to take the title offered by the plaintiff. 3. That the case is not one in which a decree can properly be rendered between codefendants. But the court of appeals affirms the decree.

479 *By deed dated the 12th of June 1817, Jesse Jones sold and conveyed to Robert Morriss a tract of land in Campbell county containing 600 acres. Morriss, on the same day, executed a deed conveying the land to Micajah Moorman and Howard Bennett, in trust, for securing to Jones the payment of the purchase money, amounting to 4905 dollars 75 cents, for which Morriss had given his three bonds payable respectively on the first of January 1819, 1820 and 1821.

Both deeds were duly recorded in Campbell county court. In October 1818, it was agreed between Morriss and Jones, that Jones should take from Morriss a conveyance of another tract of land in Campbell county, containing about 780 acres, in satisfaction of the purchase money due for the 600 acre tract. Jones was put in immediate possession of the 780 acre tract; and on the 18th of November 1818, he surrendered Morriss's three bonds, endorsing thereon a receipt in full, and taking Morriss's written promise to make him a deed for the land; which was accordingly executed on the 8th of January 1819, and recorded in the county court of Campbell on the 8th day of February 1819. But no release of the trust deed to Moorman and Bennett was executed.

After the contract between Morriss and Jones respecting the tract of 780 acres was entered into, but before the land was conveyed to Jones, namely, on the 12th of November 1818, Morriss conveyed the same land, with other property, to Christopher Winfree in trust for the purpose of securing a large debt to D. W. & C. Warwick. This deed was duly recorded in the corporation court of Lynchburg on the 4th of March 1819; and being produced to the county court of Campbell on the 12th of April 1819, with the certificate of the registry in the corporation court endorsed upon it, was thereupon ordered to be recorded in the county court. When Jones received his conveyance from Morriss, he had, it seems, no notice of the trust deed to Winfree for the benefit of the Warwicks.

480 *On the 12th of March 1819, Morriss conveyed the tract of 600 acres to Samuel Garland and John H. Smith, trustees, for the purpose of indemnifying Robert L. Coleman and Nicholas Harrison, who had endorsed his notes to a large amount. When Coleman and Harrison took this conveyance from Morriss, they knew that the trust deed conveying the same tract to Moorman and Bennett, for securing the payment of the purchase money to Jones, had never been released; but they were also apprized of the contract between Morriss and Jones, by which the latter had surrendered Morriss's bonds, and accepted the conveyance of the 780 acre tract in payment.

Shortly after the execution of the trust deed to Garland and Smith, John Dinwiddie, with full notice of that deed, contracted with Morriss for the purchase of 100 acres parcel of the 600 acre tract, at the price of 2000 dollars, 500 dollars to be paid in cash, and the residue (for which he executed his three bonds to Morriss) to be paid when Morriss should make him a good title to the land. No particular time was limited for perfecting the title; and both parties believed that several years would elapse before it would be perfected. Meanwhile Dinwiddie was to have possession of the land, and his bonds were to remain in the custody of J. N. Cardozo. Dinwiddie accordingly paid Morriss 500 dollars in part of the purchase money; his bonds for the residue were delivered to Cardozo; and he received from Morriss the possession of the land, and a conveyance of the same, bearing date the 1st of May 1819.

Coleman and Harrison, having been compelled to take up notes endorsed by them for Morriss to the amount of 6500 dollars, required the trustees Garland and Smith to make sale of the 600 acre tract, in pursuance of the deed of the 12th March 1819. The said trustees accordingly sold the land at public auction, on the 23d of July 1819.

Coleman and Harrison became the 481 purchasers, *for a sum less than the amount which Morriss owed them; and the land was conveyed to them by the trustees, by deed dated the 24th of July 1819. Before the property was set up to be sold, Jones forbade the sale, and made known to Coleman and Harrison and the trustees, that he claimed a lien on the land for the purchase money which would be due him from Morriss, in case his title to the tract of 780 acres, conveyed to him by Morriss as aforesaid, should fail.

Morriss having also made default in the payment of the debt to the Warwicks, secured by the trust deed to Winfree, the tract of 780 acres was sold by Winfree in conformity with the provisions of that deed, and purchased by Daniel Warwick, (one of the firm of D. W. and C. Warwick,) to whom Winfree accordingly conveyed the same, by deed dated the 4th of September 1820. At the time of this sale, Jones was in actual possession of the land, claiming it under his purchase from Morriss. Before the property was sold, he made his claim known both to D. Warwick and the trustee, and publicly forbade the sale.

In May 1820, Coleman and Harrison filed their bill in the superior court of chancery for the Lynchburg district, against Morriss, Jones and Dinwiddie, together with Moorman and Bennett the trustees in Morriss's deed for the benefit of Jones; setting forth their endorsements for Morriss; his execution of the trust deed to Garland and Smith for their indemnity; their payment of the endorsed notes; the sale under the trust deed, and their purchase of the land; Morriss's sale of 100 acres to Dinwiddie; and Jones's claim of a lien on the whole tract for purchase money. Dinwiddie, it was alleged, was in the possession of the whole 600 acres; of 100 as purchaser from Morriss, and of the residue as Morriss's tenant at will. The prayer of the bill was, that the 482 plaintiffs might be quieted in their title to the land, *and have the possession thereof delivered to them; and for general relief.

Jones answered, insisting on his lien for purchase money under the trust deed executed to Moorman and Bennett, the release of which, he said, it would be contrary to equity to exact from him, unless he were quieted and made secure in his title to the tract of 780 acres, against the claim set up thereto by D. W. and C. Warwick; especially as Morriss was notoriously insolvent.

Morriss answered, admitting all the allegations of the bill, and assenting to the relief prayed thereby.

Process was duly served on Dinwiddie; but he long failed to answer the bill. The suit remained pending in the superior court of chancery until 1831, when it was duly transferred to the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the town of Lynchburg. In June 1832, on the motion of the plaintiffs, the court ordered that Dinwiddie should be brought in by a special messenger, to answer interrogatories. He was brought in accordingly on the 14th of June 1832; when the plaintiffs propounded to him the interrogatories following: 1. Whether, under the conveyance made to him by Morriss, he claimed title to the 100 acres of land therein mentioned? 2. Whether he would elect to have his contract with Morriss carried into execution, by a surrender of the plaintiffs' title to him, he accounting to them, as the assignees of Morriss, for the balance of the purchase money with interest; or to surrender his conveyance, and release his title under the same, accounting with the plaintiffs for the reasonable rents and profits of the land from the date of their purchase? To these interrogatories Dinwiddie answered, that he claimed no title to the 100 acres by virtue of Morriss's conveyance; and that he was not willing to have his contract with Morriss carried into execution at this late day, when the land had become greatly depreciated in value. By the leave of the court, he at 483 the same time put *in an answer to the bill; wherein he again declined the execution of his contract with Morriss, and claimed that the 500 dollars he had paid to Morriss should be refunded to him with interest. He also admitted that when he purchased the 100 acres, he was in possession of the whole tract, under a lease from Morriss for three years; and that he was still in possession of the whole at the time this suit was commenced; but he alleged that he then held the possession as tenant to the plaintiffs, the land having been leased to him from year to year, for several years, by Coleman; to whom he averred that he had paid the whole of the rents.

The long pendency of Coleman and Harrison's suit was owing to a cross suit instituted by Jones. His bill was filed in October 1820, against Coleman and Harrison, Morriss, D. W. and C. Warwick, Winfree, and Moorman and Bennett, praying to be quieted in his title to the tract of 780 acres, and his possession thereof, as against the Warwicks; or, in case their title should be held superior to his, then that his lien on the tract of 600 acres, for the purchase money due him from Morriss, might be enforced, and the land sold to satisfy the same according to the provisions of Morriss's deed to Moorman and Bennett. Hereupon a controversy arose between Jones and the Warwicks, which was long protracted. Jones dying, the suit of Coleman and Harrison was revived against his administrator and heir, Thomas Jones; and the cross suit was revived in the name of the same party. In October 1825, an amended bill was filed by Thomas Jones, charging that Morriss's deed to Winfree for the benefit of the Warwicks was never recorded according to the laws of the land, so that the same was void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. Thomas Jones having also died pending the controversy, the cross suit was revived in the names of his devisees, and the original suit was revived against them.

484 *The cross suit was finally heard and determined on the 8th of August 1833. The court held that the deed of trust from Morriss to Winfree for the benefit of the Warwicks, never having been recorded pursuant to law in the county court of Campbell, was void as against Jesse Jones and those claiming under him; and therefore decreed that Winfree and the Warwicks, for the purpose of quieting the plaintiffs (the devisees of Thomas Jones) in their title to the tract of 780 acres in the proceedings mentioned, should, by a proper deed, release to the said plaintiffs all the right, title, interest and claim of them the said Winfree and Warwicks in and to the said tract: and that the defendant Morriss should pay the plaintiffs their costs of suit.

After the determination of the cross suit, namely, on the 4th of January 1834, the deposition of Robert L. Coleman, one of the plaintiffs in the original suit, was taken on behalf of Morriss, to be read as evidence between Morriss and his codefendant Dinwiddie. Coleman deposed, that shortly after the execution of the trust deed to Garland and Smith, Morriss requested Harrison and the deponent to let Dinwiddie have the land which he Morriss had sold him: that they consented to do so, and proposed to Dinwiddie to complete his title as far as they could, upon his paying them 1500 dollars, the amount of his bonds to Morriss for the purchase money; which Dinwiddie refused to do: that there was a very great decline in the price of lands after Dinwiddie's purchase; and that deponent was always willing and desirous to take the 1500 dollars, the amount of Dinwiddie's bonds, for the land, and never could get it.—Dinwiddie excepted to this deposition, on the ground that the deponent was a party directly interested in the result of the suit.

The original suit of Coleman and Harrison came on to be heard the 29th of January 1834; when the court decreed, that as it appeared the representatives of 485 *Jones had been quieted in their title to the tract of 780 acres, therefore the plaintiffs should be forever quieted in their title to the tract of 600 acres, against the defendants and all claiming under them; and that the defendant Howard Bennett (whose cotrustee Moorman was now dead) should release to the plaintiffs, who admitted themselves to be in possession of the land, all the right and title to the same, which was conveyed by Morriss's deed to the said Moorman and Bennett. "And the court deeming it unreasonable that the defendant John Dinwiddie should have been so long delayed in his title to the 100 acres conveyed to him by Robert Morriss by deed of bargain and sale of the 1st day of May 1819; and that the plaintiffs were too late in tendering him a title; and he having elected to abandon said contract; doth adjudge, order and decree that the contract and deed last aforesaid be set aside as null and void." The court then proceeded to direct an account of the rents and profits of the land while it was held by Dinwiddie, either under the contract aforesaid or as tenant, and of all payments made by him to Morriss on account of his said purchase.

After the last mentioned decree was rendered, the deposition of J. N. Cardozo was filed in the cause. This witness was examined on behalf of Morriss. Besides proving the terms of the contract between Morriss and Dinwiddie, and the understanding of those parties at the time, as detailed in a former part of this report, the deposition contained the following statement: "This deponent thinks that Dinwiddie considered the use and occupancy of the land as more than equal to the interest of the 500 dollars," (the cash payment) "this being tobacco land, and that article being in demand, and lands of this quality scarce." Dinwiddie's bonds, which (as already mentioned) were deposited in the custody of deponent, were kept by him 3 or 4, perhaps 486 5 years; and the deponent being then about to remove *from Lynchburg, the bonds were, with the consent and in the presence of both Morriss and Dinwiddie, either destroyed, or placed in the hands of some other person; deponent could not remember which.

On the 31st of January 1835, the cause was further heard "upon the decretal order of January 1834, the deposition of J. N. Cardozo, and the agreement of the counsel of the defendants Morriss and Dinwiddie of the rent at 150 dollars:" On consideration whereof, the court, "being of opinion that the deposition of Cardozo proves that the rent of the land was considered and estimated to be equal and more than equal to the interest of the money paid in hand, and from which it fairly results that the money was to be repaid by the defendant Morriss to Dinwiddie in the event of the former failing to make the latter a good and sufficient title to the 100 acres of land in the proceedings mentioned,"—decreed that Morriss pay to Dinwiddie 500 dollars with interest from the 14th of June 1832 until paid, subject to an offset of 150 dollars, the amount of the rent as agreed upon by the parties, to be credited as of that day.

Morriss applied to a judge of this court for appeal from the decrees of the 29th January 1834 and the 31st January 1835; which was allowed. In his petition, he assigned the following grounds of objection to the said decrees:

1. That Dinwiddie, having received a conveyance from Morriss and the possession of the land, and never having been evicted by any legal process or even threatened with eviction, could not surrender his title at his pleasure to Coleman and Harrison, and hold Morriss responsible for the purchase money.

2. That Dinwiddie having purchased with the knowledge of the previous conveyance to Garland and Smith, and with the understanding that Morriss was to procure from the parties interested in that conveyance a ratification *of the contract, 487 and Coleman and Harrison having proposed soon after their purchase to convey the land to him, which he refused, the contract is obligatory upon Dinwiddie, and he cannot be released from it by Coleman and Harrison at the expense of Morriss.

3. That as there was a conveyance by Morriss to Dinwiddie and possession given, which he has never been required to surrender until the decision of this cause in January 1834, as no time was limited in which Morriss was to procure the conveyance for the purpose of assuring Dinwiddie's title, and as the delay which has occurred may be mainly attributable to his neglect in filing his answer, the offer of Coleman and Harrison in 1832 was not too late to bind him, so as to release Morriss.

4. That a chancery court is not the tribunal to determine between parties both of whom claim a legal title to the property. Stuart's heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Wisely v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361.

5. That this is not a case in which the court may decree between codefendants. Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434.

Grattan argued the cause for the appellant: there was no counsel for the appellees.

PER CURIAM. Decrees affirmed.

February, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P., and STANARD,* J.)

Slaves—Treaty of Ghent—Widow's Interest in Money Received for Deported Slaves.—Under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and the subsequent conventions between the United States and Great Britain, of London in October 1818, and of St. Petersburg in July 1822, the owners of slaves which were carried away from the territories of the United States by the british forces at the close of the late war, were entitled to indemnity for all such slaves, but not to the slaves in specie: and a citizen of Virginia, the owner of certain slaves so deported, having died in 1825 without issue, leaving his wife surviving him, and his administrator having afterwards received, under the act of congress of the 2d March 1827, a sum of money as indemnity for those slaves, the widow is entitled to half the distributable surplus of that money, as her absolute property, not merely to such interest therein as she would have been entitled to in the slaves.

During the late war between the United States and Great Britain, certain slaves, the property of Kenner W. Cralle, late of Northumberland, eloped to and were carried away by the enemy, and never returned or were restored to the owner. Cralle died in 1825, leaving his wife Mary him surviving, but without any child or issue. Administration of Cralle's estate was granted to Griffin H. Foushee, who preferred a claim before the commissioners appointed to award indemnity for slaves deported by the enemy, under the treaty of Ghent, and received a large sum of money upon that claim. Mary, the relict of Cralle, married Thomas Blackwell.

Blackwell and wife, in a bill filed in the superior court of chancery for the Fredericksburg district, against Foushee administrator and distributee of Cralle, claimed one half of the money which he had received as indemnity for the deported slaves, 489 to hold in absolute property, in *like manner as mrs. Blackwell's distributive portion of any other money belonging or due to Cralle's estate. And Foushee in his answer insisted, that the plaintiffs were entitled only to such interest in that money, as they were entitled to in the slaves for which the money was received as an indemnity, namely, an estate for mrs. Blackwell's life in her distributive portion thereof.

The circuit superior court of Northumberland, (to which the suit had been transferred,) in an interlocutory decree pronounced the 19th of October 1832, declared that the money received as an indemnity for the deported slaves was to be regarded as part of the goods and chattels of the intestate generally, and not as part of his slave property, and decreed for the plaintiffs accordingly. From which decree Foushee appealed to this court.

Stanard, for the appellant, contended, that under the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent, and the conventions between the United States and Great Britain which subsequently grew out of it,* the United 490 States, at the period *of Cralle's death,

*"All territory, places and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property." Treaty of Ghent, art. 1. (1 Bloren's Law U. S. p. 694.)

"Whereas, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, the United States claim for their citizens, and as their private property, the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves who, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, were in any territory, places or possessions whatsoever, directed by the said treaty to be restored to the United States, but then still occupied by the british forces, whether such slaves were, at the date aforesaid, on shore, or on board any british vessel lying in waters within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States; and whereas differences have arisen whether, by the true intent and meaning of the aforesaid article of the treaty of Ghent, the United States are entitled to the restoration of, or full compensation for, all or any slaves as above described, the high contracting parties hereby agree to refer the said difference to some friendly sovereign or state, to be named for that purpose; and the high contracting parties further engage to consider the decision of such friendly sovereign or state to be final and conclusive on all the matters referred." Convention of

had a right to demand on his behalf, and Great Britain was bound to restore, the specific *slaves of Cralle which had been deported; that the claim did not become a money demand until the convention of November 1826, after Cralle's death; and that the money received by his administrator was impressed with the same character as the property on account of which it was received. The character, he said, of property belonging to the estate of a decedent, and the respective rights of parties interested in it, are ascertained at the time of the decedent's death. If the will directs land to be sold and the money to be paid to a legatee, the failure to make the sale is immaterial: though the legatee die before the land has been actually converted into money, it nevertheless passes as money, to his personal representatives, not to his heirs. Tazewell & al. v. Smith's adm'r, 1 Rand. 313, 320; Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. 296. On the other hand, an improper conversion of property belonging to the estate is equally ineffectual to change the rights of parties. If an administrator sell the slaves of his intestate, under the mistaken belief that such sale is necessary for the *payment of debts, the widow can claim no greater interest in the money than she would have been entitled to in the slaves. Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'r &c., 4 Leigh 410. Between that case and the present there is no distinction in principle.

London, October 20, 1818, art. 5. (Appendix to acts of 15th congress, 2d session, p. 82.)

"The United States of America are entitled to claim from Great Britain a just indemnification for all property which the british forces may have carried away; and as the question relates to slaves more especially, for all the slaves that the british forces may have carried away, from places and territories of which the treaty stipulates the restitution, in quitting these same places and territories. The United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away, all such slaves as may have been transferred from the above mentioned territories to british vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who for this reason may not have been restored." Decision of the emperor of Russia. (Appendix to acts of 17th congress, 2d session, p. 1, 2.)

"The decision of the two commissioners, or of the majority of the board, as constituted by the preceding article, shall in all cases be final and conclusive, whether as to number, the value, or the ownership of the slaves or other property for which indemnification is to be made. And his britannic majesty engages to cause the sum awarded to each and every owner in lieu of his slave or slaves or other property, to be paid in specie, without deduction, at such time or times and at such place or places as shall be awarded by the said commissioners, and on condition of such releases or assignments to be given, as they shall direct." Convention of St. Petersburg, July 12, 1822, art. 6. (Same appendix, p. 9.)

"Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg on the 12th day of July 1822, under the mediation of his maj-

Cooke, for the appellee. The entire basis of mr. Stanard's argument is taken away by the examination of the treaties and conventions which he himself has referred to. None of them provides for the restitution in specie of slaves in the situation in which these were at Cralle's death, but only (at most) for indemnification to the owners. Indeed no british minister would have dared to make such a stipulation, knowing the theory of the law of England in respect to slavery on the english soil. The claims of american owners of deported slaves are recognized and treated, from first to last, as money claims, not as claims to specific property. The property in the slaves had been divested by the act of deportation jure belli. And even if the british government had expressly agreed to restore the slaves deported, such agreement would not have had the effect to revest the property; it would have been merely an executory contract of the british government to restore, and nowise equivalent to the actual restitution. The fund then was money de facto when it came to the hands of the administrator, and there was nothing in the transactions between the two governments which impressed on it the character of slave esty the emperor of all the Russias, between the United States of America and Great Britain, for the purpose of carrying into effect the decision of his imperial majesty upon the differences which had arisen between the said United States and Great Britain, on the true construction and meaning of the first article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded at Ghent on the 24th day of December 1814,—his majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland agrees to pay, and the United States of America agree to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of 1,204,960 dollars current money of the United States, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain by any person or persons, whatsoever under the said decision and convention. Both the final adjustment of those claims, and the distribution of the sum so paid by Great Britain to the United States, shall be made in such manner as the United States alone shall determine; and the government of Great Britain shall have no further concern or liability therein." Convention of London, November 13, 1826, art. 1, 4. (Appendix to acts of 19th congress, 2d session, p. 56, 57.)

An act of congress, approved March 2, 1827, (8 Story's Laws U. S. p. 2048.) made provision for the adjustment of claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent, and for the distribution among such claimants of the sum paid by Great Britain under the convention of November 13, 1826, by a board of commissioners to be appointed for the purpose.—Note in Original Edition.

property. Indeed Cralle never had, under the treaties, a right to claim even pecuniary compensation for the loss of these slaves;

though his administrator did obtain 493 such compensation *by an equitable construction made by the american commissioners for distributing the fund which the british government had paid.

Cralle, therefore, having no property in these slaves at the time of his death, the cases cited on the other side are wholly inapplicable.

Leigh, in reply. The dispute between the american and british governments as to the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, related to slaves and other property on board the british vessels lying in our waters at the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. Our government contended that Great Britain by that article had stipulated not to carry away, but to make restitution of, all slaves and other property of american citizens which might be in that situation. Suppose the slaves then on board the british vessels had been, in conformity with that construction, actually landed on our coast, and relinquished by the british forces: there can be no doubt that the property would have remained in specie to the original owners. The construction maintained by the american government was the true construction of the article, and the slaves ought to have been so landed and relinquished. The award made by the emperor of Russia proceeds upon that construction: it declares that the United States are entitled to claim a just indemnification for all private property carried away by the british forces; not because the treaty bound Great Britain to pay a pecuniary equivalent for such slaves and other property of american citizens as she should think proper to carry away, but because she had thereby stipulated not to carry away any such property at all, but on the contrary to leave it with the american authorities, for the purpose of restoration to the owners. The appellee's counsel interprets the word indemnification as importing a pecuniary equivalent only. This interpretation is too narrow. In the case of a lawless or unjust deportation of 494 specific property, the *best and most perfect indemnification is always the restitution of the property itself. Besides, by the 6th article of the convention for carrying the award into execution, the sum awarded to each owner of slaves was to be paid to him "in lieu of his slaves," and "on condition of such releases or assignments to be given" as the commissioners should direct; that is, releases or assignments of the right to the slaves in specie. The owner retained the right to demand, and the british government the right to make, the restitution of the specific property if to be had: the alternative value was to be paid in money, if the property could not be restored in specie. Suppose Cralle had died having an unsatisfied judgment in detinue, for a slave or the alternative value: could it be contended that in the event the slave could not be had, the widow would be entitled to regard the right of the intestate as a right to a sum of money merely, and to claim an absolute property in her distributive share?

If the appellee's counsel is correct in his idea that Cralle had no right even to pecuniary compensation for the loss of his slaves, then the administrator has received money to which the estate was not entitled, and the widow has no just claim to any part of it.

ALLEN, J. The first article of the treaty of Ghent between the United States and Great Britain stipulated for the restoration of all territory &c. taken by either party from the other, without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in said forts or places, which remained there upon the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, or any slaves or other private property.

The two governments differed as to the true construction of this article; the american government insisting that it extended to all slaves within their territory at 495 *the time, whether on land, or on board the british cruisers; the english government, that the article applied to such slaves as were on shore. The two governments, not being able to agree, made and concluded a convention on the 20th day of October 1818, by which they referred the difference to the decision of the emperor of Russia. In this convention it was recited that the United States claimed for their citizens, and as their private property, the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves which were embraced by their construction of the treaty as aforesaid.

On the 22d of April 1822, the emperor of Russia made his award, sustaining the construction given to the treaty by the american government: the words of the award being, that "the United States of America are entitled to claim from Great Britain a just indemnification for all private property which the british forces may have carried away, and as the question relates to slaves more especially, for all the slaves that the british forces may have carried away, from places and territories of which the treaty stipulates the restitution, in quitting these same places and territories;" and that "the United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away, all such slaves as may have been transferred from the above mentioned territories to british vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who for this reason may not have been restored." On the 12th of July 1822, a convention was executed to carry into effect this award. By the first article, commissioners were to be appointed to ascertain and determine the amount of indemnification which might be due to citizens of the United States under the award. The average value to be allowed for each slave for whom indemnification might be due, was to be fixed. The evidence in support of the claims for indemnification was to be examined and decided on. And after the commissioners should have decided, the 496 british government engaged *to cause the sum awarded to each and every owner in lieu of his slaves, to be paid at the times and places awarded, and on condition of such releases or assignments to be given, as the commissioners should direct. Difficulties having arisen in the execution of this convention, on the 13th of November 1826 another convention was made, by which Great Britain agreed to pay and the United States to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the decision of the emperor of Russia and the subsequent convention, a specific sum in lieu of and in full and complete satisfaction for all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain by any person under the said decision and convention. And the adjustment of the claims and distribution of the sum paid was to be made in such manner as the United States alone should determine. This ended the controversy between the two governments; and on the 2d of March 1827 an act of congress passed, creating a commission to determine on the claims, and directing the distribution of the money.

Certain slaves, the property of the appellant's intestate, had been carried away. He died in 1825, leaving a widow; and after his death, his administrator preferred a claim and received a sum of money on account of these slaves. As the intestate died without issue, his widow claims, under our act of distributions, one half of the sum received as indemnity for the deported slaves, as her absolute property; and the administrator contends that she is entitled only to such interest in the money as she would have been entitled to in the slaves for which it was received, that is, an estate for life.

As Great Britain stipulated to restore the slaves and private property which remained in the places designated, it is unnecessary to enquire what would have been the effect of the capture upon the title of the 497 first *owner. By the jus postliminii, if the property so captured had been restored, and had come again into the power and possession of the original owner, his title would not have been considered as divested by the capture. But the property in question was not restored; the possession of the original owner was never resumed; and it would not be contended that under the provisions of this treaty, he could have followed the property, and asserted his claim to it as against individuals into whose hands it had fallen. His claim was, through his government, upon the government of Great Britain, and not to the specific chattel wherever it might be found. To constitute a complete title to the thing, possession must have been acquired; and that not being resumed, the claim of the original owner was, through his government, upon the foreign government for indemnity. It therefore would seem to follow, that as soon as it was ascertained that the property was not or could not be reclaimed, that fact destroyed all title to the identical property. Whatever was afterwards received on account of it, was so received by way of indemnity and compensation for the loss. If the case stood therefore upon the treaty of Ghent alone, it seems to me that in the event which has happened, the money paid could not, as between these parties, be regarded as slaves. To liken it to the case of private individuals, here was an executory contract to restore property, the title to which, under the laws of war, was divested by the capture, and by the continued possession of the enemy. Under the treaty and by right of postliminy, if the possession had been restored, the original title would have been revested and have overreached the capture. But it was not so restored; the title never did revest, and the claim of the party was for compensation for the breach in not restoring.

But the subsequent conventions between the governments would seem to remove 498 all difficulty, as the owner *could claim only through the acts of his government. It had full authority to surrender his rights, or commute them, or accept such compensation for them as it thought proper. By the convention of 1818, the United States claimed for their citizens the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves carried away against the treaty as they construed it. This claim, thus stated in the alternative, was submitted to the arbitrator. He decided that they were entitled to indemnification from Great Britain for the slaves so carried away; and to render it perfectly certain for what this indemnity was to be paid, he further stated that they were entitled to consider as having been so carried away, all such slaves as might have been transferred &c. and who for this reason had not been restored; thereby shewing that after such carrying away, restitution could not be made, and therefore indemnification was given. The claim for restoration was submitted; the decision put an end to it by awarding indemnity, and is conclusive as to the title to the specific property.

After this award, restoration of the property is no more heard of. The convention of 1822, for carrying the award into effect, speaks of the indemnity alone, and fixes the mode by which the amount is to be ascertained and paid.

Some reliance was placed upon the clause in the treaty, by which the british government engaged to pay the sum awarded to the owner in lieu of his slaves, on condition of such releases and assignments to be given, as the commissioners should direct. I do not understand this as recognizing a right then subsisting to have the specific thing, (for that would be contradicting the words of the award and treaty), but simply as shewing that the money was paid as an indemnity for the specific property for which compensation was awarded. And as to the releases or assignments, it is to be observed that, by the treaty, Great 499 Britain was to pay to *each owner. The decision of the commissioners would furnish evidence of the claim; and it was necessary for her security that some authentic evidence of the payment should be furnished. This, it seems to me, was the object of this cause. Cralle died after the ratification of this treaty. His right then, as secured by his government, was a right to a pecuniary indemnity for his loss, and the subsequent treaty and law merely provided for the payment, but did not vary the character of the subject. His administrator received it as a pecuniary compensation to which his intestate was entitled, and is bound to distribute it as other money of the estate.

I think the widow is entitled to claim the moiety as her absolute property, and that the decree should be affirmed.

Corporations—Expiration of Charter Pending Appeal

—Previous Assignment of Rights.*—A bill in equity by corporation being dismissed at the hearing, and an appeal taken from the decree, pending the appeal the charter of the corporation expires. A motion is made to the appellate court, upon the authority of Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, that the appeal be entered as abated for that cause. In opposition to the motion it is suggested, that during the existence of the corporation, it made an assignment of its rights in the subject in controversy. HELD, the appellate court may enquire whether the fact of assignment exists, as a guide for its action on the motion to abate, and upon being satisfied of the fact, may permit the case to proceed, without noticing on the record the dissolution of the corporation.

*Corporations—Expiration Pending Appeal—Assignment of Rights during Existence—Effect.—The principal case is cited in May v. State Bank of North Carolina, 2 Rob. 99, 40 Am. Dec. 735, for the proposition that in the case of a corporation whose existence may have terminated pending appeal or writ of error, and to which there is no legal succession nor can be a legal representative, but whose rights, at least in equity, may have passed to others by assignment for value during its existence, the appellate proceedings are continued to judgment or decree in the appellate court, irrespective of the fact that the corporate existence has expired.

Same—Same—Similar to Death of Individual.—The principal case is cited in May v. State Bank of N. Car., 2 Rob. 73, 74, to the point that the extinction of a corporation by efflux of time cannot be distinguished, as regards disability, from that of an individual by death. See, in accord, Rider v. Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, in which case TUCKER, P., delivering the opinion of the court, places them both upon the same footing.

See foot-note to Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76.

Practice—Death of Either Party—Revival.—In Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 85, it is said: "Though there is no abatement of appellate causes in this court, whether of law or equity, and our statutes for revival of actions or suits have no application to them; yet a practice prevails here, probably borrowed in substance from that of the English House of Lords, in equity, requiring in case of the death of either party a revival of the appeal or writ of error by consent or by scire facias. Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. R. 499."

settling real and personal estate for the benefit of a wife and children. It was attested by highly respectable and intelligent witnesses, and immediately placed upon record. Eighteen years afterwards, a bill was filed to impeach this conveyance, by a creditor whose debt originated some years after the conveyance was made, and who, it appeared, had notice of the conveyance when not more than a fourth of the debt had been contracted. The bill alleged, that at the time of the conveyance the grantor was very much involved, and largely indebted to many persons. But in the opinion of the court it was proved that he was then, and for several years afterwards, able to meet all his engagements; the owner of property to a considerable amount; in good credit and extensive business; having the command of large sums of money, and not indebted except to a single individual, the debt to whom was not large, considering the grantor's estate. On the 21st of March 1807, a deed was made between Robert Patton junior of the county of Fairfax of the one part, and James Sanderson and William Stewart junior of the town of Alexandria of the other part, whereby Patton, for a nominal consideration, (to wit, ten dollars) conveyed unto Sanderson and Stewart a tract of land in Fairfax county containing 128 acres, sixteen slaves, a chariot and harness, seven horses, all the cows, sheep and farming utensils belonging to him, the liquors of every kind in his cellar, and all his household furniture and kitchen utensils.

501 *On the same day another deed was made, between Sanderson and Stewart of the one part, and Ann Clifton Patton, wife of Robert Patton junior, of the other part, whereby Sanderson and Stewart, for a like nominal consideration, conveyed the same property unto the said Ann Clifton Patton during her life, and after her death to the several children of the said Ann Clifton Patton by the said Robert Patton junior her husband.

The first mentioned deed was attested by George Youngs, R. J. Taylor, Edmund J. Lee and William Moss; the other was attested by the three first named witnesses. They were both proved in the court of Fairfax county, the first by Taylor on the 21st of April 1807, by Moss on the 18th of May 1807, and by Youngs on the 21st of September 1807; the other by Taylor on the 21st of April 1807, and by Youngs and Lee on the 21st of September 1807. On the day last mentioned, both were admitted to record

A deed bearing date the 10th of April 1811, purporting to be from Patton and wife to William Herbert junior, and to convey the same property, was executed by Patton and signed by his wife, and also attested by four witnesses; but she was never privily examined in respect thereto, and it was never recorded. This deed, after describing the property, states expressly that it is the same that was "conveyed by James Sanderson and William Stewart jr. to the said Ann Clifton wife of the said Robert Patton jr. by deed bearing date the 21st of March 1807 and duly recorded in the county court of Fairfax." A reconveyance of the property from Herbert to Patton himself, bearing date the 7th of May 1811, was admitted to record in the court of Fairfax county the 15th of July 1811, upon Herbert's acknowledgment. The reconveyance, after describing the property, stated in terms that it was the same conveyed by Patton and wife to Herbert.

502 *On the 27th of April 1811, a deed was made between Robert Patton junior and Ann Clifton his wife, of the one part, the president, directors and company of the bank of Alexandria, of the second part, and William Herbert jr. of the third part, whereby,—after reciting that Patton did, by deed bearing date the 29th of March 1811, convey unto Herbert 2000 dollars worth of stock in the Farmers bank of Alexandria, together with other property, for the purpose of securing the payment of any sum or sums of money which the president and directors of the bank of Alexandria might have or should thereafter agree to loan him, and after reciting it to be the wish of Patton to convey the premises therein after mentioned in lieu of the said stock and as an additional security for the president and directors of the said bank,—it was witnessed that Patton and wife conveyed to Herbert the same tract of 128 acres of land, being the tract on which Patton then lived, called Spring bank, and also two other tracts of land, one of them conveyed to Patton by Hepburn in April 1809, and the other conveyed to him by Scott and others in June 1810, upon trust and with power to Herbert to sell the said premises, if Patton should at any time thereafter, when required by the president and directors of the bank of Alexandria, fail to pay them whatever sum or sums of money he might owe them by note or otherwise, with any discount or interest that might have become due thereon. This deed was attested by R. J. Taylor, N. J. Herbert and Thomas Swann, all three of whom were likewise witnesses to the reconveyance of the 7th of May 1811. There was a commission to examine mrs. Patton privily and take her acknowledgment of the deed of the 27th April 1811. And on the 18th of November 1811, the deed being proved in the court of Fairfax county as to Patton and Herbert by three witnesses, was admitted to record.

503 *On the 29th of September 1824, a deed was made between Robert Patton junior and Ann Clifton his wife, of the first part, William Herbert of the second part, Colin Auld and Robert J. Taylor of the third part, and the president, directors and company of the bank of Alexandria, of the fourth part, wherein it was recited that Patton stood indebted to the president, directors and company of the bank of Alexandria in the sum of 8920 dollars 62 cents, with interest on 8864 dollars 74 cents from the first of April 1823, and on the residue from the date of the deed (September the 29th 1824), being the amount of sundry loans of money and discounts theretofore made by the bank for his use and accommodation, for the security of which, in part, the said Patton had theretofore conveyed in trust to the said Herbert a part of the lands therein after described. It was farther recited, that the bank had agreed to forbear and give further day of payment for the said debt to the said Patton for the term of 3 years; and if, at or before the expiration of the said term, Patton or his representatives should pay to the bank or its assigns one full third part of the said debt with interest thereon, then the bank or its assigns would allow the further term of two years, making five years from the date; and if, at the end of the said five years, Patton or his representatives should pay one half of the balance, the bank would allow the further term of two years, or seven years from the date, for the payment of the residue: and that Patton, on his part, agreed to give farther and more effectual security for the payment of the said debt to the bank. Whereupon it was witnessed that Patton and wife and Herbert (for such interest as he had therein) conveyed to Auld and Taylor the three tracts of land mentioned in the deed of the 27th of April 1811, and also another tract of land, in trust to permit Patton and wife and their representatives to retain possession and to receive the rents and

504 profits thereof *without account, according to their respective interests therein at the time of the execution of this deed, until default should be made in any one of the payments; and if there should be a failure to make payment of the debt and interest in the manner before mentioned, in trust that Auld and Taylor should sell the premises (or so much thereof as might be necessary to satisfy the whole amount of the debt and interest remaining unpaid, with all reasonable costs of sale) in the manner set forth in the deed. No sale was to be made of the Spring bank tract of land until the other two tracts should have been first sold and the proceeds thereof ascertained to be insufficient. And the deed was in trust that if Patton should pay off the whole amount of the debt, charges of insurance, and interest; or if the same should be raised, with expenses of sale, from the sale of the other tracts; or if the same should in part be so raised, and the said Ann Clifton Patton, or any one of her children, or any one on his or their behalf, should pay to the bank the balance which should be due, then the parties of the third part should thenceforth hold the said tract of land called Spring bank to the sole and separate use of the said Ann Clifton for her life, free from the power and control of her husband, and after her death to the use of such child or children of the said Robert and Ann, then born or thereafter to be born, and for such interests and estates, as the said Ann, by any instrument of writing under her hand, attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by her last will and testament or letter of appointment attested as aforesaid, notwithstanding her coverture, might direct and appoint; and in default of such appointment, to the use of the right heirs of the said Ann according to the statutes regulating descents. The deed made provision for keeping the buildings on the Spring bank tract insured; declared that the sums advanced by the bank for premiums

505 of insurance should *be considered secured by the deed, with interest from the times of such advancements; and provided that if the same, with interest, should not be refunded to the bank within 60 days from the advancement, all claim to further credit should cease, and the trust be executed on the request of the bank. Two justices of the peace of Fairfax county took the acknowledgment of Patton, and also the privy examination and acknowledgment of his wife; and the deed with their certificates was admitted to record in the office of Fairfax county court on the 25th of October 1824.

On the 22d of March 1825, the president, directors and company of the bank of Alexandria commenced a suit in the superior court of chancery formerly holden for the Fredericksburg district.

Their bill, which was filed at June rules 1825, set forth the deeds herein before mentioned; described Patton as being, at the time of executing the deeds of March 1807, "very much involved, and indebted to many persons to a considerable amount;" and mentioned the deed of the 27th of April 1811 as being "in trust to secure a debt of 2000 dollars to the bank of Alexandria, and to secure any further loans that the bank might make to Robert Patton junior." It avers that the debt of 8864 dollars 74 cents, secured by the deed of the 29th of September 1824, is still due to the bank with interest &c. and states that the plaintiffs are advised that the tract of land called Spring bank, and the other lands conveyed by that deed, are liable for the said debt, but their claim to have the tract called Spring bank subjected to the payment of their debt is resisted, upon the ground that it had been previously conveyed by Sanderson and Stewart, by the deed of the 21st of March 1807, to Ann Clifton Patton for life, and after her death to her children, one of whom only was in esse at the date of the deed, to wit, Eleanor Patton, 506 *who afterwards intermarried with George Mason. The complainants contend that the deed from Patton to Sanderson and Stewart, being a voluntary deed without consideration, and made with the sole view to a settlement upon the wife and family of the said Patton, and that too at a time when he was largely indebted to many persons, must, as to the complainants, be considered fraudulent, null and void; that the deed from Sanderson and Stewart to Mrs. Patton and her children is null and void, because no such settlement as was contemplated by the parties could be made without the interposition of a trustee, and as a settlement after marriage, without any contract precedent to the marriage, it cannot be supported against any creditor, either prior or subsequent; that at all events, whatever might be its effects as to the subsequent creditors, it is void in law as to any purchaser, either prior or subsequent; and that as to the complainants, who claim both as creditors and purchasers, both deeds are fraudulent and utterly null and void. Robert Patton and Ann C. his wife, Mary S. Patton, Robert Patton, George Patton, Rosalie W. Patton, Sophia Patton, Elisha C. Patton, Benjamin R. Patton, and George Mason and Eleanor his wife, formerly Eleanor Patton, are made defendants. The bill prays, that Robert Patton may answer and say whether the deed from himself to Sanderson and Stewart was not voluntary and without consideration, and with a view to have the property settled upon his wife and children, and whether, at the date of the said deed, he was not largely indebted to many persons? that the said deed, and the deed from Sanderson and Stewart to Mrs. Patton and her children, may, as to the complainants, who are both creditors and purchasers, be decreed to be null and void, and that the land called Spring bank may be made or left subject to the just and legal liens and incumbrances, which the complainants have upon it.

507 *At May rules 1826, the defendants Robert Patton and Ann C. his wife filed their answer. In this they admit that the facts stated in the bill, so far as they relate to the deeds for the tract of land called Spring bank, are true, and that the deed from Patton to Sanderson and Stewart was voluntary, and without other consideration than what appears on the face of it, except as follows—

They state that Patton, in 1804, contracted an engagement for marriage with Ann C. Reeder (now Ann C. Patton), and being about to embark for Europe, made a will which he left with his brother James Patton, since deceased, wherein he devised the Spring bank land, which he had recently purchased, to the said Ann C. Reeder, together with 5000 dollars, and sundry slaves and household furniture; and not having received the conveyance of the said land, he desired his said brother to cause it to be made to the said Ann C.

Reeder, which however he failed to do. That after his return from Europe, to wit, in 1805, he was married, and the conveyance of Spring bank was subsequently made to himself. That while in England, he became acquainted with the house of Thomas Pinkerton, then a contractor with the British government for the supply of flour, bread, peas and beans in the British West India islands, and entered into an engagement with the said Pinkerton to forward such supplies monthly from the United States to the West Indies, to meet the contract of the said Pinkerton: in the profits of which engagement, he gave his brother James Patton a large share. That soon afterwards Pinkerton failed, and he (Robert Patton) again visited England, and made a similar arrangement with the firm of Ingles, Ellico & Co. which latter business was conducted by himself alone, and was continued until 1809, when that house also failed, leaving him to take up bills of exchange to a large amount, as he had done to a considerable extent in the failure of Pinkerton. The said de-

508 fendant *Robert Patton states, that during the greater portion of the period occupied by these transactions, he believed his circumstances to be good and prosperous, and it was during that period that the deeds of March 1807 were made; but he admits that when those deeds were made, he did owe sundry debts, some of them of considerable amount, and among them a debt to John Laird of Georgetown, D. C. amounting to 678 pounds 11 shillings and 9 pence sterling, with interest from the 31st of December 1806. He states that he is under the impression that a part of the sum obtained from the complainants was paid to Laird, in part of his debt; and adds, "It is with grief and mortification this defendant must own that to this moment he remains indebted to the said John Laird a part of that debt."

At June rules 1826 an answer was filed for the other defendants (except Mason and wife) by guardian ad litem. The guardian states in the answer, that he has no doubt the claim of the complainants for 8864 dollars 75 cents with interest, on account of moneys advanced and loaned by them, is a just and fair claim; and that he has understood that the said Robert Patton junior, at the time the deed to Sanderson and Stewart was executed, was indebted to John Laird in a considerable sum of money, and perhaps to other persons also. Both the deeds of March 1807, he says, "appear to be very vaguely and inartificially drawn, and to have a very precarious effect." Whether the interest vested in the children is such a one as a court of chancery will hold valid against creditors and purchasers, he is not advised; but he states his belief that the said Robert Patton has it in his power to substitute property of equal value for that sought by the complainants to be subjected to the payment of their claim.

At October rules 1826, Mason and wife filed their answer. They state, that personally they know nothing of the facts: that they have always been informed 509 and *believe that the deed to Sanderson and Stewart was a fair and bona fide deed, and not intended to defeat or injure any creditors whatever: that they do not know whether Robert Patton junior was indebted at the time, but they have been informed and believe that his debts at that time were not considerable, and have all been long since paid. They admit that Eleanor Ann was the only child then in esse.

All the answers were signed and sworn to; that, of Patton and wife by each of them; that for the infant defendants by Nathaniel S. Wise, who was then their guardian ad litem; and that of Mason and wife by each of them.

On the 24th of April 1827, the suit abated as to the defendant Robert Patton by his death. Whereupon, for reasons appearing to the court, the order appointing Wise guardian ad litem was set aside, and Ann C. Patton was appointed in his stead: and on the motion of the defendants Ann C. Patton and Eleanor Ann Mason, respectively, by counsel, leave was given to the said Ann C. Patton to answer de novo for herself and the infant defendants, and to the defendant Eleanor Mason to file a separate answer.

At March rules 1828, answers were filed. The answer of Ann C. Patton for herself, and of the infant defendants by her as their guardian states, that the conveyance to Sanderson and Stewart was made in accordance with a long cherished wish on the part of Robert Patton junior to provide for his wife and children a security against the vicissitudes of fortune, by setting apart for them a small portion of his property: and it mentioned the will made by Robert Patton junior on the eve of embarking for Europe, and the instructions given by him to his brother in relation to the conveyance of the Spring bank tract of land, in like manner as they are mentioned in the former answer. It was his intention, she

510 that she *should complete the improvements at Spring bank, and reside there; and that property, and the improvements then making, were understood among their families and friends to be settled upon her. The answer further states, that at the time of the deeds of March 1807, Patton was not at all involved; that he was in the possession of much real property besides the Spring bank estate, and that he had the command of much money, ground rents &c. solely his own; that he was at that time engaged in prosperous mercantile enterprise, and concerned in shares of many vessels, besides having other considerable resources. The respondents aver that it was a conviction honestly entertained by him, that he could make provision for his wife and children, to the extent of the property comprised in the said deeds, without the slightest injustice or hazard of loss to his then creditors.

They admit that he was at that time indebted for some shop and mechanics' accounts contracted after the commencement of the year 1807, which were paid (as was usual then and for many years after) when presented at the close of the year, and that he also owed a debt to John Laird, part of which, amounting with interest to about 1200 dollars, still remains unpaid. Every debt which he owed at that time, with the exception of that to Laird, they aver has been paid. Why that was not paid they cannot state, but presume it was because Laird did not want the money. It could not be, they say, from the incompetency of the said Robert Patton jr. to discharge the same, if Laird had required and pressed it. They mention that in the spring of 1826, Humphrey Peake as agent for the bank, by persuasion, and by threatening an immediate sale of the other lots at the then reduced prices of land, importuned and at length induced the said Robert Patton junior to answer, or to allow him to draw an answer, to the complainants' bill, and to state that he owed sundry debts besides the debt to Laird, which statement

511 *they say was without foundation, except as just mentioned in relation to the shop and mechanics' accounts. They deny that any part of the money received from the bank was ever applied to pay Laird; that debt having, as they allege, been reduced from other sources. They state that the transactions of the said Robert Patton junior with the bank did not commence until January 1809, and that he did not receive any accommodation on his own paper for a considerable time after; and the credit given him was upon his own responsibility, without contemplating any claim or charge upon the Spring bank estate. The deeds of March 1807 were never intended to be kept secret; the attorney of the bank was one of the subscribing witnesses to the same, and they were well known to the friends and acquaintances of the said Robert Patton junior in the town of Alexandria (where he carried on his business) some of whom were directors of the bank. And the respondents insist that both law and justice condemn such a claim as is made here by a subsequent creditor or purchaser, especially when the credit is given and the purchase made with a full knowledge of the voluntary conveyance, as they are informed was the case.

The answer of Eleanor Ann Mason states, that she was an infant at the time the deeds of March 1807 were made by her father; but she declares her belief that they were bona fide and upon just and good consideration, and were not made, as alleged in the bill, to defraud his creditors, or any other persons. She avers that her father was then possessed of a large real and personal estate; that if he were at all indebted, it was to a very small amount compared with the actual value of his estate; and that all the debts he then owed, she has been informed and believes, have been since paid. She calls for proof of the allegation that he was at that time very much involved and indebted. She charges that the debts claimed to be due to the complainants *were contracted long after the execution of those deeds, and that at the time they were contracted the complainants had full knowledge of the existence of the said deeds, and of the interests and estates created by the same.

The deposition of John Laird was taken the 12th of March 1828. It is very brief, consisting of two questions by the plaintiffs, and his answers. Being asked, first, whether he was acquainted with the business and affairs of the late Robert Patton? he answers, "Not at all." And then this question being propounded to him, "Was he not largely indebted to you about the year 1807, at and before that period?" his answer is, "He owed me in 1806, and several years afterwards, 678 pounds 11 shillings and 9 pence sterling money."

At October rules 1828, the death of the defendant Ann C. Patton was suggested on the record.

Depositions were taken on behalf of the surviving defendants in March 1829.

The deposition of Peter R. Beverley was in these terms: "From the year 1809 to 1812, I was intimate with the late Robert Patton junior, and often looked over his books, and from my knowledge of his circumstances then, believe he was worth, after the payment of his debts (which were then trifling), from 60 to 70 thousand dollars. From 1812 to 1816, his circumstances were good and his credit unshaken; his debts inconsiderable. In 1816 and 1817, I had extensive transactions with the said Robert Patton junior, and we jointly loaded two vessels to St. Domingo. His credit was then good, but his fortune much reduced by the failure of Pinkerton and losses on shipments and transactions. From 1817 to 1820, I knew him to be punctual in heavy transactions."

James Sanderson, in answer to the first question propounded to him, deposed, that during the period therein mentioned, to wit, from September 1805 to April 1807, *he was intimately acquainted with Robert Patton junior; that his circumstances were good, and generally considered so; that he was in possession of much real property, besides ground rents, was concerned in shares of several vessels, and had command of a considerable sum in cash. In answer to a second question, he deposed, that from the year 1807 until many years after, the said Patton was in good credit. In 1816, deponent sold him bills on England, upon a credit, for upwards of 8000 dollars, upon the sole notes and responsibility of him the said R. Patton junior; and they were duly paid. The third question was, Whether the said Patton owed any debts previous to the year 1807, and to what amount? To this he answered, that previous to the year 1807 he understood the said Patton owed a debt to John Laird, which he understood was about 2000 dollars. To another question, he made this answer: "In the spring of the year before mr. Patton died, I was consulted by him, stating he had been importuned by the bank of Alexandria, the plaintiffs, to make an answer to a bill (that they had dictated) that he was indebted to persons in a considerable amount previous to March 1807, and upon such an answer they would give them longer indulgence. I told him, if he did make such an answer, and I was ever called upon in a court of justice, I should most certainly contradict him; that I knew his circumstances at the time, and well recollected our conversation when he executed a deed to one Stewart and myself for the estate of Spring bank, and that he only owed the debt due to mr. Laird, as before stated. He was in expectation, by getting indulgence, to be enabled to pay off the debt due to the bank of Alexandria from some other resources. I never understood, until after his death, that he had made the answer required by the said bank of Alexandria."

Richard Veitch, in answer to the first question propounded to him, deposed, that during the period therein *mentioned, to wit, from September 1805 to April 1807, he had many transactions in business with the said Robert Patton junior; that he was in possession of a large property, real and personal; that his circumstances and credit were by the deponent considered very good, and he believes were generally so considered. In answer to the second question asked him, he deposed, that from the year 1807 until many years after, the said Patton was in good credit, and in the year 1815 deponent took his notes for a considerable amount, payable at different periods, which were regularly paid. In answer to the third question he said, he had no knowledge of the said Patton's owing any debts previous to the year 1807.

On the 16th of April 1830, John Stanard, marshal of the court, was appointed guardian of the infant defendants in the place of the said Ann C. Patton, who had died.

In September 1830 and August 1831, depositions were taken on behalf of the plaintiffs, and some documents, exhibited therewith. But it is unnecessary to state in detail the evidence so introduced by the plaintiffs. It was, "for the most part, of a loose, indirect and unsatisfactory description." And though it "tended somewhat to shew that the grantor (Robert Patton junior), from the nature of his engagements and connexions in business, had reason to apprehend a disastrous turn in his affairs," yet it was deemed by the court of appeals, as well as the court of chancery, "too vague and inconclusive to justify the imputation of fraud."

Under the judicial act of April 16, 1831, (Sess. Acts 1830-31, p. 73, ch. 11, § 97,) the cause was transferred to the circuit court of Spotsylvania.

On the 8th of September 1831, it came on before that court to be heard upon its merits, and the court, on consideration thereof, decreed that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed, and that they pay to the defendants their costs.

From this decree an appeal was allowed.

515 *Pending this appeal, the charter of the bank of Alexandria expired. By an act of congress of the 25th of February 1836, the charter was extended, continued and limited to the fourth day of March 1839. Sess. Acts 1835-6, p. 16. And by an act of the 5th of July 1838, the charter was further extended to the 4th of March 1841. Sess. Acts 1837-8, p. 97.

In February 1842, the counsel for the appellees, alleging that the corporation had become extinct, moved for an order directing the abatement of the appeal. This motion was argued before a full court, by Patton and Harrison in its support, and by C. and G. N. Johnson against it.

Patton for the appellees. "Nothing can be more obvious," (as is remarked by judge Tucker in Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 155,) "than the impossibility of proceeding with a suit, however well brought, where there are no parties before the court, or where one of them is no more, and has not and cannot have any person to represent him. If this be the case where the charter of a corporation has expired or been dissolved, it must follow that the appeal, and the suit itself, must abate." It is as undeniable here that there is no person capable of representing the bank of Alexandria, as it was in that case that there was no person capable of representing the Union factory. And the rule is applicable in this case, which was laid down in that, that where the charter of a corporation expires during the pendency of an appeal, the appeal must abate, whether the corporation be appellant or appellee.

G. N. Johnson for the appellants. Under the authority of the stockholders of the bank, the debt to the bank which is the subject of this suit, and other debts due to it, were assigned to trustees before the 4th of March 1841, and the deed containing that

516 assignment is ready to be shewn to the court. While therefore it *may be, that but for this assignment the court would direct the appeal to abate, because of there being no person in existence having right to claim, yet there would be an obvious impropriety in directing such abatement here. It was never doubted, in the case of the bank of the United States, that the transfer made by it before the expiration of its charter, prevented its rights from being extinguished. The only question is as to the remedy. Now the general rule in equity is, that where a right in litigation is assigned, the assignee is entitled to continue the suit. 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 519. And there is no reason why the rule should be different in an appellate court. In ordinary cases, where the assignor dies, and has a representative, there is no necessity to notice the assignment. In this case, one of two modes should be adopted; either the fact of the expiration of the charter should not be noticed, or there should be some process or rule on behalf of the assignees. Otherwise an acknowledged right will be defeated. For if the appeal abates, there can be no remedy in a court of original jurisdiction, the decree of the court below being against the corporation. That decree may be clearly erroneous, but unless the error be corrected in the appellate court, no relief can be given the assignees elsewhere. Nor is there necessity for legislation. This court has plenary power over its process and proofs, without any farther legislative act. Its power to award all reviving and other process is recognized by the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 194, ch. 64, § 17, without any limitation as to the nature of the process. It may be for every requisite purpose. Id. p. 192, § 11. And by the act of 1831 it was provided that all process consequent upon appeals should be regulated by the laws and usages then in force and in practice. Sess. Acts 1830-31, p. 53, ch. 11, § 31; Supp. to Rev. Code p. 149. The judges may direct the form of writs in such manner as they shall deem advisable.

517 1 R. C. *1819, p. 195, ch. 64, § 23. And the process should be moulded and regulated to effect justice. There is analogous legislation. No suit in equity now abates by the death or marriage of the plaintiff, but it may, on motion without notice, be conducted in the name of the heir, devisee, executor or administrator of the deceased plaintiff, or the husband of the feme plaintiff. Sess. Acts 1825-6, p. 15, ch. 15, § 2; Supp. to Rev. Code p. 130. No suit at law or in equity in the name of a curator or committee of an estate will abate by the grant of letters testamentary, or of administration, on that estate. Sess. Acts 1839, p. 42, ch. 66, § 1. In Paradise's adm'rs v. Cole &c., 6 Munf. 218, a suit at law against a committee was revived against the administrators of the insane person's estate. How shall the court of appeals effect the object in this case? A scire facias is frequently at law in the nature of an action, Winter &c. v. Kretchman, 2 T. R. 45, and in equity is analogous to a supplemental bill or bill of revivor. It may state the fact of marriage, death, devise, descent or bankruptcy, involving issues of law or fact. And though it is not usual, yet there is no reason why an assignee may not have a scire facias, even in an appellate court. Bankruptcy is a case of assignment by operation of law. 1 Bac. Abr. title Bankrupt. letter F. And in a case of bankruptcy, a scire facias is frequently requisite. The rule is, that a scire facias lies where a new person is to be benefited or charged. 2 Tidd's Pract. 1166. There may in this case be no necessity for a scire facias; but if so, a refusal to abate the appeal is proper. There is no valid objection to establishing the fact of assignment by evidence out of the record. The court may examine such evidence and pass upon it, on the principle recognized in Ersine v. Henry &c., 6 Leigh 384, 5, and Hite's heirs v. Wilson &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 268. And when it finds the fact of the assignment established, it may suffer the appeal to *continue in the name of the corporation. There is no necessity, in any case, to revive in this court: where there is no revival here, any further proceedings which are requisite may be had in the court below, after the decision here. In England, if the plaintiff in error die after errors assigned, it does not abate the writ; and in no case does the writ abate there by death of the defendant in error, whether the death happen before or after the errors assigned. 2 Tidd's Pract. 1219, 20; 2 Archb. Pract. 1204. According to our practice, the assignment of errors is in the petition for the appeal. If in England, where an appellant becomes bankrupt, and is thus divested of his interest in the subject and his capacity to sue for it, the proceedings may nevertheless be conducted in the appellate court in his name, there can be no valid objection, where a corporation is appellant and the charter expires pending the appeal, to permitting the proceedings to be continued in the corporate name. The decision in Buckner & wife v. Blair, 2 Munf. 336, is a strong one against the necessity of any revival in the court of appeals; for the provision in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 498, ch. 128, § 38, that if a party die between verdict and judgment, the judgment shall be entered as if both parties were living, is obviously intended for the court below, and cannot dispense with a revival in the appellate court, if such revival would have been necessary in case the death had occurred after judgment. Where, too, a party dies after his cause is argued in this court, there is no revival here.

C. Johnson on the same side. In the case of Rider v. The Union Factory, there was no right to reverse the decree, because it could have been of no consequence to reverse it. But here it is suggested that there has been an assignment, and the assignees assert their right to have the correctness of the decree against the validity of the claim enquired into. Can it be possible that the right derived from the corporation while it was *existing, is extinguished because the charter has expired? And if the right be not extinguished, what is the remedy proposed for it by the counsel on the other side? There must be some peculiar defect, if in such a case there be no remedy at all. [Stanard, J. Suppose the decree of the court below had been in favour of the bank, instead of against it, and an abatement were entered here?] That shews conclusively the unsoundness of the position taken on the other side; for in such a case, the appeal being abated, the decree would remain in force, and might be carried into execution upon a bill by the assignee. When the fact of assignment is urged against the motion to abate, the court may receive and decide upon all evidence adduced in regard to the fact. This is a jurisdiction which arises out of its very existence, and which it must have for the preservation and protection of its powers. When, however, the fact of assignment is ascertained, there is no necessity for a revival in the court of appeals: no law requires it; the law is only permissive. From the terms of the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 497, ch. 128, § 38, it is manifest that it does not apply to the appellate court; and if it did apply, the act provides that the suit shall not abate. Our statutes not requiring a revival, the argument from the english practice is conclusive. There, after a plaintiff in error becomes bankrupt, the assignees still go on with the writ of error in the bankrupt's name. Kretchman v. Beyer, 1 T. R. 463. And this appeal may proceed equally well in the name of the corporation. If there were any difficulty upon a supersedeas to a judgment at law, there can be none upon an appeal from a decree in equity.

Harrison in reply. A perfect stranger to the record claims to come here and take advantage of new matter, only available by an original bill. This court has no right to create a new remedy, not given by the common *law or by statute. Any proceeding in the court below by a new party, introducing new matter, would necessarily be by an original bill. On what principle is it that the assignees claim to come here, and be relieved from the necessity of proceeding as they would have to do below? How can they be heard here ore tenus and by evidence, when they could not be heard in that way below? It is true, this court has a right to enquire into matters necessary for the continuance of its jurisdiction. But it can only decide between living parties; its orders and judgments are void in case of death. The cases cited on the other side do not involve the question of right. Here the court is called upon to exercise a new original jurisdiction, and determine upon the validity of a new right claimed to have arisen since the decree of the court below. Suppose the appellant were a natural person, and were dead without a representative; would the court take notice of one claiming to be his assignee? In Tolson v. Elwes, 1 Leigh 436, it was held that a motion against a sheriff for money made under execution, by the party entitled to it, could not be sustained, because he was no party to the record. If the subject recovered were real estate, and the party recovering had died without heirs, could the court take jurisdiction for the appellant? At common law, in cases of abatement, it was necessary there should be a new original, or new action. And now, in personal actions or suits, if there be no personal representative, the case must abate. The judgment of this court would be a nullity, after the extinction of the corporation: it could not be revived by any process, nor entered in the court below; if the decree be reversed, the court below must treat the reversal as a nullity. The scire facias suggested would be an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill. There is no instance of a scire facias for a stranger, except in bankruptcy. In bankruptcy, the assignees have a right *to use the name of the bankrupt. But if the bankrupt dies before judgment, the revival must be in the name of his personal representative.

STANARD, J. The appellees, alleging that the appellants as a corporation have become extinct pending this appeal, by the expiration of the term of their incorporation, have moved for an order directing the abatement of the appeal. In opposition to this it is suggested, that during the corporate existence of the appellants, they made an assignment of their rights in the subject involved in this case; and on behalf of the assignees it is insisted that the appeal should not be abated, but should be heard and decided in the names of the parties to the appeal, or that if the expiration of the charter of the appellants preclude the hearing of the case, and to that hearing a revivor in the name of some existing person, legal or natural, be necessary, process of revivor should issue in the name of the assignees. The appellees, without conceding the fact of the assignment, contend that the case cannot proceed but in the names of existing parties, and must be abated unless it can be revived in such names; and that it cannot be revived in the names of assignees claiming to be such by act in pais; that of such fact this court cannot take judicial cognizance, as it is matter for supplemental bill in the nature of an original bill. Without ascertaining the fact of the assignment (for it would be useless to enquire into that fact if the appellees be right) the questions arising on the motion have been discussed, and the opinion of the court sought on the matters of law and practice they involve, leaving the fact for further investigation, should the opinion of the court on the matters of law and practice render such investigation necessary.

The questions, then, for solution on this motion are, 1. Is it indispensably necessary to the hearing and decision of an appeal, that it should be revived in the name of existing parties, legal or natural? 2. If not, can the court enquire into a fact in pais, to shew that such appeal ought to proceed to hearing and decision without such revivor; and is the fact of assignment to parties who cannot revive, sufficient to shew that the appeal ought to be so proceeded in? 3. If such revivor be necessary, may the parties claiming as assignees be allowed to revive?

Proceedings in error have never been subjected to the rules that govern the proceedings in the original suit, in respect to abatements and revivors.

Until the statute of 1806 was passed, an original suit was abated by the death of either party before interlocutory judgment, and could not be continued by or against the representative; and prior to the statute of 1792, the case had been the same even where the death occurred after interlocutory judgment. (See 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 497, ch. 128, § 38, and 1 Rev. Code of 1814, p. 153, [110,] ch. 76, § 20.) But appeals and writs of error did not abate by the death of either party. The other party, or the representative of the deceased might in such case revive the appeal or writ of error, by scire facias. And the general rule of practice in this court required such revivor preliminary to the hearing and decision of the case. But even this general rule of practice did not require such revivor at the time of the judgment or decree of this court, if the death had occurred subsequent to the argument. And if an appeal was taken from a judgment in favour of a party dead at the time of the judgment, no process from this court was required to make the representative of the decedent a party by name to the appeal.

I have no doubt that the practice of this court was settled in analogy to proceedings in error in England, with modifications however of that practice, which considerations of convenience suggested. According to the practice in England, the proceedings in error abated if the plaintiff in error died before the assignment of errors. If the plaintiff's death occurred after the assignment of errors, then the defendant was bound to join issue on the assignment, and proceed to have the judgment affirmed, if not erroneous; and this without a scire facias against the representatives of the plaintiff in error. But the death of the defendant in error did not abate the writ, whether it happened before or after assignment of errors. If before, then the plaintiff in error might make the executors or administrators parties by scire facias ad audiendum errores, and thereby compel a joinder in error. But if the defendant died after the assignment of errors, the case proceeded until judgment of the court of error, as if the defendant were living. 1 Arch. Prac. 216, and cases there cited.

According to our practice, some of the predicaments provided for by the English practice did not occur; for by it, in all cases now, as in all cases before the organization of the courts under the new constitution, where the supersedeas, writ of error or appeal was allowed on application to the court of appeals or a judge thereof, the errors are assigned at the time of the allowance of the supersedeas, writ of error or appeal: and had our practice been framed in strict conformity to the English practice, no scire facias would have been necessary on account of the death of either party after the case got into this court. Our practice however, as before stated, has required a scire facias against or in favour of the executor or administrator, on the death of either the plaintiff or defendant in error. But this must necessarily be confined to those cases in which it is practicable to sue out such scire facias, and admitted of exceptions even where it was practicable, as in the case of death between the hearing and judgment. We then ascertain that the objection to proceeding in error unless there be existing parties, legal or natural, at the time of hearing and judgment, is not insuperable.

The extinction of one of the parties without any legal representative or succession, would, if standing alone, forbid further proceedings, because all such proceedings must, from the very fact of such extinction, be wholly abortive. And were this case so situated, the case of Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, is a distinct and precise authority in favour of the motion. But here a suggestion is made, that the rights involved in this case passed by assignment to living persons before the legal extinction of the party on the record, and that if this case be proceeded in, and those rights be sustained by the judgment of the court, such judgment will not be abortive, but may be enforced by and for the assignees: and the question is, can this court take notice of the fact of assignment, as a consideration to influence the exercise of its discretion to proceed, though the assignees are not or cannot be made parties by scire facias?

If such an assignment has been made, I do not doubt that the right, legal or equitable, which passes to the assignees by it, is in no degree impaired by the subsequent dissolution of the corporation that made the assignment. As such a right may be in the assignees by virtue of the assignment, the power of this court to make a provisional enquiry whether the fact of assignment exists, as a guide for its action on the question propounded by the motion, is inherent in the very nature of the power that the motion proposes to call into action; if that fact being ascertained should influence the exercise of the discretion to which the motion is addressed, provided such right would be jeopardized by one course, and no right on either side be compromised by the other.

Suppose this appeal should be abated; then the error (if any) in the decree of the court below is not open to the correction of this court, and the counsel on neither side has suggested a mode by which it can be corrected, or the judgment of the appellate court be had on it. I should very reluctantly sanction the united propositions, that the case cannot proceed here without revivor, that it cannot be revived and must be abated, and that the error, (if any) in the decree cannot be corrected by any proceedings that the party whose rights are or may be affected by it, may institute. Look to the consequences of the maintenance of these propositions. They leave the decree of the court below in full vigour, however erroneous it may be, and deny the application of the correcting hand of this court, or any other, to the error. Suppose the decree had been for a large sum of money in favour of the then existing but now dissolved corporation, and that after the decree, and before or after the allowance of the appeal, the corporation still existing had assigned the decree. The dissolution of the corporation pending the appeal would furnish the same inexorable necessity for the abatement of the appeal as now exists. Such abatement would leave the decree in force, and the appellants liable to be charged with it by the assignees, in like manner as though no appeal had been allowed: the decree might be enforced at the instance of the assignees, and the parties charged by it might have no means of correcting the error, however gross. Such a consequence infers the unsoundness of the argument or pretension that leads to it. Without saying that there is no other remedy to protect the rights that may arise out of the suggested assignment, against the effect of the error (if there be one) in the decree, the most compendious means of giving that protection is to permit the case to proceed without notice of the dissolution of the corporation appellant, if that be within the power of the court: and

526 *The other judges concurred.

Whereupon (the fact of the assignment by the bank not being now further controverted) the cause came on to be heard upon its merits, before the president and judges Brooke, Allen and Baldwin,† and was elaborately argued by C. and G. N. Johnson for the appellants, and Patton and Harrison for the appellees.

*Note by the reporter. The case of the State Bank of North Carolina v. Cowan &c., 8 Leigh 238, was an action of debt brought by the bank, in which the circuit court gave judgment for the defendants, and the court of appeals in April 1837 reversed that judgment and rendered judgment for the bank. After the judgment of the court of appeals, execution issued in favour of the bank against the defendants Cowan, May, Smith and Jones, which was levied on the goods of May, and he gave a forthcoming bond with surety, which was forfeited. When a motion was made on the forfeited forthcoming bond, the defendants produced evidence shewing that the charter of the bank had expired pending the appeal, to wit, on the 1st of January 1835, and on this ground asked the court to quash the forthcoming bond, and the execution under which it was taken. But it appearing that the judgment on which the execution issued was entered in the circuit court on the 12th of May 1837, in pursuance of the judgment of the court of appeals, and that the execution was in strict conformity to that judgment, the circuit court overruled the motion to quash, and rendered judgment on the bond. On a supersedeas to this judgment, the court of appeals (JUDGES BROOKE, STANARD and ALLEN concurring) reversed the judgment of the circuit court, and entered judgment quashing the execution and forthcoming bond. BALDWIN, J., dissented, on the ground that it was incompetent to the defendants to shew that the charter had expired at a period anterior to the judgment of the court of appeals. The three other judges, not regarding that judgment as ascertaining the continued existence of the corporation at its date, held that the execution issued illegally in favour of a corporation whose charter was shewn by the evidence to have expired. This decision was in May 1848, and the case will be found under the name of May &c. v. The State Bank of North Carolina, in reports of that period.

†JUDGE STANARD had been counsel for the appellees, and was unwilling to sit in the case when its merits were to be considered.—Note in Original Edition.

BALDWIN, J. The appellants seek to set aside the voluntary settlement made by Robert Patton upon his wife and children; and claim the right to do so in the 527 *character of subsequent creditors, and also in that of subsequent purchasers. Let us first examine their pretensions as creditors.

In the case of Hutchison and others v. Kelly, ante, p. 123, I had occasion to examine the principles upon which, under the statute against fraudulent alienations, conveyances are treated as fraudulent and void in regard to creditors; and to express the opinion, that the statute of 13 Elizabeth, ch. 5, from which so much of ours as relates to that subject is substantially taken, looks mainly to the intent with which the act is done, and if that be fraudulent avoids it, not only as against creditors who are actually, but also against those who might be disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded; thus treating creditors as a class of persons entitled to the protection of the law, and embracing not only those existing at the time, but moreover subsequent creditors: that where there are no existing creditors, the fraudulent intent, if conceived, must of course be prospective, with a view to future indebtedness; but that where directed against existing creditors, it operates also in relation to those subsequently arising, a fraudulent intent as to one or more creditors being fraudulent as to all: that upon the question of fraudulent intent, the courts have of necessity resorted to a legal presumption arising out of the general nature of the case, and to marks or badges of fraud furnished by the particular circumstances: that the legal presumption is founded upon a comparison of the consideration for the conveyance, with that which constitutes the just claims of creditors; and though voluntary conveyances are not mentioned in the statute, their true character and effect are necessarily involved in its application: and that the legal presumption of an alleged fraudulent intent arises where the conveyance is voluntary, though meritorious, if the grantor be indebted at the time, but is only prima facie, and may be repelled

528 or confirmed *by the particular circumstances of the case; but is rendered conclusive, if the debts be unsecured, by a degree of indebtedness amounting to or approaching insolvency. For the reasoning and authorities that were relied on to sustain these propositions, I must refer to the reported case; and I recur to them now with the view of ascertaining how far they are applicable to the case before us.

In the present case, it will be seen from an inspection of the bill, that it does not charge a fraudulent intent against the plaintiffs or any other subsequent creditors of the grantor; nor even a fraudulent intent in point of fact against his creditors existing at the time of the settlement: but, merely averring that the settlement was voluntary, and made when the grantor was greatly indebted, relies upon the supposed inevitable conclusion, that in point of law it is fraudulent and void against the plaintiffs and all his other creditors, whether prior or subsequent to the conveyance. The bill, moreover, does not even allege that the plaintiffs have in fact been disturbed, delayed or hindered in the recovery of their demand; and all the circumstances of the case shew that no such impediment has been occasioned by the settlement in question. On the contrary, the delay has been altogether voluntary on the part of the plaintiffs, and occasioned by the course of conduct which they have thought proper to pursue in relation to the subject. The bill, in stating the original debt to the plaintiffs, goes no further back than the 27th of April 1811, the date of the deed of trust executed by Patton and wife to W. Herbert, to secure any sum or sums of money then, or which thereafter might be, due from Patton to the president and directors of the bank: which deed conveys the Spring bank tract of land, embraced in the settlement in question, and also two other tracts of land, one of them conveyed to Patton by Hepburn in April 1809, and the other conveyed to 529 *him by Scott and others in June 1810.

It appears from the recital of this trust deed, that the bank had already been secured on the same account, by Patton's conveyance in trust to the same W. Herbert, about a month previously, of 2000 dollars worth of stock in the Farmers bank of Alexandria, and other property; in lieu of which he was permitted to substitute the security last furnished.

I think there can be no doubt, that at the time of the making of this trust deed of the 27th of April 1811, the plaintiffs had notice of the deed from Patton to Sanderson and Stewart, and the deed from them to Mrs. Patton and her children, the former of the 20th and the latter of the 21st of March 1807; which two deeds constitute the voluntary settlement now impeached. The property, real and personal, which was the subject of that settlement had, at the date of the trust deed, been conveyed to the trustee W. Herbert, by an absolute deed of the 10th of April 1811, executed by Patton and wife, but not perfected by the privy examination of the latter, which deed expressly refers to the deed from Sanderson and Stewart. In all probability, the deed of the 10th of April was intended to divest the right acquired by Mrs. Patton under the settlement, in order that it might be reconveyed by Herbert to Patton, and by him conveyed in trust for the bank; for we find that such a reconveyance was made by Herbert, but by some mistake is posterior in date to the trust deed. However this may be, it is manifest that Herbert, the trustee, had notice of the settlement: and without relying upon the legal inference from that fact, of notice to the bank, the fact itself, taken in connexion with the due recordation of the deeds of settlement, and the attestation of them by several eminent professional gentlemen of the town of Alexandria, one of whom is also a witness to the trust deed, renders it extremely improbable that the 530 plaintiffs were ignorant of the existence *of those deeds; and every doubt upon the subject must be removed by the silence of the plaintiffs, who make no pretence of such ignorance in their bill, though it would have been a material circumstance, if the voluntary settlement had been concealed from them, and they induced to trust the grantor upon the faith of property embraced therein.

The bill gives no information of the intermediate dealings between the plaintiffs and Patton, from the date of the trust deed of the 27th of April 1811, until the procurement of that of the 29th of September 1824, executed by Patton and wife to Colin Auld and Robert J. Taylor as trustees, conveying the same property, to secure the amount therein stated to be due from Patton to the bank, of 8920 dollars 60 cents principal, with some interest. After this delay of the plaintiffs in the prosecution of their original demand, of between 13 and 14 years, a further, and, I would think, unusual forbearance for a bank towards its debtor was stipulated by the terms of the last deed; which gave indulgence for the whole debt for three years, with the privilege of extending it, in part, to seven, by paying up one third at the expiration of the three years, and one half of the remainder at the expiration of five. This new indulgence, thus made the subject of contract, though granted without any additional security, was not, it seems, without a new consideration intended to enure to the benefit of the plaintiffs. There is abundant reason to believe it was connected with an arrangement, by which the debtor was to act in concert with the bank, for the purpose of getting rid of any future adverse claim on the part of the grantees in the settlement in question. It will be seen from the provisions of the last incumbrance, that it was not contemplated the settlement should be wholly avoided, but only postponed to the lien of the bank, and subject to that lien, rendered more effectual to the grantees; for it was *stipulated, that Patton and his wife, and their representatives, should retain possession and receive the rents and profits of the property conveyed, without account, "according to their respective interests therein at the time of the execution of this deed;" and also that no sale should be made of the Spring bank tract of land (the one embraced in the deeds of settlement) until the other two tracts should have been first sold, and the proceeds thereof ascertained to be insufficient; and moreover that if Patton or his executors &c. should, at any time before sale made, pay off the whole amount of the debt &c. or if the same should be raised from the sale of the other tracts, or in part so raised, and Mrs. Patton or any of her children, or any one in their behalf, should pay the balance which should be due to the bank, then that the trustees should thenceforth hold the Spring bank tract to the sole and separate use of Mrs. Patton for her life, free from the power and control of her husband, and after her death to the use of the children of herself and her husband, with a power of appointment on her part of their respective interests.

This suit was instituted on the 22d of March 1825, about six months after the execution of the last trust deed, and two years and six months before the expiration of the stipulated forbearance. The bill contains no specific prayer for the sale of the property by a decree of the court. Though it states that "the just claim of the plaintiffs to have the tract of land called Spring bank subjected to the payment of their debt, is resisted on the ground that it had been previously conveyed" by the deeds of settlement, it does not state by whom such resistance is made, or that any obstacle is thereby presented to the enforcement of the trust by the trustees. If it were proper to infer such an obstacle from that loose statement, as existing in regard to the Spring bank tract, none such could have existed in relation to the other two tracts, and

532 no reason is assigned *for not subjecting them to sale in the first instance, nor is it alleged that those two tracts were not of sufficient value to produce the amount due, or that Patton had refused or was unable to make payment, or that any legal measures had been resorted to for the purpose of coercing it. And the only specific prayers in the bill (besides those merely formal) are, that Patton may say in his answer, "whether the deed of the 21st of March 1807, from himself to James Sanderson and William Stewart, was not entered into without consideration, and with a view to have the property therein mentioned settled upon his wife and children; and whether at the date of that deed he was not largely indebted to many persons: and that the said deed, and the deed of the same date from the said Sanderson and Stewart to Mrs. Ann Clifton Patton and her children, may be decreed, as against your complainants, who are both creditors and purchasers, fraudulent and null and void; and that the land called Spring bank may be made or left subject to the just and legal lien and incumbrance, which the bank of Alexandria or your complainants have upon it."

Thus it will be seen that the object of the suit was not to coerce payment of the debt, but to render the incumbrance therefor paramount to the title of the grantees in the settlement. This was not in conflict with the individual interest of the grantor; and on the other hand he could not, either at the date of the incumbrance or in the progress of the cause, resist the wishes of the bank on this subject, without forfeiting all claim to further forbearance, though he might hope that an extended indulgence might enable him to relieve himself from his difficulties, without ultimate injustice to his family. We see from the bill, drawn with a studied avoidance of offensive imputations, that the plaintiffs sought to obtain from him an admission which they thought would subserve their purpose;

533 and his *answer shews that they were not disappointed. He does admit in his answer (filed for himself and wife) that at the date of the voluntary settlement, "he did owe sundry debts, some of them of considerable amount;" an admission too broad, as will be presently seen, for the facts of the case, and against the making of which he was warned by the witness Sanderson, who swears that he was well acquainted with his circumstances at that period, and that he told him, that if called upon as a witness, he would have to contradict him. An answer was moreover procured from a guardian ad litem for the infant grantees, who had been appointed on the motion of the plaintiffs, which is of an extraordinary character; for the drift of it is to impugn rather than sustain the rights of those defendants.

This state of the case was quite unfavourable to the grantees, and no active defence was made on their part until the death of Patton, when a new aspect was given to the cause. The guardian ad litem was removed by an order of the court, and Mrs. Patton, then sui juris, appointed in his stead; and she was permitted to answer de novo, as well for herself as the infant defendants: and Mrs. Mason, the only adult amongst the children, and who had formerly answered with her husband, by leave of the court filed her separate answer. And the parties, for the first time, proceeded to the examination of evidence.

The foregoing views have not been presented for the purpose of shewing that if the plaintiffs have made out their case upon the merits, by establishing the settlement of 1807 to be fraudulent and void against the creditors of the grantor, relief should be denied them because of a defective structure of their bill, or of the course of conduct they have pursued, either before or since the institution of this suit. My purpose has not been to go into the consideration of any such questions; but merely to deduce, from the facts I have stated, the two following propositions:

534 *1. The plaintiffs not having charged in their bill that the settlement was made with a fraudulent intent in point of fact, they must prove the averments relied on by them as warranting the conclusion that the transaction was fraudulent and void by intendment of law; and instead of relying upon a prima facie presumption from mere indebtedness, to throw the burthen of proof on the opposite party, ought to establish such an extent of indebtedness and inadequacy of resources, as will serve to shew that the grantor, at the time of the settlement, was in a condition amounting to or approaching insolvency.

2. The plaintiffs having notice of the voluntary settlement, and instead of resorting to legal proceedings for the purpose of placing themselves in an attitude to complain of being delayed, hindered or defrauded thereby, (Colman v. Croker, 1 Ves. jun. 160,) having, by taking their first incumbrance, assumed the settlement to be fraudulent; and instead of proceeding to enforce that incumbrance, as they were authorized by its terms to do, within a reasonable time, so as to give those claiming under the settlement an opportunity to assert and prove its validity, having continued to indulge and deal with the grantor for a number of years; and having thereafter taken a second incumbrance on the same property, by which they bound themselves to extend still further forbearance; and having, by a combination with the grantor, enlisted him against the interests of his own family, whose disabilities required his protection; these circumstances furnish a strong presumption against the pretensions of the plaintiffs, which ought to be overcome by unobjectionable and plenary proofs on their part.

If these propositions be correct, the merits of the plaintiffs' cause, in their character of creditors, will require but a brief consideration. Let us first dispose of the admissions in the pleadings on the part of 535 the defendants. *If the admissions in the answer of Patton be evidence against his grantees, as to which, in such a case as this, I express no opinion, still I can give no weight to them, for reasons already suggested. As to the separate answer of Mrs. Mason and the previous joint answer of herself and husband, they put the most material allegations of the bill in issue. But there is an admission in the answer of Mrs. Patton, filed for herself and as guardian ad litem for the infant defendants, which seems to require a cursory notice. After denying that her husband was involved in debt at the time of the settlement, and alleging on the contrary that he was in unembarrassed and prosperous circumstances, and able to meet all his engagements, she admits that he owed at that time a debt to John Laird of Georgetown, on which a balance still remained due, including interest, of about 1200 dollars. This admission she does not profess to make on her own personal knowledge, and we need not enquire how far it was correct; for though it might conclude her in her lifetime, and her representatives after her death, it could not affect the other grantees, as they do not claim under her; and it cannot be used against them as having been made by their guardian ad litem, for no rule is better settled than that an answer of an infant by guardian cannot be read against him at all, for any purpose. 2 Madd. Ch. Pract. 278; Mitf. Plead. 314, 315; 1 Stark. Ev. Pt. II. p. 278.

Let us now briefly advert to the evidence which has been examined in relation to the degree of the grantor's indebtedness, and the extent of his resources. And it is remarkable that the testimony establishes only a single debt as due from him at the date of the settlement, to wit, a debt of £678. 11. sterling money, to the above mentioned John Laird. It was material for the plaintiffs to prove, if they could, not only that this debt was subsisting at the date of the voluntary settlement, but that it has

 536 to impeach *the settlement depended, under the circumstances of the case,
 upon the question whether it was fraudulent and void against creditors then existing.
 Now, if it was fraudulent and void against such creditors, though it follows that it would also be liable to be so treated by subsequent creditors, and that the mere fact of the debtor afterwards paying off the demands of the former would not render the transaction valid as to the latter, yet it would be a circumstance entitled to weight upon the question of fraud. That the debt to Laird remained unpaid, if such was the fact, the plaintiffs had not only the complete power to prove, but it lay directly in their way to prove it; for they examined Laird as a witness in their behalf; and he deposed that Patton owed him about the year 1806, and several years afterwards; the debt above mentioned. But there they suffered the examination to rest; and the reasonable inference from his deposition surely is, that the debt was in some way discharged, some years after 1806; the more especially when we couple with his evidence the presumption arising from the great lapse of time, and his failure to assert a demand. It is not easy to account for the language of his deposition, and his quies-cence, but by the supposition that the debt has been either paid or secured to him.
 Such may not be the fact, but it is the legiti-mate deduction from the evidence, which cannot be repelled by the admissions above noticed.

But if it were even granted that the debt to Laird still remains unsatisfied, the evidence is far from establishing that Patton was at the time of the settlement insolvent or greatly embarrassed in his circumstances.
 On the contrary, I think it is proved that he was then, and for several years afterwards, able to meet all his engagements; the owner of property to a considerable amount; in good credit and extensive business; having the command of large sums of money; and unindebted except to 537 *been a most indulgent and even careless creditor. The plaintiffs have introduced a good deal of evidence, for the most part of a loose, indirect, and unsatisfactory description, tending somewhat to shew that the grantor, from the nature of his engagements and connexions in business, had reason to apprehend a disastrous turn in his affairs; from which it has been argued that the purpose of the settlement was to make some provision for his family and himself against the misfortunes which afterwards fell upon him. But this evidence is too vague and inconclusive to justify the imputation of fraud, the more especially upon a bill which charges no fraudulent intent in point of fact. And though there are circumstances in the matter, the manner and the details of the settlement, calculated to attract the vigilance of suspicion, and which have been laid hold of and handled by the appellants' counsel with great address and ability, they will be found upon examination to be more imposing than substantial. It is manifest that there was no secret trust in favour of the grantor, nor even an immediate benefit secured to the grantees; and no disguise as to the nature and effect of the conveyances.

 The deed to Sanderson and Stewart was avowedly without consideration, and merely to avoid the formal difficulty of a direct conveyance from the husband to the wife; and their conveyance to her, being without the intervention of a trustee, of course subjected the property, during the marriage, to the marital rights, dominion and control of the husband, and, to the extent of her estate in the subject, to the legal process of his creditors. His continuance in possession was not inconsistent but perfectly compatible with the title; and the use and enjoyment of the property, even of those portions of it which would necessarily be consumed in the use, (subordinate however to the remedies of his creditors) was a legitimate incident of his limited

538 *interest. In this respect the case of Parker v. Proctor, 9 Mass. Rep. 393, was far stronger than this; for there the continuance in possession of the grantor, he being the father and natural guardian of the infant grantee, was not considered indicative of fraud, though otherwise inconsistent with the terms of the deed. The circumstance, therefore, that the deed was to the wife and children, instead of a trustee for them, is not a mark of fraud, but the reverse; since if a fraud was contemplated, it must have been in securing the property to the grantor's family after his death, against his creditors, without intermediate advantage to himself; a design which, though not impossible, must be admitted to be of but rare occurrence. A circumstance, moreover, not without its weight in estimating the fairness of the transaction, is the due and prompt recordation of the deeds, (Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. 251), besides the attestation of them by highly intelligent and respectable witnesses; thereby precluding the idea of intended concealment.

The foregoing views of the question have led me to the conclusion, that the preten-sions of the plaintiffs in their character of creditors cannot be sustained. It remains for me to notice their pretensions in the character of purchasers.

The plaintiffs, as incumbrancers, can stand upon no higher ground than absolute purchasers who have paid a full consideration and received a direct conveyance of the property. There is no charge in the bill that they were induced to become incum-brancers by the fraud of Patton, or that they had not notice, at the time, of the settlement he had made upon his wife and children. The naked question is therefore presented to this court, for the first time, whether a voluntary conveyance of that kind is fraudulent and void in regard to a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration, who had notice thereof at the time of his purchase.

alienations is contained in the 2d section of the "act to prevent frauds and perjuries," 1 R. C. p. 372, ch. 101, and is a condensation into one joint enactment, of the most important provisions as well of the statute 27 Eliz. ch. 4, in regard to purchasers, as of the statute 13 Eliz. ch. 5, in regard to creditors. In the construction however of our statute, it must be considered distributively; there being material points of distinction arising out of the difference between the two subjects, to wit, frauds against creditors and frauds against purchasers. Fraudulent conveyances in relation to purchasers must in the nature of things be exclusively prospective, as they cannot be directed against existing interests, but only against those thereafter to arise. The indebtedness of the grantor at the time of the conveyance is, as we have seen, a material circumstance in reference to even subsequent creditors. But I regard it as wholly immaterial in reference to subsequent purchasers. There is, it is true, a dictum of lord Mansfield to the contrary in Doe v. Routledge, Cowp. 713; and in Holcroft's case, Dyer 294, in note, (cited in Atherley on Marriage Settlements, p. 199, note 1), the circumstance of the grantor's freedom from indebtedness is relied on; and so that idea is expressed in Style 446, (cited in 9 East 63,) and is adopted by baron Gilbert in his law of Evidence, p. 307. But a moment's reflection will serve to shew that the grantor's indebtedness can only be material in regard to creditors; for a fraudulent purpose against them can have no connexion with, or tendency to promote, a fraudulent purpose against a subsequent purchaser. Besides, the reason why a voluntary conveyance is ever regarded as fraudulent against creditors, is, that it withdraws the grantor's property from their preeminent demands; whereas the grantor owes no duty to a purchaser till the relation between them is about to arise; and then his only duty 540 is to abstain *from selling to him what he had previously conveyed away to another. It is the violation of this duty which constitutes the fraud against a subsequent purchaser; and not the mere intent with which the voluntary conveyance is made; for though that is a prominent matter in the statute, it is obviously idle unless it be accomplished, as there must be a purchaser to be defrauded, as well as an intent to defraud; which concurrence amounts to actual fraud.

Thus, according to my reading of the statute, the purchaser must be actually defrauded; and how that can be where he has notice of the prior voluntary conveyance, is altogether beyond my conception. Quod non decipitur qui scit se decipi, is a maxim of law, as well as of common sense; and the disregard of it by the expounders of the law can result in nothing but unqualified mischief. What protection can it afford to a purchaser with notice, to avoid the previous conveyance, except against the consequences of his own officious intermeddling? Was that the mischief intended to be provided for? Most assuredly not. The spirit of the statute is to set aside conveyances by which subsequent purchasers are deceived, and would otherwise be injured; and such is the fair import of its language. It was enough to make void the accomplishment of a fraudulent design on the part of the vendor, directed against the purchaser, and to sacrifice to that object the rights of the voluntary grantee, however innocent of all participation in the covinous purpose. In this result the statute goes beyond the common law, which recognized a conveyance to an innocent grantee, if made for a good consideration, such as natural affection, as paramount to the claim of a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration, though without notice. But it goes no further. It could never have been contemplated to sacrifice the innocent grantee, without necessity, to protect a purchaser who could only be 541 injured *by his own folly or his own injustice. As to a purchaser without notice, the deceitful act of concealing the previous voluntary conveyance may well be referred back to an original fraudulent design on the part of the vendor when he made the conveyance: but when there is no effectual concealment, there is no room for such relation; and if the conveyance be held void, it must be upon the idea that the statute was directed not only against all fraudulent, but against all voluntary conveyances, however fair and meritorious, and was intended to enable the grantor to revoke his grant at pleasure, by means of a combination with a subsequent purchaser. If such had been the intent of the legislature, why was it not directly expressed, instead of leaving so important and comprehensive a provision to a vague and circuitous implication? And why should the courts strain the words of the enactment, upon the imagination of a policy not only absurd but mischievous? It is easy to perceive that the effect of such a construction is to defeat the just expectations of innocent grantees, and of their families and creditors, and to destroy their vested rights and lawful enjoyment, whenever the grantor, from passion or caprice, or the undue influence or improper practices of others, may be induced to recall the provision or advancements he has made, not only upon a meritorious consideration, but in obedience to a sacred duty. I am not prepared for such a result, unless driven to it by an irresistible pressure of authority.

The precise proposition, be it observed, which we are called upon to decide is, that a voluntary settlement of real estate, made, without actual fraud, by the grantor upon his wife and children, is by operation of the statute to be deemed conclusively fraudulent and void, against a subsequent purchaser from him for a valuable consideration, with full notice of the prior conveyance. The negative of this

Ellenborough in Doe v. Manning, 9 East 63, where he reviews the cases, is expressed in some of those nearest to the statute of 27 Elizabeth, but the affirmative has been held by numerous decisions, and must now be regarded as the settled doctrine of the english courts; though a construction condemned by lord Mansfield in Doe v. Routledge, Cowp. 705, and opposed to the opinions of lord Hale, lord Rolle, chief baron Gilbert and chief justice Eyre, as observed by Spencer, J., in Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 555, and which is disapproved, though submitted to, by lord Ellenborough, lord Thurlow, and sir James Mansfield, (Doe v. Manning, above cited; Evelyn v. Templar, 2 Bro. C. C. 149, and Doe v. Martyr, 4 Bos. & Pul. N. R. 335,) and controverted by several respectable writers; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 280, n.; Atherley on Marriage Settlements, p. 196, 197, 198. An examination of the cases will serve to shew, that while the weight of authority decidedly sustains the affirmative construction, it strongly impugns its correctness; for in most if not all the latter cases, the judges yield merely to what they consider the current of adjudication, and though without a struggle, yet not without evident disapprobation or regret. The ruling motive with them is entitled to commendation: they are unwilling to disturb an established error, lest by so doing they should disturb the titles to estates. I think we may safely refuse to adopt it, for the like reason. In Virginia, so far as my information extends, there is no reason to apprehend that any estates are held by so frail a tenure as the expectation of the adoption of an unreasonable and unjust principle, which has never yet received the sanction of our judicial tribunals, nor the approbation of the legal profession. The structure of our society and the habits of our people have led to the surrender and distribution by parents, while living, of portions of their estates amongst their children; and when these are perfected

543 by conveyances *duly registered, the grantees become known to the world as both ostensible and real owners of the property, enjoying all the rights and incidents of ownership. This state of things would be most mischievously affected, both retroactively and prospectively, by the establishment of the doctrine in question: whereas in England the evil has been greatly mitigated by the practice of marriage settlements, in our country as yet almost unknown. It is difficult to believe that our legislature, when they were engaged in 1785, shortly after the consummation of our independence, in condensing and abridging the english statute, thought they were adopting a construction of it not then established by the english courts; the more especially when we find that by the omission of the preamble, and part of the enacting clause, they have stricken from the advocates of the affirmative proposition their most plausible argument, by which the latter have made the proviso to mean directly the contrary of what it expresses. The proviso of the statute 27 Elizabeth, and of our statute, excepts out of the operation of the act conveyances made "for a good consideration and bona fide," while the preamble of the english statute speaks of purchases for money or other good consideration, and the enacting part declares that fraudulent conveyances shall be void against purchasers for money or other good consideration. And from this it has been argued (see Atherley on Marriage Settlements 190, 191), that by the words "good consideration" in the proviso must be understood valuable consideration. I need not consider the weight of this argument, which makes the proviso a mere nullity. It is enough for our purpose, that it has no foundation to rest upon in our statute.

The decisions of the english courts since our separation from the mother country, though entitled to great respect, are not obligatory here. The cases prior to that period are certainly not in harmony; 544 and Spencer, J., *states, in Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 555, (though in opposition to the idea of chancellor Kent, as reported in the case from the court below under the name of Sterry v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. R. 270,) that the preponderance in weight and number is decidedly adverse to the doctrine which now prevails in the courts of Westminster hall. However that may be, in Cathcart &c. v. Robinson, 5 Peters 264, chief justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "There is some contrariety and some ambiguity in the old cases on the subject; but this court conceives that the modern decisions establishing the absolute conclusiveness of a subsequent sale to fix fraud on a family settlement made without valuable consideration—fraud not to be repelled by any circumstances whatever—go beyond the construction which prevailed at the american revolution, and ought not to be followed. The universally received doctrine of that day unquestionably went as far as this: A subsequent sale without notice, by a person who had made a settlement not on valuable consideration, was presumptive evidence of fraud, which threw on those claiming under such settlement the burthen of proving that it was made bona fide. This principle, therefore, according to the uniform course of this court, must be adopted in construing the statute of 27 Elizabeth as it applies to this case." Let this last proposition be conceded, though I express no opinion how far a purchaser might be affected by a culpable negligence in not searching the registry, especially when coupled with open possession on the part of the grantee; still it can avail the appellants nothing in the present case. Apply the presumption to the appellees here; and if my views are correct, it is completely repelled by the fact of actual notice on the part of the appellants when they took their incumbrances.

For the reasons above stated, I am of opinion that the appellants have not 545 sustained their pretensions, *whether in the character of creditors, or in the character of purchasers; and, therefore, that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court dismissing their bill.

ALLEN, J., and CABELL, P., concurred.

BROOKE, J., was absent at the time of the decision: but the president stated that he was authorized by him to say, that if present he would also have concurred.

Garland and Others v. Lynch.

(Absent BROOKE and STANARD,* J.)

Forthcoming Bond†—Forfeiture—Effect on Original Judgment.—The decisions in Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490, Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 93, and Downman v. Downman's ex'or, 2 Wash. 189, approved. In conformity with the principle of the first case, HELD, that if judgment be rendered against two, and one gives a forthcoming bond with security, which is forfeited, the other is not discharged from the original judgment, if the obligors in the forthcoming bond prove insolvent. But also HELD, according to the decisions in the two last cases, that the forfeited forthcoming bond will prevent any execution or other proceeding on the original judgment, until the same be quashed.

Same—Creditor's Right to Quash.—Even after execution has been awarded on a forthcoming bond,

*He had been counsel for the plaintiffs in error.

†Forthcoming Bond—Rights of Sureties—Subrogation.—A surety in a forfeited forthcoming bond is a surety for the debt; and when he pays it as such surety, he is entitled to all the rights of the creditor against the original debtor, subsisting at the time he became bound for the debt; and the judgment, for the benefit of the surety so paying, is not extinguished but transferred with all its obligatory force against the principal, and constitutes a legal lien upon his real estate owned at the date of the judgment, and thereafter acquired. Hill v. Manser, 11 Gratt. 525, citing the principal case; Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 309; Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 178; Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 419. See foot-note to Hill v. Manser, 11 Gratt. 523; Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 178. The principal case is cited in this connection in Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 181; Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 431, 434; Coffman v. Hopkins, 75 Va. 648; Dent v. Walt, 9 W. Va. 48. See monographic note on "Subrogation" appended to Janney v. Stephen, 2 Pat. & H. 11, and monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

Same—Same—Same.—In Sherman v. Shaver, 75 Va. 10, the court said: "If an execution against principal and surety be levied on property of the principal, and a third person, at the request of the principal but without the consent or concurrence of the surety, intervene and bind himself as surety in a bond for the forthcoming of the property on the day of sale and the bond be forfeited, although such third person thus becomes bound as surety for the debt (Garland v. Lynch, 1 Rob. R. 576), yet he is not entitled on making payment to be substituted for contribution to the original judgment against the the bond may be quashed on the motion of the creditor, to enable him to have execution on the original judgment. If the case be one in which the execution on the forthcoming bond has proved unavailing, without any default of the creditor.

Same—Security—Sufficiency of—Liability of Sheriff.—

Where the sheriff takes from the owner of goods levied on under execution a forthcoming bond with security, and, upon the same being forfeited and execution awarded thereon, the obligors prove *insolvent, the sheriff will not

546 generally be liable to the creditor on account of such insolvency, if he can establish that the security was sufficient at the time of taking the bond. But where execution against two is levied on the goods of one, and he gives a forthcoming bond with the other as his only surety, such surety, being already bound, is not security such as the law requires; and if the execution on the forthcoming bond prove unavailing, the sheriff will in this case be liable to the creditor, although he may prove that the surety in the forthcoming bond was sufficient in point of estate at the time of taking the bond.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Measure of Damages.—In a suit on a sheriff's bond under the act 1 R. C. 1818, ch. 78, § 18, p. 279, there is a demurrer to the evidence, and it appearing thereby that the party for whose use the suit is brought had an execution against two, which was levied on the goods of one, who gave a forthcoming bond with the other as security, and that, the bond being forfeited, the execution awarded thereon proved unavailing, the circuit court holds the evidence sufficient to original surety (Givens v. Nelson, 10 Leigh 383; Stout v. Vause, 1 Rob. R. 169, 180)."

Same—Security for Debt—Quashing Bond—Grounds for.—The principal case is cited in Rhea v. Preston, 75 Va. 774, for the proposition that a forfeited forthcoming bond stands as a security for the debt, and though while in force no execution can be taken out or other proceeding be had at law to enforce the original judgment, yet the bond is not an absolute satisfaction. For if it be faulty on its face, or the security when taken be insufficient, or the obligors, though solvent when the bond is taken, become insolvent afterwards, the plaintiff may, for these or other good reasons, on his motion, have the bond quashed and be restored to his original judgment. And though the bond be not quashed, if it appear that it may properly be, a court of equity, which looks to substance, and when occasion requires, treats that as done which ought to be done, will regard the bond as a nullity, and the original judgment as in full force. See Jones v. Myrick, 8 Gratt. 179, and note.

The principal case is cited in this connection in Cooper v. Daugherty, 85 Va. 351, 7 S. E. Rep. 387.

Same—Effect of Forfeiture on Original Debtors.—

The execution and forfeiture of the forthcoming bond by one of several joint debtors does not utterly discharge the original joint debtors; but if the forthcoming bond proves unavailing, it will still be competent to proceed on the judgment against the other joint debtors, until satisfaction is obtained; and, therefore, the security in a forthcoming bond, given by one, is entitled, on paying the debt, to the remedies of the creditor against the others. Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 431, citing, as authority for this statement, the principal case, and Robinson v. Sherman, 2 Gratt. 178.

support the action. Some of the evidence which had been introduced tending to shew that part of the debt might have been made under the execution on the forthcoming bond if the creditor had not interfered, the counsel for the defendants then insists that the jury should weigh the evidence in assessing the damages. But the opinion of the circuit court is, that the plaintiff must recover the amount of his debt, or nothing, and that the evidence cannot be urged before the jury in mitigation of damages. Held, that in fixing the damages absolutely at the amount of the debt and thus taking from the jury all discretion, the circuit court erred. Accord. Perkins and others v. Giles governor, 9 Leigh 397.

In March 1820, an action of debt was brought in the county court of Amherst, in the name of Jones P. Preston governor of the commonwealth of Virginia, for the benefit of John Lynch jr. against David S. Garland late sheriff of Amherst county, John London, William Turner and John Coleman, on a bond executed the 15th of September 1817, to Preston as governor of the commonwealth, by Garland and the other obligors as his sureties, with a condition (as prescribed by the last form in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 278, § 12,) for the faithful execution and performance by Garland of the office of sheriff of Amherst county, during his continuance therein. In the 547 *condition, the commission was recited as dated the — day of — past. The declaration, after setting forth the bond and condition, averred that Garland, having duly qualified as sheriff of Amherst under his said commission, appointed one Benjamin Harrison his deputy, who duly qualified as such. And it assigned three breaches. 1. That Lynch, having obtained a judgment in the superior court of Amherst against Leroy Camden and Jabez Camden for 300 dollars with interest from the 2d of October 1816, and 7 dollars and 75 cents costs, caused a writ of fieri facias to issue therefor against their goods and chattels, which writ was delivered to Harrison, the deputy of Garland, to execute: that Harrison executed the same upon a negro boy named Harry, the property of Leroy Camden, and suffered the boy to remain in his possession, upon his giving bond to have the boy forthcoming at the day and place of sale, with the said Jabez Camden as security therein, and with no other security: that the boy was not delivered at the day and place of sale, and the said Leroy Camden and Jabez Camden became, after the time of taking said bond, wholly insolvent: and that Lynch, by the misconduct of the said deputy sheriff in the premises, had wholly lost his debt. 2. That Lynch obtained a judgment against Leroy Camden, and caused an execution to be sued out upon it, which was put into the hands of Harrison, then a deputy sheriff for Garland; and Harrison could have levied it upon property of Camden sufficient in value to have satisfied the execution, but there was a failure to levy the same, and the debt has been lost. 3. That Lynch, having obtained a judgment against Leroy Camden and Jabez Camden, caused a fi. fa. to be issued upon it, which was delivered to Harrison, the deputy of Garland as sheriff; that the same was executed by Harrison on a negro boy, the property of Leroy Camden, who was of value sufficient to pay the amount of the judgment, and the said boy was returned by Harrison 548 into the possession of *Camden, without the judgment being paid or discharged, and the said boy was not advertised and sold, or otherwise legally disposed of, by Garland as sheriff, or by any of his deputies, and the said boy was never after taken possession of by Garland as sheriff, nor by any of his deputies, and the said judgment has never yet been paid.

At May term 1822, the defendants pleaded conditions performed, and issue was joined.

At November term 1822 they offered two pleas, to wit: 1. that a forthcoming bond was taken in discharge of the execution, which forthcoming bond, being forfeited, was accepted by the plaintiff in the execution without objection thereto, and on his motion an execution was awarded thereon; 2. (after craving oyer of the condition of the bond in the declaration mentioned) that the defendants "have well and truly performed the said condition, as by law the said David S. Garland was bound to do." The court refused to permit these pleas to be filed, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants then tendered four other pleas, which were received; to wit, 1. that at the time of the execution of the forthcoming bond, the obligors were solvent, and of sufficient ability to pay the debt, and the failure to take security in said bond was by the leave and license of the creditor: 2. that although no security was taken in the forthcoming bond, yet the creditor in said bond waived his right to have security therein: 3. that the debt has not been lost on account of any negligence or misfeasance in office of the sheriff: 4. that if the debt has not been made, it has been owing to the negligence of the creditor, and not owing to any fault or negligence of the sheriff. To the second, third and fourth of these pleas, the plaintiff replied generally. To the first he replied that the obligors in the forthcoming bond, at the time of taking the same, were not both of them solvent, and that the said Jabez 549 was not good security, and that the failure in taking security in *said bond was not by leave and license of the creditor. The replication concluded to the country.

At August term 1823, after a suggestion of the death of the defendant London, a jury was impanelled, but failed to agree.

At June term 1824, a verdict was found for the defendants, and judgment rendered thereupon, from which the plaintiff appealed.

In the superior court of law, on the 2d of October 1824, the judgment was reversed with costs, and it was ordered that a new trial be had; and for that purpose, by consent of parties, the cause was retained in the superior court.

At the first trial in the circuit superior court, a verdict was found for the defendants; but it was set aside.

Afterwards, to wit, on the 10th of September 1832, another jury being impanelled, the plaintiff introduced the following evidence, to wit: 1. A record of the county court of Amherst at September term 1817, stating that David S. Garland, sheriff of the said county, appeared in court, and entered into and acknowledged bonds with John Coleman, William Turner and John London his sureties, conditioned according to law. 2. The bond of Garland as sheriff, mentioned in the declaration. 3. A record of the qualification of Garland as sheriff; which, as copied, was without date, and stated that Garland produced in court a commission from his excellency Linah Mims lieutenant governor of the commonwealth, appointing him sheriff; that he had theretofore entered into three several bonds, in the penalties and with the conditions required by law, and that he took the several oaths required by law, and was, agreeably to said commission, appointed sheriff of the county. 4. A record of the qualification of Benjamin Harrison as deputy; which, as copied, was also without date, and stated that on the motion of David S. Garland sheriff of the county, Benjamin Harrison and Richard H. Burks were qualified and admitted as deputies *under said Garland. 5. The record of the case of Lynch against Camden, in which the judgment mentioned in the declaration was obtained; shewing, that on the 5th of May 1818 a fieri facias was issued on the said judgment against Leroy Camden and Jabez Camden: that a return was made thereon in these words—

“Executed, 23d May 1818, on one negro boy named Harry, the property of Leroy Camden; D. bond, and forfeited 25th June 1818. B. Harrison D. S. for D. S. Garland sh’ff:” that the forthcoming bond was executed only by Leroy Camden and Jabez Camden: that after the same was forfeited, judgment was rendered thereon against Leroy Camden at September term 1818: that upon that judgment a fieri facias issued the 5th of October 1818, returnable to the first monday of December following, which was delivered to Benjamin Harrison, and was returned with this return thereon—“Not time to execute. Alex’r Mundy D. S. for David S. Garland sheriff;” and another fieri facias issued thereon the 4th of January 1819, on which the following return was made—“No effects found. J. S. Dillard D. for J. Dillard:” that subsequently a judgment was rendered on the forthcoming bond against Jabez Camden, after which a fieri facias issued against both the said Leroy and Jabez the 4th of May 1819, which was returned, “No effects whereon I can make the money. Wm. Dillard D. S. for J. Dillard sh’ff;” and afterwards a capias ad satisfaciendum issued against them the 10th of June 1819, which was returned “Not found,” and two other writs of fieri facias were issued, which were returned without effect. 6. A sheriff’s ticket in these words: “John Lynch jr. ass’ee of C. Anthony, to the sh’ff Amherst.

1818. To commission on execution v.

Camden and bail,	-	-	$15 75
D. bond 63, notice 50,	-	-	1 13

B. Harrison D. S. Garland sh’ff.” 551 *7. A witness who deposed, among other things, that the execution of the 5th of October 1818 was delivered to the witness by Harrison a few days before November court 1818, which happened on the 16th of that month; that the witness was at that time acting as deputy for Garland, who was sheriff; that the witness acted by virtue of a contract with Harrison; that the term of Garland expired at November court 1818, and that Harrison and the witness acted till that time, and then went out of office with Garland. There was other evidence shewing that the original qualification of Garland as sheriff, and of Harrison as deputy, took place in 1816. And the fact that Harrison continued to act as deputy until November term 1818, was shewn as well by his returns on process, as by the testimony of witnesses. Two executions issued on the 7th of October 1818, in other cases, appeared to have been levied by Harrison, one on the 29th of that month, and the other on the 12th of November 1818. And the clerk of Amherst deposed that the deputy sheriffs generally attended a few days after the rising of the court to receive executions; that Harrison was always anxious to take them out, and that the general rule in delivering them out to the deputy sheriffs was, to deliver them in the order in which they stood recorded on the execution book.

The defendants, on their part, introduced evidence for the purpose of shewing that Jabez Camden, at the date of the forthcoming bond, was good and sufficient security for the amount of money mentioned in the said forthcoming bond, and that at the date of the writing presently mentioned, there was some property on which an execution in favour of Lynch might have been levied. (The evidence was very far from establishing clearly the facts which it was designed to establish; it is sufficient however to state here its object and tendency.) The said defendants introduced a writing (that just alluded to) in these words: “The sheriff of Amherst *will please permit the property on which he may levy my execution against Leroy Camden, to remain in his possession until monday next. J. Lynch jr. 10th Nov’r 1818.” The handwriting of Lynch was proved, and the paper was proved to have been delivered by him to Leroy Camden to carry to the sheriff. It was further shewn that in June 1818, Leroy Camden had a boy named Harry, who would have sold for between 300 and 400 dollars. (That, it will be observed, is the name of the boy mentioned in the forthcoming bond.)

After all the evidence had been heard, the plaintiff demurred to it. The defendants objected to joining in the demurrer, but their objections were overruled, and they thereupon joined in the same.

The counsel for the plaintiff then tendered to the jury the conditional verdict hereinafter mentioned, to be found by them. Whereupon the counsel for the defendants insisted on submitting the evidence to the jury, that they might weigh the case and ascertain the amount of damages. But the court was of opinion, from the proceedings in this case, that the plaintiff must recover the amount of his debt, or nothing, and that the said evidence could not be urged before the jury in mitigation of damages. To this opinion the defendants excepted.

Thereupon the jury found a conditional verdict (the same which the plaintiff's counsel had previously tendered) assessing the damages to 358 dollars 99 cents, with interest on 354 dollars 13 cents, part thereof, from the 23d of May 1818, if the court should be of opinion for the plaintiff on the demurrer to evidence.

On the 14th of September 1832, the demurrer to evidence being argued, the court pronounced its opinion thereupon against the defendants. And on the 2d of April 1833, final judgment was rendered for the plaintiff.

To that judgment, on the petition of the defendants, a supersedeas was awarded.

553 *Stanard for plaintiffs in error.

It was incumbent on the plaintiff, upon the plea of conditions performed, to shew, 1. that the act complained of was committed by one who, at the time, was the sheriff's lawful deputy; and 2. that it was so committed at a time when the sureties in the sheriff's bond were bound for his acts. The evidence offered to establish these facts must be subjected to those tests which, under the practice of this state and the decisions of this court, are held to be applicable to the evidence of that party who, by demurring, has withdrawn the question of fact from the consideration of that tribunal which is the most proper for deciding the facts. When subjected to these tests, the evidence must be held insufficient. The bond that is produced neither shews when the sheriff came into office, nor how long he was to continue in office, nor indeed that he was ever in office at all. A man may be regularly commissioned and give bond as sheriff, but if he be never sworn into office, the sureties in the bond will hardly be liable for his acts. The sheriff may be bound for his own acts, but the sureties are bound only for the acts of the officer. There must, it is clear, be something besides the bond to establish the fact of the qualification of the sheriff, and the time when it occurred. What is there in this case? An order reciting that he was commissioned by Linah Mims lieutenant ant governor of the commonwealth; whereas this bond was payable to James P. Preston governor, and executed when he was in office. It may be said that this bond was for the second year of Garland's sheriffalty. If it were, still the necessity of shewing a qualification for the second year is not dispensed with. Commonwealth v. Fairfax & others, 4 Hen. & Munf. 208. But there is no evidence that this bond was for the second year. Besides (supposing it was) when Harrison was first appointed, the appointment could only have

Harrison's term of office must therefore have expired before this bond was executed; and there is no evidence of reappointment. Munford v. Rice and others, 6 Munf. 81.

II. When a judgment is rendered against two or more, and an execution issues upon such judgment against all, which is levied upon the property of one, and the owner gives bond with adequate security for the forthcoming of the property at the day of sale the forthcoming bond, when forfeited, is in law a satisfaction of the original judgment, to this extent at least, that so long as the bond remains in force and unquashed, no proceedings can be had upon the judgment against any of the parties thereto. Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 92; Downman v. Downman's ex'or, 2 Wash. 189; United States v. Graves and others, 2 Brock. 385, 6. In the last case, chief justice Marshall clearly considers that there is no remedy unless equity could interfere; and it must be admitted that it would be very difficult to sustain equitable jurisdiction in such a case. When, then, the sheriff took Jabez Camden as security, he took a person who could clearly not be proceeded against both upon the forthcoming bond and upon the original judgment: if the bond should be forfeited and proceedings had upon that, there could be no execution against him on the original judgment; if on the other hand the bond should be quashed, so as to permit an execution on the original judgment, by the very act of quashing the bond, Jabez Camden would be discharged from liability as an obligor therein. It is apparent, then, that it was no breach of duty in the officer to take him as surety in the forthcoming bond, if, at the time, he was sufficient in point of estate; a matter to be determined upon the evidence.

III. The decision in Perkins and others v. Giles governor, 9 Leigh 397, shews that the court erred in the opinion which it gave as to the damages.

555 *C. and G. N. Johnson for defendant in error. On the demurrer to evidence, it will suffice to say that the conclusions of fact must be such as the jury might from a just and reasonable construction have made, and not arbitrary inferences. Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 211.

II. The material question is, whether the sheriff was justified in taking Jabez Camden as surety in the forthcoming bond. If the law be, that by levying the execution on the property of one, and taking from him a forthcoming bond, the other is discharged, then the sheriff should be held liable for not levying the execution on the property of the other, as well as of that one. But the law is not so. Where the first execution which issues on a judgment does not produce satisfaction, the statute provides for a new execution in every case except where a capias ad satisfaciendum against two is levied on one, and he is discharged by the act of the plaintiff. 1 R. C. 1819, p. 527, § 3, 4, p. 528, § 8, and p. 538, § 33. And the whole course of decision, as well in England as in this country, is, that the judgment is not to be considered satisfied, except in the case just mentioned, until the creditor has received his money or given a release. Where the body of the debtor is taken in execution, the remedy remains in force against every other person bound for the debt. Hayling v. Mulhall, 2 W. Bl. 1235. So likewise where the goods of one obligor are levied upon. Dyke v. Mercer, 2 Show. 394; Clerk v. Withers, 2 Ld. Raym. 1072; Winston and others v. Whitlocke, 5 Call 435. If a forthcoming bond be taken and forfeited, the forfeited bond is only an apparent satisfaction. Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 92; Downman v. Downman's ex'or, 2 Wash. 189; Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490. The latter case explains the two former, and shews that there is no actual satisfaction until payment is made of the money. It is true that in that case the judgment was only against one obligor, whereas in this it was against two, 556 and the *property of one was taken.

But the difference is not material. The principle of the decision is, that the forfeited forthcoming bond is not a satisfaction of the debt, and that the creditor may still have recourse against others previously bound. The law works detriment to no man. Nadin v. Battie &c., 5 East 147. Therefore, where the creditor has not been an actor, but the subject of the law's action, and has pursued the remedies of the law as far as he can, he will not be prevented from going against those previously bound. There is no case in which, under such circumstances, relief has been denied. Its denial would be manifestly unjust, and against the intention of the legislature. They have taken from the creditor the certain advantage which would result from a sale of the property levied on, and in place of the property have provided for him bond and security. But what benefit does the creditor derive, if, when he gets this security, all sureties previously bound are discharged? The forthcoming bond is a mere substitute for the property for which it is taken; and as the property would only discharge the judgment so far as money was obtained for it, so the forthcoming bond should only be a discharge so far as money is paid in satisfaction of it. In the case of The United States v. Graves and others, 2 Brock. 385, 6, the mind of chief justice Marshall seems to have been turned to a remedy in equity. But the principle on which he rested was, that there ought to be a remedy. There can be no occasion to turn the creditor over to equity. For a surety is never discharged at law by the act of law.

III. What excuse is offered for the failure to levy, complained of in the second breach? It seems to have been supposed that the creditor had improperly interfered. But it is not proved that any thing more was done in relation to the note, than to write it and deliver it to the defendant.

The probability is that the defendant 557 *never used it. And the case is as if the note had never been written. But it did not, by any possible construction, authorize the sheriff not to levy.

IV. It seems to have been supposed that the plaintiff was negligent in not having the execution levied on a particular slave. But the plaintiff had nothing to do with any particular property. He had only, when one execution was returned, to issue another; and this has been done.

On any view, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. For there was unquestionable evidence of misconduct in office. The stronger the proof that Harry was liable and might have been taken under execution, the stronger the case made out for the plaintiff.

V. The assessment of damages was no doubt the province of the jury. But the court might instruct the jury when engaged in the assessment. The only question is whether the instruction was correct. If it had been shewn that the whole debt had not been lost, but only a part, then the jury should only have assessed the damages for the part lost. But here there is no such evidence. The plaintiff seeks to recover on the ground that the whole has been lost by the misconduct of the sheriff in taking insufficient security in the forthcoming bond; and if the allegation be made out, then the proper measure of damages must be the whole debt. The case of Perkins and others v. Giles governor, 9 Leigh 397, is no authority against us. In an action by an assignee against his assignor, the court would never hesitate to say that the criterion of damages is the amount of the debt lost: and that is all that is done here.

ALLEN, J. It has not been contended in argument that the sheriff would be liable, if, in the proper discharge of his duty, he took a delivery bond with security sufficient at the time, and the surety should thereafter become insolvent. The law imposes no such responsibility 558 *upon him. It was introduced for the convenience of the owner, and not in case of the sheriff. It would have been unreasonable, under such circumstances, to require any thing more of the sheriff than to take security good at the time. The act authorizing the sheriff to Demand a bond of indemnity was for his benefit, to relieve him from his common law liability; and therefore the provision was inserted, that the claimant of the property, upon the execution of the indemnifying bond, should be barred of his action against the sheriff levying the execution, unless the obligors in the bond should become insolvent. In the first breach assigned in this case, it is not averred that the obligors were insolvent when the bond was executed, but that they became insolvent afterwards. This, though necessary to be averred in order to shew that the plaintiff suffered injury, would not of itself constitute any ground of complaint against the sheriff. There must have been some other act, which was improper, and subjected him to the action of the plaintiff; and the loss consequent on that act would respect the damages alone. The facts alleged shew that the sheriff took a codefendant alone as security; and this, it is maintained, was such an improper act as subjected him to the action of the creditor.

To the correct determination of this question it becomes necessary to enquire what effect a delivery bond given by one of several defendants, whose property has been levied on, has upon the condition of the other defendants, who do not join in the bond; and what is the nature of the undertaking of the surety in the forthcoming bond. Does a forthcoming bond forfeited constitute an actual satisfaction of the original judgment, so that no further proceedings can be founded on that judgment? If it does—if the remedy of the plaintiff, after a valid forthcoming bond taken and forfeited, is on the bond alone, and that is substituted for the 559 judgment *which is thereby extinguished, one of two consequences must follow: either the sheriff incurs a liability if he omits any of the defendants in the execution, (for by so doing they are discharged and the creditor's rights impaired;) or if not, then he may receive as security a codefendant who is sufficient in point of estate; for, if not taken as security, he would be discharged, and the plaintiff sustains no injury by his being received as the security.

There is nothing in the act which makes it the duty of the sheriff to require every defendant in the original execution to join in the delivery bond. The law was passed for the benefit of the owner of the goods taken; to enable him, at his risk, to retain the possession and use of the goods, and to avoid the expense of their safekeeping until the day of sale. The words relate to the owner, and make it the duty of the sheriff to suffer the goods to remain with him, upon his tendering a bond with sufficient security to have them forthcoming at the day of sale. His right to retain the possession is not dependent on the other parties to the execution. The law respects his condition as owner, and for his convenience in that character, gives him the privilege of retaining possession of his property upon complying with the terms imposed. And the practice has been in conformity with this construction of the act. Several cases have occurred in this court, where the bond was given by one of several defendants; and in no instance has it been held that the bond was defective for that cause. If then a bond may properly be taken from one of several defendants, and the sheriff, upon the tender of such a bond with good security, is bound to receive it, does this bond, when forfeited, actually satisfy the original judgment, and exonerate the other defendants from all further responsibility? It is apparent that if the act is to receive this construction, a provision introduced

560 practice operate *most harshly on the rights of the creditor. A creditor having several persons bound to him may, without any default on his part, and whilst in pursuit of a legal recovery, be deprived of all remedy except against the one giving the delivery bond and his surety. And if the surety, though sufficient when taken, should, with the principal obligor, prove insolvent before actual payment, the debt would be lost though the other defendants remain solvent. I should be unwilling to come to a conclusion leading to such results, if it can be avoided. Nor do I think any of the cases referred to have established the proposition. They have merely decided that a forfeited forthcoming bond, whilst it remains in force, is a satisfaction of the judgment, so as to prevent a new execution. To the same extent, it may be said that a ca. sa. executed, or a fi. fa. levied on the property of one, is a satisfaction of the judgment. Whilst the body remains in custody, no new execution can issue against that defendant; but if he dies in custody, or escapes, the creditor is remitted to his original judgment. And where a fi. fa. is levied on a sufficiency of goods, the property of one of the defendants, a new execution cannot issue on that judgment until the levy is exhausted. Blumfield's case, 5 Co. Rep. 87; Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 94.

The first and leading case is Taylor v. Dundass. The bond there in question was a replevy bond. By subsequent cases, however, a replevy bond and a forfeited forthcoming bond seem as to this point to be placed on the same footing: both have the effect of a judgment, the first from the date, the last from the forfeiture. In that case an execution issued and was levied on the property of one defendant, who gave a twelve months replevy bond. Afterwards, but within the year, (as appears from the dates of the executions and order of court,) a second execution issued: and this was quashed on motion, upon the ground 561 that the proceedings under *the first execution were a bar to the second. Judge Pendleton in one place says, that a replevy bond is the same as if the estate had been sold to the amount of the debt, and though it is an indulgence to the defendant, the execution is considered as levied and the judgment discharged. This language, standing alone, would cover the whole ground: but in a subsequent passage the judge qualifies it, by remarking that the replevy bond, whilst the execution remains unquashed, is as complete an execution of the judgment, as if the estate had been sold to the full amount of the judgment. So in Downman v. Downman's ex'or, 2 Wash. 189, judge Lyons observed, that a forthcoming bond, whilst in force, was a satisfaction of the judgment. Remarks of the same kind will be found in many of the cases since. In Randolph v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490, judge Green observed, that the only effect of the decisions is that a replevin or forthcoming bond, even if defective, is a bar to any further proceedings on the judgment until quashed.

These authorities leave no doubt that as long as the bond remains in force, it arrests all proceedings on the original judgment. So long, it constitutes a technical satisfaction, and operates, as it respects the other defendants, like a fi. fa. executed on the property of one. But no case has yet decided under what circumstances and for what cause the bond may be quashed, so as to remit the plaintiff to his original judgment.

The law provides that the creditor, if the bond at any time be quashed as faulty, besides his remedy against the sheriff, may moreover have execution on his original judgment as if such bond had never been given. By this provision, literally construed, the right to quash would seem to be restricted to the case of defects apparent on the bond. That the creditor has not the right, at his own discretion, to quash a good bond, seems to me clear. The bond,

562 *the levy. When the execution is levied on the property of the principal, if the creditor interferes and releases it, he thereby discharges the surety. Baird v. Rice, 1 Call 18; Bullitt's ex'ors v. Winstons, 1 Munf. 269. To hold that he could, without good cause, quash the bond which has supplied the place of a levy, and so be remitted to his original judgment and all his remedies to enforce it, would be to authorize him to do indirectly, after the execution of the bond, what he could not do directly, before its execution, without releasing the other defendants. In Hendricks &c. v. Dundass, 2 Wash. 50, the creditor moved to quash the replevy bond, because the execution had been issued without authority. The motion was resisted by the other defendant: but it was not pretended in argument, nor is there any intimation in the opinion of the court, that the creditor had the absolute right to quash without cause. In Jett v. Walker, 1 Rand. 211, on a judgment against two a forthcoming bond had been taken, which was quashed on the motion of the plaintiff. A second execution was levied on the property of the bail, who moved to quash it, as having issued irregularly. His motion was overruled, and he appealed. The court held that the appeal extended only to the judgment overruling the motion to quash the second execution; and without deciding whether the appellant would be entitled to a supersedeas to the first judgment, even it was erroneous, affirmed the judgment. By a note of the reporter it appears, that the counsel intimated an intention to apply for a supersedeas to the first judgment, but was informed by the president of the court that the judges had considered the subject, and determined to refuse the supersedeas, on the ground that the bond varied from the execution, and was of course properly quashed. These cases, though not decisive of the very point, tend strongly to prove that the creditor's right to quash is not unlimited. Nor has it been decided that 563 the creditor *has no right to quash except for apparent defects. The contrary may be implied from the case of Hendricks &c. v. Dundass, above cited. There the motion was made and sustained upon proof that the execution issued without authority. So, I suppose, it would not be doubted that if the sheriff fraudulently received as security a person notoriously insolvent, the court, upon this fact being shewn, would quash the bond; and this notwithstanding the sheriff had made himself liable; for he might be insolvent, and unable to indemnify the plaintiff. Such a bond would, in the words of the act of assembly, be faulty, the law requiring the sheriff to take sufficient security.

If the plaintiff may for the cause just mentioned, or for the reasons appearing in the case of Hendricks &c. v. Dundass, quash upon other grounds than that of apparent defects, may he not do so as well after an award of execution on the bond, as before? The court gives no judgment on the bond; the effect of a judgment is acquired when the bond is forfeited. The bond may be quashed whenever a motion is made for the award of execution, no matter how many terms have intervened since the forfeiture. It may be so quashed as well for defects apparent, as for objections shewn aliunde. Then why should the award of execution change the rights of the parties? It imparts no new character to the judgment; that was complete upon the forfeiture of the bond; and the proceeding to enforce it is for the benefit of all interested. The surety may have been sufficient when taken, but afterwards have become insolvent; or he may have been then insufficient, and the fact unknown to the officer or creditor, or so doubtful in his circumstances as to render it uncertain whether his insufficiency could be proved. By proceeding on the bond, the creditor avoids delay: if the debt is made, no further question arises; if the obligors prove insolvent and the money cannot be made, that is conclusive 564 *evidence of the insufficiency of the security. It seems to me, therefore, that after the award of execution, if the execution proves unavailing without any default of the creditor, that furnishes sufficient ground to quash the bond; and that the court, upon such proof, should quash it, so as to remit the plaintiff to his original judgment. Any other construction places the creditor who has a joint judgment against his debtors, in a much worse condition than the creditor who has no judgment, or a separate judgment against one. In Dyke v. Mercer, 2 Show. 394, two were bound in a bond jointly and severally, and judgment was obtained in a separate suit against one. A fi. fa. was issued, and a seizure to the value returned, but the property was not sold, nor the money paid. To a second action against the other obligor, this matter was pleaded in bar; but the court determined against the defendant, holding that nothing but actual satisfaction by his co-obligor was sufficient to discharge him. In Winston & al. v. Whitlocke, 5 Call 435, a forthcoming bond having been given by two, execution was awarded and a fi. fa. issued against one of them, under which property was taken; but the fi. fa. was not returned. Upon the authority of Dyke v. Mercer, it was held that these proceedings were no bar to a motion on the bond against the other obligor. Why should the mere form of proceeding affect so materially the right of the creditor? Whether he proceeds by a separate action or a joint action, the object is the same, to obtain actual satisfaction; and if in the one case he may proceed until that satisfaction is procured, there can be no good reason why a mere technical satisfaction should discharge the other defendants finally in the other case. The point has not been expressly decided in this court; but principles have been established incidentally, which cannot be reconciled with the proposition, that a forfeited forthcoming bond extinguishes the original claim, although it is shewn that the 65 *bond has proved unavailing. Thus in Randolph v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490, judgment having been rendered against a surety in an obligation, he gave a forthcoming bond, which was forfeited. After many years he paid this bond, and then moved against his principal. The motion was resisted on the ground that the forthcoming bond, when forfeited, satisfied the original judgment; that the surety's right of action then accrued, and that it was now barred by the lapse of time. The court held, that though the forfeited forthcoming bond arrested all proceedings on the judgment whilst it remained in force, it did not amount to an actual payment or satisfaction of the debt, so as to bar an action against the other obligors. In Smith &c. v. Triplett &c., 4 Leigh 590, the assignee of a note obtained judgment against the obligor, who gave a forthcoming bond, upon which execution was awarded; and the obligor proved insolvent. This was held not to be such a satisfaction as precluded the assignee from resorting to his assignor. There the bond was not defective on its face. By the original judgment, the instrument assigned was merged in a higher security; and if this security was satisfied, either by the forfeited forthcoming bond or the proceedings under it, upon what ground could the assignor be held responsible?

There is but one serious objection to this construction of the law. Where there is an execution against two defendants, bearing towards each other the relation of principal and surety, and the execution is levied on property of the principal sufficient to pay the debt, the surety, if the property were sold, would be relieved. But if a forthcoming bond be executed, and the surety therein, though sufficient when taken, afterwards become insolvent, to hold that the creditor may be permitted to resort to the original judgment, would be to subject the original surety to a loss. To this it 566 may be answered that the surety was guilty of the first default. *Contracts are made not with a view to their breach, but to their fulfilment. Having engaged to pay the debt, he was bound to comply with his undertaking. His failure to perform his obligation has driven the creditor to the judicial tribunals for redress. If, in the due and regular prosecution of his claim, injury is inflicted on the surety by the operation of law and the act of the principal, over which the creditor could exercise no control, the creditor should not suffer. And as between the two, equally innocent as respects the particular transaction, he should bear the burthen whose original default has resulted in the special injury.

If then the other defendants are still ultimately liable on the judgment, in the event of the insolvency of the obligors in the delivery bond, as I think they are, it becomes necessary to enquire for what the surety in the forthcoming bond is liable. The act provides that if the owner of the goods and chattels taken shall give sufficient security to the sheriff to have them forthcoming on the day of sale, it shall be lawful for the sheriff to take a bond payable to the creditor, reciting the service of the execution, and the amount due thereon, with condition to have the goods forthcoming &c. and then provides that if the owner fails to deliver the goods or to pay the money mentioned in the execution, the bond is to be returned to the office and have the effect of a judgment. The bond, until forfeited, is part of the execution, collateral to the payment of the debt, and a forfeiture may be saved by a delivery of the goods. It may therefore, in this view, be considered not as a security for the payment of the debt, but for an independent act, the delivery of the property alone. But all the provisions of the law must be adverted to for the purpose of ascertaining the true character of the surety's undertaking. The bond is a statutory bond, and its operation must be determined by reference to the law under which it was taken.

567 The law requires that *the bond shall recite the service of the execution, and the amount due thereon; obviously for the purpose of fixing the extent of the surety's liability. He cannot discharge himself by paying the value of the property to be delivered, if that is less than the amount of the execution. The forfeiture is saved, either by a delivery of the property, or the payment of the money due on the execution. If the value of the property, therefore, exceeds the amount due, a breach of the condition is saved by paying that amount. And execution is to be awarded not for the value of the property, to be ascertained by a jury or in any other way, but for the amount of the execution as recited in the bond. All these provisions shew that the surety, though he may discharge himself by delivering the property before forfeiture, also undertakes for the debt in the event of a failure to deliver the property. His undertaking bears a double aspect, and the alternative is with him, not the creditor. If he chooses to deliver the property, he is discharged; having elected to do that which constitutes his undertaking collateral to the payment of the debt. Failing to deliver, he elects the other alternative which his undertaking embraced, the payment of the debt. In entering into the bond, therefore, he becomes (as it seems to me) a surety for the debt, with the power to relieve himself from that liability by doing another act within the period prescribed. If this be the true character of his undertaking, and if, as I have before attempted to shew, all the original defendants continue ultimately responsible until the actual payment, notwithstanding the intermediate execution and forfeiture of the forthcoming bond, then it follows that such a defendant is not sufficient security. He is already bound for the debt, and continues so bound until discharged by actual satisfaction of the judgment. He cannot therefore be considered as sufficient security, or security in any sense, for that for which he already 568 stands *bound by the judgment; and the sheriff is not warranted in receiving him.

I therefore think, that as the evidence demurred to in this case proves that the surety in the forthcoming bond was a defendant in the original judgment, that evidence supports the issue charging the sheriff with a breach of duty in taking him as security; that whether he was sufficient in point of estate or not, in point of law he was no security.

To sustain the issue on the part of the plaintiff, it was incumbent on him to prove that Garland was sheriff on the 23d of May 1818, that the bond sued on covered his transactions for that year, and that Harrison, who levied the execution, was his deputy. The plaintiff offered in evidence an order shewing the qualification of Garland as sheriff, under a commission from Linah Mims lieutenant governor, and also an order shewing the qualification of Harrison as his deputy. These orders are copied into the record without their dates, but I do not think the imperfection of the record in this respect material. The plaintiff also offered the official bond of Garland, executed

* September court 1817. The condition recites that Garland was appointed sheriff by commission from the governor; and under that commission the bond was taken. This, therefore, must have been the bond given for the second year. And it seems from the evidence, and the returns of his deputy Harrison on process, that under this second commission he continued in office until November 1818. There is no conflict in the evidence in reference to this point; and the orders, bond, and returns on the process clearly establish that Garland was the sheriff, and Harrison his acting deputy, during the period referred to.

The defendants in their fourth plea alleged that the debt was lost by the negligence of the creditor. In the view already taken of the rights and duties of the respective parties, as growing out of the 569 forthcoming *bond, I have attempted to shew that the creditor has not the absolute right to quash the bond, where it is not defective on its face, and has been regularly taken. If, however, the codefendant in the original judgment was not a legal security, the bond might have been quashed for this defect, and the creditor, besides his remedy against the sheriff, would have been at once remitted to his original judgment. He elected to pursue the bond. Of this the sheriff could not complain, unless the debt was afterwards lost by the negligence or misconduct of the creditor. The defendants have introduced evidence tending to prove that there was property of Leroy Camden, on which the sheriff might have levied, and that he was arrested by the improper interference of the creditor. The only interference consisted in the written memorandum given by Lynch to Leroy Camden on the 10th of November 1818, four days before the sheriff went out of office. It does not appear that this memorandum ever came to the sheriff's hands; and though, as against the demurrant, a jury might fairly have inferred that it did, as it was produced in evidence by the defendants, yet the memorandum did not warrant the sheriff in failing to levy; it merely authorized him to permit the property on which he might levy to remain in the possession of Leroy Camden until the succeeding monday. This, it seems to me, did not justify the sheriff in omitting entirely to levy. He had already incurred a liability by taking improper security in the forthcoming bond. For his own protection, it was his duty at least to levy the execution, if there was a sufficiency of property; and then, if loss ensued in consequence of this interference of the creditor, it must have been borne by him. The facts fairly deducible from this evidence do not, as it seems to me, make out a bar to the action. They tend to prove that part of the debt might possibly have been made, and therefore were proper for the consideration of the jury in assessing 570 *the damages, but do not defeat the plaintiff's action.

The second breach avers the delivery of the execution on the forthcoming bond against Leroy Camden to the sheriff, and that the sheriff could have levied the execution on sufficient property of Leroy Camden to satisfy it, but failed and refused to levy the same. The execution referred to was returned "Not time to execute." The breach is imperfectly assigned, and it is somewhat doubtful whether it was intended to aver that the defendant had sufficient property upon which the sheriff might have levied, or that he received the execution in time to levy the same. If the former was intended the record presents the parties as relying on the same evidence; the sheriff, as proving that there was property sufficient to have satisfied the debt, if the creditor had been diligent; and the creditor, as establishing the same fact, to prove misconduct in the sheriff. Looking at the breach in connexion with the execution set out and the return, it seems to have been intended to put in issue the truth of the return, and to aver that the execution came to the sheriff's hands in time to levy it. So considering it, the evidence, it seems to me, does not prove the issue. The execution is dated the 5th of October 1818; but there is no proof shewing when it was delivered to the sheriff, or returned. It seems that other executions against the same defendant, dated afterwards, did come to the sheriff's hands, and were levied before the return day of the one in question; and the clerk proves that the sheriff was in the habit of calling at the office and taking out executions. I do not think this sufficient, in opposition to the return of a sworn officer, to prove the return false. The affirmative was with the plaintiff, and he demurs. He might and should have proved when the execution was delivered. The jury would not have been justified in inferring from the evidence *adduced that such delivery was in time, against the return; and the plaintiff cannot, by demurring, deprive the defendants of the benefit of it. According to the well established rule, he is to be considered as waiving all his evidence which conflicts with that of the defendants.

No evidence was given to sustain the issue on the third breach. The law being, as I conceive, for the plaintiff on the facts, as proving the issue made under the first breach, if the case stopped here, the plaintiff would be entitled to an affirmance of the judgment. But after the demurrer to evidence was joined, (the court having ruled the defendants to do so,) the plaintiff's counsel tendered a conditional verdict for the amount of the debt: the defendants objected, contending that the quantum of damages was a question to be decided by the jury, and insisted on submitting the evidence to the jury; but the court was of opinion that, from the pleadings, the plaintiff must recover the amount of his debt, or nothing, and that said evidence could not be urged before the jury in mitigation of damages; and thereupon the jury signed the verdict. To this decision the defendants excepted. This was an action on the official bond, against the sheriff and his sureties; and the case of Perkins and others v. Giles governor, 9 Leigh 397, decides, that in such an action the recovery is confined to the damages sustained, and these may amount to the debt, or may amount to less. The sheriff having levied, and having released the goods by taking a defective bond, might, if the debt were lost in consequence of this discharge, be made liable for the whole. But even in an action on the case against him alone, the recovery would be limited to the amount of the injury sustained. In this case, the creditor having proceeded on the bond, it was competent to shew that the debt, or part of it, was made, or that the debt, or a portion of it, might have been collected if the 572 creditor *had not interfered, or that loss has resulted from his culpable neglect. Such evidence would be proper for the consideration of the jury on the question of damages. The only points submitted to the decision of the court upon the demurrer were, that the facts shew a cause of action against the sheriff, and do not shew that the debt was lost through the negligence of the creditor. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to a recovery; but the extent of that recovery must depend on the evidence as to the injury sustained. This the jury may hear and consider in assessing the damages. It may be entitled to little weight; but of this the jury are the exclusive judges, and the plaintiff cannot, by demurring, deprive the defendants of the benefit of it. The opinion of the court took from the jury all discretion, and fixed the damages at the amount of the debt. In this, and in excluding the testimony offered from the consideration of the jury on the quantum of damages, it seems to me the court erred; and for this cause the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new writ of enquiry awarded.

The other judges concurred. And the president stated that he was authorized by judge Brooke to say, that if present he would also have concurred.

Judgment reversed.

The Merchants bank of Baltimore being a creditor of the bank of the United States (incorporated by Pennsylvania), and experiencing great difficulty in the recovery of their debt, and the indebted corporation, though without this commonwealth, having effects here, a suit in equity was commenced in the superior court of chancery for the Richmond circuit, against the said corporation as debtors out of this commonwealth, and against others within the same, having in their hands effects of or otherwise indebted to the said absent debtors, and also against the said absent debtors as owners of lands and tenements within the commonwealth. Affidavit was duly made that the defendants sued as absent debtors were out of the commonwealth, and both the bill and endorsement on the subpoena shewed, in the usual manner, that the object of the suit was to obtain a decree for the sale of the lands and tenements belonging to the absent debtors, to satisfy the debt appearing to be due Corporations—When Deemed to Be Persons.—See foot-note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1. The principal case is cited in Crafford v. Supervisors, 87 Va. 115, 12 S. E. Rep. 147.

Same—"Persons" Used in Statute Includes Corporations.—In B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 663, it is said: "When the word person is used in a statute, corporations as well as natural persons are included for civil purposes. This was the rule at common law. 2 Inst. 697, 703, 736. They are to be deemed and taken as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in such statutes. Beaston v. Farmers Bank of Delaware, 12 Peter's R. 102, 134-5; U. S. Bank v. Merchants Bank of Baltimore, 1 Rob. R. 573."

In Stribbling v. The Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 190, JUDGE CABELL said: "The term 'person,' used, in the law, is unquestionably sufficiently comprehensive to embrace corporations; and it must be held to embrace them, unless there be something in the law showing the legislative intention to restrict its application."

from them, and to restrain the defendants in this commonwealth from paying, conveying *away or secreting the debts by them owning to, or the effects in their hands of, the said absent debtors. The usual order of publication was made against the absent debtors, and the same being duly published and posted, and the cause matured for hearing also as to other defendants, the case came on to be heard the 24th of January 1842, on the bill and exhibits. On consideration whereof, the court, without deciding any other question at that time, was of opinion that the lands and tenements sought to be subjected ought to be under the direction of the court, in the hands of a receiver, so that the same might be finally disposed of in such manner as to the court might seem just; and the court therefore, until its further order, appointed Gustavus A. Myers receiver of the rents and profits of all the said lands and tenements, with the powers set forth in the order. Afterwards, on the motion of the plaintiffs, leave was given them to amend their bill and make new parties, and the cause was sent to the rules. The amended bill was accordingly filed, making defendants thereto, besides others, John Bacon, Alexander Symington and Thomas Robbins. On the 23d of June 1842, on the motion of the absent debtors and of the said Bacon, Symington and Robbins, they were permitted to file their answers, on giving security for costs; the order providing, as usual, that the attachment sued forth in the cause was not to be thereby discharged.

In this state of the case, to wit, on the 29th of June 1842, the defendants who had so filed their answers moved the court to discharge the attachment, upon the ground that the proceeding against the debtor corporation is not authorized by the act of the 11th of February 1819, in 1 R. C. p. 474, ch. 123. The said motion being argued by counsel, the circuit court, on consideration thereof, ordered that the same be overruled.

From which order an appeal was allowed.

575 *Taylor and G. A. Myers for appellants. The act of February 11, 1819, and the general laws from which it is taken, in substance if not literally, (act of 1744, 5 Hen. St. at large p. 220; 1777, 9 Hen. St. at large p. 396,) clearly relate throughout to natural persons, and not to bodies politic or corporate. The preamble recites, that "whereas creditors have experienced great difficulties in the recovery of debts due from persons residing without the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, but who have effects here sufficient to satisfy and pay such debts; for remedy whereof," &c. The first section then enacts, that "upon affidavit that such defendant or defendants are out of the country, or that upon enquiry at his, her or their usual place of abode, he, she or they could not be found, so as to be served with process;" in all such cases the court may make any order, and require surety if it shall appear necessary, to restrain the defendants in this country from paying, conveying away or secreting the debts by them owing to, or the effects in their hands of, such absent defendant or defendants, &c. The fourth section still more clearly contemplates natural persons, since a foreign corporation surely cannot return and appear openly, and cannot have an "heir, executor or administrator."

It is to be remarked, that the first general law giving this process was passed in 1744, when no corporations, except quasi corporations, such as towns, counties or boroughs, existed in the colony of Virginia at any rate, if they did in any other of the colonies; so that it is impossible to conceive that the legislature contemplated them at that time. The subsequent laws, as observed above, use the same terms as are to be found in the law of 1744; and it cannot fairly be contended that those terms in the present law can be enlarged by interpretation, so as to embrace objects not contemplated by the legislature in the preceding laws, in the absence too of any expression properly applicable to such objects. *If corporations had been intended to be embraced, would not the legislature, who must be presumed to be acquainted with the technical terms which would convey their meaning, have expressly included "bodies politic or corporate" in the law? When such artificial bodies are contemplated, those terms are used by them. For example, in the act (Supplement to Rev. Code, p. 382, ch. 313), "to amend an act more effectually to prevent the circulation of notes emitted by unchartered banks," an act of great importance and intended to check a great and growing evil, while the first section prohibits any person or persons from committing the acts specified therein, the second section explicitly prohibits "any body politic or corporate" from committing similar acts. Surely if, under the words "person or persons," the legislature conceived that artificial persons would be included, they would not have deemed it necessary to use another term in the second section.

This question has never been decided in Virginia, it is believed. But in New York, (where, under the words of the law, 1 New R. L. 157, ch. 49, § 23, it might with much more propriety be contended that corporations were included, than it can be under our statute,) the supreme court decided that the attachment against absent debtors would not lie against the estate of a foreign corporation; for that that law applied to natural persons only, and not to bodies corporate. M'Queen v. The Middletown Manufacturing Company, 16 Johns. Rep. 5. The 23d section of the New York law enacts that the real and personal estate of any debtor, who resides out of the state and is indebted within it, shall be liable to be attached and sold &c. It was contended in that case, in support of the attachment, that a corporation might be a debtor, as well as a natural person; but the court decided as above stated. Now it is conceived that if the term "debtor," taken in connexion with the other provisions of that law, was not deemed sufficiently *comprehensive to embrace corporations, it can be with still less reason contended in this case, that the words "person or persons" are more so. Great inconvenience and embarrassment might be produced, if an opposite construction should prevail. Our banks must provide funds at different points, to enable them to draw, and to conduct their business with safety. At a period of suspension of specie payments recognized by the legislature, if a holder of their paper should apply to any of them to redeem their notes, upon a refusal they may be required to endorse on the notes the time such demand is made, and from that period they become an interest-bearing debt. Provided with such endorsement, the creditor proceeds to some point out of this commonwealth, where he is apprized that the bank has funds, and he attaches them. The most ruinous consequences might ensue, although the institution thus affected is actually protected by the laws of Virginia in the suspension out of which these consequences have arisen.

The case of Bushel & another v. The Commonwealth Insurance Company, 15 Serg. & Rawle 173, will be relied on upon the other side. It appears from the report of that case, that the court was not unanimous. Tilghman, chief justice, was sick and gave no opinion, and the only opinions pronounced are those of Rogers, J., and Duncan, J.,—the latter dissenting from the former. Of these two opinions we rely with great confidence on that of judge Duncan, whose reasoning, it is humbly conceived, is infinitely stronger, and certainly more consistent with the legitimate powers and duties of judicial tribunals, than that of his brother judge, who is driven first to construe the law of foreign attachments as a remedial law, when in truth it is an innovation on the common law and should be construed strictly, and then to declare that the law has undergone changes to suit the times, not by legislative enactments, but by the *"silent legislation of the people themselves"—a species of legislation certainly unknown to us, and not existing, that we are aware, in any community of laws upon earth.

If it be necessary to give this remedy against foreign corporations, the legislature, and not the courts alone, have the power to do so; and we humbly conceive that it is better to leave it thus, than (in the language of judge Duncan) for the courts to "make laws as we go along, put them on the judicial anvil, and with the judicial hammer give them a different shape, and fashion them according to our own notions of right and wrong."

Robinson for appellees. Such construction ought to be put upon a statute as may best answer the intention which the makers had in view; for qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice. Bac. Abr. tit. Statute, Let. I. § 5. A thing which is within the intention of the makers is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter. Ibid. Whenever this intention can be discovered, it ought to be followed, although such construction seem contrary to the letter. Ibid.

In the case of The United States v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 393, the prisoner was indicted under an act of congress making it felony to destroy a vessel with intent "to prejudice any person or persons that hath underwritten." The underwriters in that case being a corporation, it was insisted that a corporation was not a person within the meaning of the act. But the supreme court of the United States overruled the objection. Mr. justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, (p. 412,) said, "If there had been any settled course of decisions on this subject in criminal cases, we should certainly, in a prosecution of this nature, yield to such a construction of the act. But there is no such course of decisions. The mischief intended to be reached by the statute is the same, whether 579 it respects private or corporate persons. *That corporations are in law, for civil purposes, deemed persons, is unquestionable. And the citation from 2 Inst. 736, establishes that they are so deemed within the purview of penal statutes. Lord Coke, there, in commenting on the statute of 31 Eliz. ch. 7, respecting the erection of cottages, where the word used is 'no person shall,' &c. says this extends as well to persons politic and incorporate, as to natural persons whatsoever."

The authorities cited and opinion delivered by the supreme court of New York, in The People v. Utica Insurance Company, 15 Johns. 382, are to the same effect.

It was formerly argued in this court that the statute against usury (1 R. C. 373), did not apply to corporations. By the first section of that statute, the legislature had declared that no person should take for the loan of money above the specified rate, and that all contracts for payment of any money so lent, on which higher interest was reserved, should be void. By the second section, any person taken above the legal rate was made subject to a forfeiture of double the money lent. And by the third section, a borrower was authorized to exhibit a bill in chancery against the lender, and compel him to discover upon oath the amount lent. Though the language thus used, strictly construed, was applicable only to natural persons, and the statute was one of a penal character, this court held nevertheless, (three judges concurring,) that a contract with a corporation on which it reserved more than the interest specified was void. Stribbling v. The Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 141, 2, 148, 9, 189. Judge Cabell said, (p. 190). "The term 'person' used in the law is unquestionably sufficiently comprehensive to embrace corporations, and it must be held to embrace them unless there be something in the law shewing the legislative intention to restrict its application." The other two judges not

580 putting the case on so broad a ground, he agreed with them that even if *it were true that corporations could not be punished under the second section, the contract must be vacated under the first section. For, said he, "the great object was to protect the fleeced borrower, and that object requires that the provision as to vacating the contract should apply to artificial as well as natural persons."

In The Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch 61, the supreme court held, that under the clause of the constitution giving the federal courts jurisdiction of "controversies between citizens of different states," those courts could take jurisdiction of a controversy between a corporation and a citizen.

So far, this question has been considered upon those authorities which, it might be inferred, would take the view the most favourable that could be taken for the other side; the decisions being all of them upon penal statutes, except in one instance, and that a case of constitutional power.

It is, however, much more plain that corporations are embraced in the statute now under consideration, than in the cases which have been cited. While in those cases the statutes were generally penal statutes, and to be construed strictly, thus, it is manifest, is a remedial statute and to be construed liberally. It is laid down that a statute made for the suppression of a fraud, or to give a more speedy remedy for a right, ought to be construed liberally, because such construction is for the furtherance of justice. Bac. Abr. tit. Statute, Let. I. § 8. If this be so, surely a statute which gives a remedy where there was none before, and gives it in a case in which a remedy is necessary for the furtherance of justice, must be construed liberally. Such is the nature of the statute under consideration. It is clearly remedial. And such a construction, we are told, ought to be put upon a remedial statute as will tend to suppress the mischief intended to be remedied. Bac. Abr. tit. Statute, Let. I. § 8.

581 *What was the mischief that this statute intended to remedy? It was, that debtors residing out of this commonwealth had effects here sufficient to satisfy such debts, and yet their creditors remained unpaid. The mischief is the same, whether the debt be due from a corporation or from a natural person; and the remedy must be coextensive with the mischief. If, for the prevention of fraud and the furtherance of justice, the remedy be necessary and proper in the one case, it is equally necessary and proper in the other.

Although then the expression in the preamble, "persons residing without the jurisdiction of this commonwealth," had been adhered to in the act itself, it would nevertheless have been proper to consider corporations as embraced within the act. The argument that they are not persons would have been entitled to no more weight than it received in Beaston v. The Farmers Bank of Delaware, 12 Peters 134, 5. In the language of the court in that case, "corporations are to be deemed and considered as persons, when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in such statutes."

But when we come to the enacting clause, we find the language much more comprehensive. The suit is not confined in terms to persons, but may be "against any defendant or defendants who are out of this country, and others within the same, having in their hands effects of or otherwise indebted to such absent defendant or defendants, or against any such absent defendant or defendants having lands or tenements within the commonwealth." And there is no difficulty in holding a corporation created by another state to be a defendant out of this commonwealth. Nay more, it is, in the language of the preamble, a defendant residing without this commonwealth. For, as is said by the court in The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 31 Peters

588, "a corporation can have no 582 legal existence out of the *boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty. But although it must live and have its being in that state only, yet it does not by any means follow that its existence there will not be recognized in other places; and its existence in one state creates no insuperable objection to its power of contracting in another."

When, by our laws, we permit a corporation created by another state to make within the scope of its powers a contract here, and to sue for and recover debts and effects here, it would be strange indeed if no suit could afterwards be maintained here against the corporation, to subject such debts and effects to the satisfaction of a debt justly due from it.

The words of several clauses of the statute have been commented on by the counsel on the other side. Similar comments were made in the case of Beaston v. The Farmers Bank of Delaware, and proved of no avail. True it is, that in the present case affidavit could not be made, that upon enquiry at the defendants' usual place of abode they could not be found. But neither could that be done in the case of a natural person who never had his abode in the commonwealth. Against such a person, as against a corporation, the affidavit would be, that the defendant or defendants are out of the commonwealth. In the language of the court in 12 Peters 135, the fact that the corporation "cannot be brought within all the predicaments stated in the statute proves nothing, if it can be brought within any one or more of them." It was argued in that case, that a corporation could not be a deceased debtor with an insufficiency of assets in the hands of executors or administrators; that its effects could not 583 be attached as those *of an absent, concealed, or absconding debtor (p. 124). But the court held the argument insufficient; and its judgment is a condemnation of that now urged under the fourth section of our statute. If a corporation created by another state cannot "appear openly within this commonwealth," so as to be served with a copy of the decree, the consequence simply is, that the bar arising from the lapse of twelve months after such appearance, without petitioning for a rehearing, will never exist against a corporation; but such corporation, not appearing in a suit against it, will only be barred after the lapse of seven years from the time of the decree.

The argument, that when the law first passed giving this remedy, no corporations existed here except those for municipal government, militates against the purpose for which it is used. For, while it accounts for the absence in the act of such words as "bodies politic or corporate," it does not shew in the least that the law-makers would have been unwilling to comprehend corporations. Such words as bodies politic or corporate, it is said, are now used when the legislature means to comprehend them; and an instance is given of their use in a statute. It is sufficient to say, that the statute referred to is of a penal character and of modern date.

The view taken of this question has been more extended than would have been deemed necessary but for the decision of the supreme court of New York in the case of M'Queen v. The Middletown Manufacturing Company, 16 Johns. 5. In that case the conclusion of the court upon the whole act of New York was, that the legislature intended to authorize proceedings under it against natural persons only. Since that decision, a motion has been made in the supreme court of Pennsylvania to dissolve an attachment, on the ground that a foreign corporation is not within the act of that state of 1705, nor liable to attachment by the custom of London. And after a very full investigation of the subject, 584 the *court has come to the conclusion (Rogers and Gibson, now C. J., concurring) that foreign corporations are liable to foreign attachments. 15 Serg. & Rawle 173.

It is argued that inconvenience and embarrassment might result from holding that a remedy exists under our statute against a corporation created by another state. And the reason assigned is, that effects in another state of one of our banks might be attached in that state, at a time when the bank is protected by our laws. This will still be so, no matter what the decision in the present case. No decision of this court can, for example, prevent a proceeding in Pennsylvania by foreign attachment against a corporation created by this or any other state. No such decision can prevent such a proceeding now in New York. For, since the decision in 16 Johns. 5, the legislature of New York has passed a statute giving a remedy in that state against a foreign corporation by attachment. 2 R. S. 459, § 15, and p. 375 of 2d edi. § 15, cited in Bennett v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 19 Wend. 46. Such a statute, passed by the legislature of so commercial a state, is the best possible refutation of all the arguments advanced to show that good policy forbids the existence of such a remedy.

ALLEN, J. The preamble of the act directing the method of proceeding against absent debtors recites, that creditors have experienced great difficulties in the recovery of debts due from persons residing without the jurisdiction of the commonwealth. Under this law, the plaintiffs in the court below sued out their foreign attachment against the bank of the United States; and the question is presented, whether the attachment lies against this corporation of another state?

The remedy given by this statute is an innovation upon the common law, and, as has been frequently observed by the judges, liable to great abuse. The legislature, foreseeing that an ex parte proceeding 585 of this *kind might be abused, have been careful to regulate it, and to provide sufficient security to indemnify the absent defendant for any damage improperly sustained. This court, in Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 306, held that the mode pointed out must be pursued, and the requisitions of the statute strictly conformed to. But though the court is watchful in exacting a compliance with the terms of the law, this does not change its character. The statute is remedial. It gives a remedy where none existed before. This is admitted by Judge Carr, who always looked upon the proceeding with jealousy. He remarks in Kelso v. Blackburn, that the law was founded on the necessity of the case, lest there should be an absolute failure of justice. If the statute was necessary to suppress a mischief, and is remedial, the cases to which it extends must be ascertained by those rules of construction which are applied to the interpretation of all remedial statutes. Such statutes are to receive a liberal construction: they are to be so construed as may best answer the intention of the maker; and where a statute introduces a new remedy, the interpretation should be such as will tend to suppress the mischief and be in furtherance of justice. In cases arising under this act, it has received a liberal construction and been extended beyond the letter. The preamble mentions the difficulties experienced in the recovery of debts due. This would seem to confine the remedy to the case of a debt then payable, and for the recovery of which an action could then be maintained if the defendant were within the commonwealth. But in Williams &c. v. Bowie &c., 6 Munf. 176, it was decided that the attachment would lie to secure a note executed by the absentee and endorsed by the attaching creditor, although, at the time of suing out the attachment, the note had not been paid and was not then due.

The first section requires an affidavit of nonresidence, or of ineffectual enquiry 586 at the usual place of abode. *Taking this in connexion with the fourth section where the act speaks of the defendant's returning and appearing openly, it might be argued from the literal import of the terms, that the remedy was confined to those defendants who had at one time been residents and subject to the jurisdiction of the commonwealth. But in Peter v. Butler, 1 Leigh 285, it was determined, that a claim arising on a contract of bailment made out of Virginia, against a nonresident, is a claim for debt for which the foreign attachment lies; thus applying the remedy where the defendant had never been subject to the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, where the contract was made without the state, and where the plaintiff's demand was not liquidated, but sounded in damages.

It has been suggested that the law can be applied to those cases only, where the defendant would, if within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, be liable to be sued; and that this cannot be predicated of a foreign corporation, for it can have no legal existence without the bounds of the sovereignty which created it. The fact might be conceded, and yet the consequence does not necessarily follow. There is nothing in the act restricting it to defendants who could be sued if within the commonwealth. The law extends to all nonresidents. Whilst they continue without the state, they never could be subject to the jurisdiction of the commonwealth; and the law was passed to enable the creditors to reach their effects, because they would not submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the state. And can it make any difference in the operation of the act, whether the jurisdiction of the commonwealth is prevented from attaching by the defendant's remaining out of the state, or because he can never come within it? If the defendant is a non-resident, (to whatever cause owing) so as to be without the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, and has effects subject to its 587 jurisdiction, *the case is made out to which the law was intended to apply.

If this were an act to force an appearance,—to compel the defendant, by attaching his effects, to appear to an ordinary action, it might be contended with much force, that the act could apply to such defendants only as would be liable to suit if within the jurisdiction of the state. The law might be considered as ancillary to the ordinary proceeding; a mere substitution of one form of process for another; and being but an incident to the principal subject, ought not to be construed as extending to cases where without it the court could not take jurisdiction.

This was the difficulty in the cases referred to, decided in Pennsylvania and New York. In the former state they have no chancery court. The case of Bushel & Co. v. The Commonwealth Ins. Co., 15 Serg. & Rawle 173, was a proceeding at law. It appears from the report of the case, that by their statute the defendant was authorized to appear upon putting in bail to the action. Natural justice demands that in all such laws a provision should be made to enable the absentee, on certain conditions, to appear and controvert the justice of the claim set up against him. This law did contain such a provision; but it was one of which the absent defendant, being a corporation, could not take advantage. A recognizance of special bail could not be acknowledged for it, as the condition to surrender the body was impossible. It was therefore insisted that the law could not be so construed as to embrace corporations. But even in that case the objection was overruled and the jurisdiction sustained.

The supreme court of New York in M'Queen v. The Middletown Manu. Co., 16 Johns. Rep. 4, gave a different construction to their statute against absconding or absent debtors, and held that the attachment authorized by that act did not lie 588 against a corporation. The 23d *section of their act used the phrase "every debtor who resides without the state." These words, if they had stood alone, would have comprehended corporations. But the court, taking the 23d in connexion with other sections of the act, held that natural persons only were included. For this construction reliance was mainly placed on the 21st section, which provided that the debtor might supersede the attachment, upon giving security to appear and plead to any action of law or in equity brought against him in the state within six months. This supposed that the defendant would, if within the state, be subject to an ordinary suit. In requiring security to be given to appear and plead to any such action, the makers, it is to be presumed, meant to confine the remedy to such defendants as could place themselves in that predicament,—subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the courts. In the case of a foreign corporation, there was no person upon whom process could be served, and therefore no mode of instituting an action against it. For, in the language of the supreme court of the United States in The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters 588, "a corporation exists only in contemplation of law and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty." Though there had been no conflict in the opinions of the two courts referred to, and both had decided under their laws that the attachment did not lie, the decisions would not have affected the construction of our statute. The law in each case contemplated a legal proceeding in the ordinary tribunals and in the accustomed mode.

Nothing of the kind is found in our act. The whole jurisdiction is confided to a court of equity. The proceeding is a bill for relief. The defendant may appear: this a corporation can do by attorney. The 589 defendant *can discharge the attached effects by giving security to perform the decree: such security may be given for a corporation by a third party, or it can deposite the amount in court. And whether the defendant appears and answers or not, the court hears the case upon the proofs and pronounces a final decree. In Beaston v. The Farmers Bank of Delaware, 12 Peters 134, 5, the court say that corporations are to be deemed and considered as persons, when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons included in the statute. The circumstances in which they are placed by our act are identical with those of the natural person who continues without the state. The same opportunity, and to the same extent, is afforded to each for defending the suit; and after the seven years have expired, the decree is conclusive as to both, without the service of a copy, or any thing more being done. None of the reasons which created a doubt under the laws of New York and Pennsylvania apply: no action at law, no ulterior proceeding in the accustomed mode is provided for or contemplated.

Upon principle, and in view of the construction given to the act in the cases occurring under it, the jurisdiction, I think, may be maintained. But if this were more doubtful than it seems to me it is, there are other grounds upon which the jurisdiction may be supported.

For civil purposes, corporations are in law deemed persons. The United States v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 393. This proposition has not been controverted. In the case of Beaston v. The Farmers Bank of Delaware, above cited, the question arose whether the act of congress giving priority in certain cases to the United States extended to corporations? The words of the act are, "When any revenue officer or other person becoming indebted &c." The court decided that corporations were included. So in Stribbling v. The Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 132, the word person in the law 590 against usury was held to *embrace corporations. The only doubt has been whether that word would be so construed as to embrace them within the purview of penal statutes: and in the case of The United States v. Amedy, the court, upon the authority of lord Coke in 2 Inst. 736, decided, that under the act of congress making it felony to destroy a vessel with intent to prejudice any person or persons that hath underwritten, corporations were comprehended by the words person or persons. The word being sufficiently comprehensive to embrace corporations, "it must be held to embrace them" (in the language of judge Cabell in Stribbling v. The Bank of the Valley) "unless there be something in the law shewing the legislative intention to restrict its application." Were it necessary, this construction might be supported by a reference to the enacting clause. The language there is, "a suit in chancery against a defendant or defendants out of the state;" terms sufficiently broad to include every party, whether natural or artificial, capable of being sued. A corporation is as much within the mischief as a natural person. It is capable of contracting, of holding effects. There is nothing in the law restricting the remedy to natural persons; and the terms being sufficiently extensive to include corporations, the jurisdiction, it seems to me, is clear.

I am for affirming the order.

STANARD, J., dissented, and stated that Brooke, J., who had had the benefit of the argument and had examined the case, authorized him to say, that if he could have been present at the decision, he should also have dissented.

But BALDWIN, J., and CABELL, P., concurring with Allen, J., the order was affirmed.

There is no limitation by statute, to an action of debt, or scire facias on a judgment, except only in the case of a judgment on which no execution has been taken out. Randolph v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490. See Fleming v. Dunlop, 4 Leigh 338.

the suit is brought, and the defendant, when the cause is called, moves for a continuance, he must, according to the act 1 R. C. 1819, p. 508, ch. 128, § 78, shew good cause for such continuance; otherwise the court, although it be the first term, will try the cause at that term.

Same—Same.—What is not good cause for a continuance.

Accord and Satisfaction—Plea Insufficient.§—In debt on a judgment the defendant pleads, that by an agreement in writing between the parties, the judgment was discharged and satisfied by a new contract, for the payment of a sum in cash, which was then paid, and for the payment of the balance by deferred instalments, whereby the said judgment was remitted and released, and accord and satisfaction thereof made. The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and the demurrer was sustained.

Novation—Specialty—Discharge of Instruments.—In Moore v. Johnson, 34 W. Va. 679, 13 S. E. Rep. 921, the court said: "The old common law was that a specialty could not be discharged by a parol undertaking (5 Rob. Pr. 740; Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh 273; note a, 1 Tuck. Bl. Comm. 389; 1 Chit. Pl. 524); and, as pertinent to this matter of novation, three cases in Virginia hold that, to make one instrument an extinguishment of another, the new must be of higher dignity than the old, and an express agreement that the note shall extinguish the specialty would be a nudum pactum, and if the note is not paid the bond will still live, notwithstanding the agreement that it should be discharged (McGuire v. Gadsby, 3 Call 234; Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 501; Parker v. Cousins, 2 Gratt. 373; Bank v. Good, 31 W. Va. 465)." The principal case is cited in Bank v. Good, 31 W. Va. 465; *Bantz v. Same—Same—Same—Order Book—Principal Case Distinguished.—If a rejected plea is by order of the court made a part of the record, and the order book shows, that its rejection was excepted to, the supreme court of appeals will review the action of the court in rejecting such plea, though no formal bill of exceptions was taken to the rejection of such plea. Sweeney v. Baker, 18 W. Va. 160, citing and distinguishing the principal case, White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347, and Morrisett's Case, 6 Gratt. 673, in the following language on page 212: "These cases all differ from the case before us in this, that in all of them the record did not show, that the rejection of the pleas were excepted to by the defendants. In each of them not only was no bill of exceptions filed, but no entry was made on the order book, that the defendants objected, or excepted to the action of the court in rejecting their pleas. But in the case before us the order book expressly states, when these pleas were rejected, the defendants' exception to the ruling of the court in rejecting them."

The decision in White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347, that where pleas are rejected an appellate court will take it to have been rightly done unless the defendant has excepted, approved and acted on.

On the 6th of April 1835, James W. Clemens administrator and Elizabeth Harkins administratrix of William Harkins deceased, commenced an action of debt in the circuit court of Norfolk borough against John Herrington. The declaration demanded 1250 dollars with interest thereon from the 20th day of August 1817, and 8 dollars 75 cents costs of suit. The first count set forth *that William Harkins in his lifetime, to wit, on the 20th of August 1817, at the August term of the court of the county of Ohio in the state of Virginia, recovered against the defendant the sum of 1250 dollars with interest, and 8 dollars 75 cents, as demanded; that afterwards in the lifetime of the said William Harkins, to wit, on the 21st of August 1817, a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum was issued upon the said judgment, which writ was never executed or returned; and that the said judgment still remains in full force and effect, not reversed, satisfied or otherwise vacated. The second count was similar, with the additional allegation that the said William Harkins, in his lifetime, and the plaintiffs since his death, have not obtained any other execution or satisfaction of or upon the said judgment.

The defendant demurred generally to the declaration, and the plaintiffs joining in the demurrer, the same was argued and overruled. The defendant then pleaded payment, upon which an issue was joined.

On the 15th of June 1835, subpoenas were issued for the defendant's witnesses, returnable to the 18th of that month; one for Ann Jeffrey and John Vangover, directed to the sergeant of Norfolk borough, the other for William Carter, directed to the sergeant of Petersburg, both of which subpoenas were returned executed. When the cause was called, the defendant moved for a continuance upon his own affidavit that these three persons were all important witnesses for him, and that he could not safely go to trial without them, and upon the statement of his counsel that William Carter, one of the said witnesses, was absent. The motion for a continuance was opposed by the plaintiffs, on the ground that they had incurred great trouble &c. in procuring from the county of Ohio two witnesses, who were then present, and upon the further ground of the insufficiency of the said affidavit. At the suggestion and request of the plaintiffs' counsel, the court

593 directed that the defendant, *who resided in town, should be sent for; and upon his coming in shortly afterwards, the court, being then informed that the witness Carter had arrived in town, permitted the defendant, assisted by one of the officers of the court, to go and endeavour to obtain the immediate attendance of Carter, and also the attendance of the other witnesses named in the affidavit. The court was kept open until night, waiting for the defendant and his witnesses; but some of the witnesses having failed to come, because (in the language of the bill of exceptions) "the defendant would not or could not find the said witnesses," the court adjourned until the next day, with the understanding that the case would be called and tried on that day. On the next day the case being accordingly called, the defendant appeared in court, and by his counsel offered, in addition to the plea of payment upon which issue was previously joined, five special pleas in writing, and again urged the court (not upon oath, but through his counsel) to continue the case, for the following reasons: 1. because the suit had been but very recently brought, and his counsel therefore did not expect it would be tried; 2. because the defendant desires and expects to prove (but without saying by whom) that he the defendant was in the town of Petersburg at the time of the rendition of the judgment in the declaration mentioned, when in fact, as the defendant alleges, the individual against whom the said judgment was rendered was in court, and actually present at the rendition thereof; and 3. because his counsel, in consequence of their engagements, had not had sufficient time to prepare his defence. But the witness Carter (on account of whose alleged absence the motion had been urged) and the witness Vangover having both appeared in court, and Ann Jeffrey, who lives in Norfolk, having, as well as the defendant himself, been present in court the previous afternoon when notice was given that 594 the case would be tried, and the court being satisfied *that if the defendant had used due diligence he could have produced her, the motion was overruled. To this decision the defendant excepted. In the bill of exceptions it was stated, that the court believed, from the evasive and equivocating conduct and deportment of the defendant, that in making the said application he was induced by no honest purpose, but by the desire to delay the trial, and probably, as the consequence of it, to produce the final loss of the plaintiffs' demand, by the death of their witnesses or otherwise.

In the transcript of the record, the five pleas in writing were copied. They were as follows: 1. That the defendant is not the same John Herrington mentioned in the record of the county court of Ohio. 2. That the judgment has been paid off and fully discharged by the special bail of the said John Herrington. 3. That the said William Harkins in his lifetime, to wit, on the 8th of May 1818, for and in consideration of the sum of 666 dollars and two thirds of a dollar, did acquit, release and discharge the said special bail, who was bail for the said John Herrington in the proceedings of Ohio court mentioned, and thereby the said judgment was, by operation of law, fully and entirely satisfied and of no farther force. 4. That the plaintiffs are barred by the statute of limitations entitled "an act for limitation of actions, for preventing frivolous and vexatious suits, concerning jeofails and certain proceedings in civil cases," from having and maintaining their action against him, because he says that 17 years and 6 months had elapsed from the rendition of the said judgment to the institution of this suit. 5. That the judgment of the county court of Ohio was, by an agreement between the said William Harkins and the said John Herrington in writing, in the possession of the said William Harkins, discharged and satisfied by a new contract, for the payment of 400 dollars in cash, which was then and there paid, and the balance of the said 595 amount was to *be paid by deferred instalments; whereby the said judgment was remitted and released, and accord and satisfaction thereof made.

In that part of the transcript of the record wherein the pleas were introduced, it was stated that the defendant, with the leave of the court, filed five pleas in writing, in hæc verba. After copying the pleas, it was stated that to the first of the said pleas the plaintiffs replied generally, and put themselves upon the country, and the defendant likewise; that the plaintiffs objecting to the filing of the second and third, the court rejected the same; that to the fourth the plaintiffs filed a special replication; and that to the fifth they demurred.

The replication to the fourth plea was in general terms, that the plaintiffs were not barred by the statute of limitations mentioned in the plea from having and maintaining their said action. It concluded to the country, and issue was joined on it.

In the demurrer to the fifth plea the defendant joined, and the demurrer, being argued, was sustained by the court.

Thereupon, to wit, on the 19th of June 1835, a jury was sworn to try the issues joined on the plea of payment and on the first and fourth pleas. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment was rendered on the same.

To this judgment, on the petition of the defendant, a supersedeas was awarded.

Braxton for plaintiff in error. The court erred in overruling the motion for a continuance. It was not only a new issue in a case for the first time on the docket, but the suit had been brought only 73 days before it was called for trial. Nevertheless it was tried when the state of the pleadings was necessarily embarrassed, when the counsel of the defendant, in consequence of other professional engagements, was 596 not prepared *for the trial, and when one of the defendant's witnesses was absent. The defendant had sued out a subpoena and had it regularly served on Ann Jeffrey in due time. He had done all that was in his power for securing the attendance of the witness; and if she did live in Norfolk borough, it by no means follows that the party could have procured her attendance at the trial.

The demurrer to the declaration was improperly overruled; for, besides other objections, the claim on the face of the declaration appears to be barred by the statute of limitations. Fleming's ex'or v. Dunlop &c., 4 Leigh 338. The second plea was also improperly rejected, and the demurrer to the fifth improperly sustained.

G. N. Johnson for defendants in error. The various and inconsistent defences put forward by the defendant tend strongly to shew of themselves that the only object of the party was delay.

The statute of limitations cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer to the declaration. It can only be availed of by plea; and where the plea is not special, but the general issue, the record must shew that the statute was relied upon as a defence under it. Here the defendant pleaded the statute specially; the issue on that plea was found for the plaintiffs, and no objection was taken by the defendant to that finding. Besides, the declaration does not shew when the suit was instituted, and so it does not appear what length of time had elapsed between the judgment and the bringing of the action; the writ not being made a part of the record by oyer.

But if it be necessary to consider the effect of the statute, the opinion in Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 493, is in point. Judge Green there lays down, that there is no limitation by statute to an action of debt or scire facias upon a 597 judgment, except only in the *case of a judgment on which no execution has been taken out, and in cases against executors or administrators upon a judgment against the decedent.

The court had the right, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to reject the second as well as the third plea. Reed v. Hanna's ex'or, 3 Rand. 56. The matter was already put in issue by the plea of payment before filed. Besides, the rule that matter amounting to the general issue shall not be received in the form of a special plea, if objected to, is applicable; for the plea of payment is regarded as a general issue in this state. Henderson &c. v. Southall &c., 4 Call 371. Certainly a special plea of payment by a particular person (as the bail) is idle and unnecessary. In The King v. Johnson, 6 East 597, the objection was, that the plea was an argumentative plea of not guilty; and here the plea is an argumentative plea of payment.

The demurrer to the 5th plea was properly sustained. 1 Bac. Abr. title Accord. letter A.; 1 Com. Dig. title Accord. A. 1, pl. 8, A. 2, pl. 4, 5, B. 1, pl. 2, 5, B. 2, pl. 2, B. 4, pl. 1, 3; Fitch v. Sutton, 5 East 230; Harrison v. Close &c., 2 Johns. Rep. 448. In this case the agreement stated was no satisfaction of the judgment. It was in truth an agreement without consideration and void, so far as regarded the excess of the amount recovered by the judgment, over the amount paid in cash.

The attorney general on the same side. The grounds of continuance set out in the bill of exceptions were merely stated by the counsel, and not sworn to by the defendant. The grounds themselves were moreover wholly insufficient, even if they had been verified by affidavit. They were altogether too vague and uncertain.

The objection to the declaration, that it shews the judgment barred by the statute of limitations, can at most apply but to one count; for the first does not contain any statement that no new execution had been sued out. But the question as to the effect of the statute cannot arise at all upon demurrer to the declaration. It is not necessary, therefore, to go into an argument to shew that an action of debt upon the judgment is not barred.

The second and fifth pleas were properly overruled. For the second does not aver that there was any special bail, nor who he was, nor when or where he paid. And the fifth pleads a mere parol agreement unexecuted, in bar of the action on the judgment.

Lyons on the same side. As the witnesses whose materiality was sworn to were all brought into court before the trial, the affidavit of the defendant may be thrown out of the case. It is obvious from the fact that the first special plea is wholly inconsistent with the second, and with the general plea of payment, that the motion for a continuance was a mere scheme to procure delay.

The demurrer to the declaration cannot raise the question whether the judgment is barred by the statute of limitations. Blanchard on Lim. 141. As there were issues made up on a plea of payment, a plea of the statute of limitations, and a plea denying the identity of the defendant, the proper mode of presenting any of the questions involved in those issues to the review of this court was, by moving the court at the trial to instruct the jury, or, after the trial, to grant a new trial, and excepting to the refusal of the court to give the instruction or award the new trial.

The fifth plea was clearly bad. Peploe v. Galliers, 4 J. B. Moore 163; 16 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 371; Kaye v. Waghorne, 1 Taunt. 428; Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East 251; Scholey &c. v. Mearns, 7 East 148. Accord and satisfaction cannot be pleaded to an action on a record. 1 Saund. on Plead. & Ev. 27.

599 *Braxton in reply. The want of an affidavit to the statements of the defendant's counsel was no ground for refusing the continuance. Such an affidavit is never required in practice. If the motion was disposed of on the first day, the refusal of the continuance was clearly erroneous, as there was then before the court the defendant's own affidavit of the materiality of the witnesses who had been summoned and were not in attendance: if the motion was kept open until the second day, the reasons of the court for then overruling it were wholly insufficient; for even if the defendant's witnesses were then in Norfolk, (which does not appear to be established by any thing in the record) that fact would not shew that the defendant could, by any exertion of his, have brought them to the court. [Stanard, J. In such case, is it not the usual practice to bring in the witness by attachment, instead of granting a continuance on account of his absence?] I believe that such practice is not usual, where the action is newly brought, and the case is for the first time called for trial. Even if no one of the circumstances in this case were of itself sufficient to entitle the defendant to a continuance, yet the whole of them taken together constitute ground of the strongest description.

The authorities do not sustain the general proposition, that the defence of the statute of limitations is not available without pleading the statute. In assumpsit, it is true, the defendant must plead it specially. Gould v. Johnson, 2 Ld. Raym. 838; Lee v. Rogers, 1 Levinz 110; Hodsdon v. Harridge, 2 Wms. Saund. 63, note 6. But in debt it is otherwise: the defence of the statute may be availed of under the general issue of nil debet. Ballant. on Lim. 215; Draper v. Glassop, 1 Ld. Raym. 153. [Stanard, J. The defendant is required to avail himself of the statute by plea rather than demurrer, that the plaintiff may have an opportunity of bringing himself, if he can, within the exceptions.]

600 *In Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 493, the execution had been returned, and judge Green's remark, relied upon by the other side, was not applicable to the case then before the court. In Fleming's ex'or v. Dunlop &c., 4 Leigh 338, the proceeding was by scire facias, and an execution sued out on the judgment had not been returned. The remark of Tucker, P., that where execution has issued, though no return be made thereon, the action of debt is not barred, like the remark of judge Green just adverted to, had no application to the case before him. Upon the just construction of the statute, both the scire facias and the action of debt are barred after the lapse of ten years from the date of the judgment, where no execution has been returned.

ALLEN, J. The only question of interest in this case is whether the statute of limitations was a bar to the recovery. The defendant, improperly as it appears to me, attempted to rely on the statute of limitations by a general demurrer. This was overruled. But the defence was presented by an informal plea, to which there was an equally informal replication, concluding to the country, when in fact the pleadings presented a mere question of law. There was a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment. This judgment I consider as a decision of the court upon the law; and if correct, it ought not to be disturbed because the issue tried by the jury may have been informal.

In Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490, judge Green remarked, that there is no limitation by statute to an action of debt or scire facias upon a judgment, except only in the case of a judgment on which no execution has been taken out, and in case of executors &c. The correctness of this observation, as to a scire facias where an execution had been taken out and not returned, came under the consideration of this court in Fleming's ex'or v. Dunlop &c., 4 Leigh 338. There an execution had been sued out within the year, and another at a subsequent period, but neither returned; and to a scire facias sued out more than ten years after the judgment, the statute was held to be a bar. But judge Tucker concurred with judge Green in the opinion that debt would not be barred.

At common law there was no limitation to the action of debt; nothing but the presumption of payment or satisfaction, arising from a delay to proceed upon the judgment for 20 years. This being the law, the statute provided that judgments, where execution hath not issued, may be revived by scire facias or an action of debt brought thereon within ten years next after the date of such judgment, and not after. No other reference is made to the action of debt. At common law, if no execution was issued within the year, a presumption of satisfaction or release was raised, and the plaintiff was driven to his action of the judgment. To this the statute of Westminster the 2d superadded a scire facias, to give the plaintiff the benefit of the original judgment. And the first provision in the 5th section of our statute limits the remedy to ten years.

Where an execution had issued but was not returned, the execution could not be kept alive for want of continuances on the roll, and the party was driven to his scire facias or action. 4 Leigh 343. The second clause of the 5th section was designed to relieve the plaintiff from this inconvenience, and does so by authorizing him to obtain other executions within ten years without a scire facias. But unless he procures a return on the execution within the ten years, the act is a bar to obtaining any other execution on the judgment. But nothing is said as to the action of debt. Where the legislature intended to limit the recovery by action, as in the case first provided for, where no execution ever issued, they have done so by express words. Their attention was directed to the subject; and as they have *dropped the action of debt in the second clause, by which they designed to limit the time of proceeding on the same judgment, it would be a forced construction to hold that it was embraced by any equitable interpretation of the statute.

The 6th section, which contains a saving in favour of persons labouring under disabilities, conforms to the 5th, and shews the extent to which the legislature intended to proceed, and that the omission of the action of debt in the second provision of the 5th section was not owing to inadvertence. The first provision of the 6th section relates to the first provision of the 5th. As by that, where no execution had issued, the remedy by scire facias or action of debt was limited to ten years, by the proviso in the 6th a further time is allowed in similar cases, after the disability is removed, for reviving by scire facias or action. Here the action of debt is again specified. The second provision of the 6th section, corresponding with the second provision of the 5th, by which, where an execution had issued and not been returned, the party was allowed to obtain other executions, allows a further time to obtain executions on the identical judgment after the disability is removed, but is silent as to the action of debt.

It seems to me, therefore, that as it appears an execution was sued out within the year and not returned, though a scire facias to obtain another execution on the same judgment would have been barred, the bar does not apply to the action of debt.

As to the other questions presented by the record, it seems to me the court did right in overruling the motion for a continuance, and in sustaining the demurrer to the fifth plea. As to the second and third pleas, there is no exception to the decision of the court rejecting them. In White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347, it was determined, that if pleas be tendered by the defendant and rejected by the court, and he take no exception *to the rejection of them, he shall be presumed in the appellate court to have acquiesced. In this case, it is true, the record sets out that the pleas were filed: but this, in view of the subsequent motion to reject, and the action of the court, I consider as a mere note of the clerk, and as shewing nothing more than that the pleas were tendered.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurring, the judgment was affirmed.

The subject has also been included in many of the monographic notes of this series, and attention is directed to the notes on the specific subjects for a more complete collection of cases.

II. OPERATION AND EFFECT.

1. STATUTE OF REPOSE.—Statutes of limitation are to be enforced by the courts like any other statute. They are statutes of repose, and are dictated by a wise policy founded upon the presumption against him, who has unreasonably delayed the assertion of his demand, and in favor of him who has long exercised the dominion of owner. Virginia, etc., Co. v. Hoover, 82 Va. 449, 4 S. E. Rep. 689; Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 187; Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 421; Smith v. Chapman, 10 Gratt. 445; Anderson v. Harvey, 10 Gratt. 386.

2. MODE OF TESTING APPLICATION.—The proper mode of testing the application of the statute of limitations is to enquire, not whether the plaintiff might have brought at a given time a premature or groundless action, as where it has been suspended or discharged, but whether his cause of action had accrued—whether he had the right to sue, and was bound to do so, in order to prevent or suspend the running of the statute. Horner v. Speed, 2 P. & H. 616.

3. EFFECT OF STATUTE ON PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT.

Remedy Barred.—In a suit to enforce a debt the statute of limitations bars the remedy but does not extinguish the debt, and therefore if it be secured by a deed of trust, though no action may be brought for its recovery, the lien of the deed is not affected by any lapse of time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388, citing Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243; Pitzer v. Burns, 7 W. Va. 68; Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 675; Ross v. Norvell, 1 Wash. 14; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 187; Smith v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 33 Gratt. 617.

The right to enforce a deed of trust is barred by the presumption of payment, which arises after the lapse of twenty years, and this bar is not affected by the provision for a statute of limitations for trust deeds by Acts 1897-8, p. 316. Turnbull v. Mann, 99 Va. 41, 37 S. E. Rep. 288.

In West Virginia the period of twenty years is still the time within which the lien of a trust deed or mortgage may be enforced, notwithstanding the fact that by statute the limitation of the right of entry on land has been made less than twenty years. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 674.

The fact that a debt secured by a deed of trust is barred by the statute of limitations, does not, as a general rule, extinguish the security or prevent the enforcement of the lien by suit. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 674.

The reduction of the limitation to an action of ejectment does not reduce the time in which presumption of payment arises. Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388.

4. DISTINGUISHED FROM PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT.—There is a recognized distinction between the statute of limitations, and the presumption of payment from lapse of time, the condition of the parties, and their relations towards each other. In the former case the bar is absolute; in the latter it is a rule of evidence, and may be rebutted. Clendenning v. Thompson, 91 Va. 518, 23 S. E. Rep. 233.

5. RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT.

In General.—A statute changing the period of limitations will not be applied to antecedent transactions, unless its letter or necessary intent demand a retroactive construction. Walker v. Burgess, 44 W. Va. 399, 30 S. E. Rep. 99; Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. Rep. 736. And though the statutes of limitation do not destroy the right, but affect only the remedy, the West Virginia court has applied this rule to such statutes in numerous cases. State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 437; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447. Thus the following clause contained in ch. 4, Acts 1895, "but if such transfer or charge is admitted to record within eight months after it is made, then such suit to be available must be brought within four months after such transfer or charge was admitted to record," does not apply to transfers or charges in existence prior to the passage of such enactment, which was on February 10, 1895. Casto v. Greer, 44 W. Va. 332, 30 S. E. Rep. 100.

Construction.—Statutes of limitation are never to be construed retrospectively, unless such construction is required by express command, or by necessary and unavoidable implication. Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 437.

Limitation of Actions on Indemnifying Bonds.—The proviso in the act of Feb. 28, 1828 (Sup. Rev. Code 372, sec. 1), limiting actions on indemnifying bonds to seven years, does not apply to an action on a bond executed prior to the passage of the act. Daval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24.

Extension of Time on Implied Contracts.—The general limitation act, ch. 102, Acts 1862, extending the period of the statute of limitations in certain cases, is constitutional when applied to an implied contract, and where the act applies, a party may go back more than five years before the suit is brought, in an account for rents and profits. Sturm v. Fleming, 31 W. Va. 701, 8 S. E. Rep. 263.

Express Contracts.—Acts of 1872-73, ch. 112, providing for the elimination of the time when rights were obstructed by war, and the Acts of 1873-4, ch. 28, providing also for elimination of the time during which persons cannot make the "Suitors' Test Oath," prescribed by sec. 27, ch. 106, of the Code of 1860, although they are retrospective in their operation, are constitutional when applied to actions on express contracts although the action was barred by the statute of limitations when those acts were passed. Huffman v. Alderson, 9 W. Va. 616.

Judgments.—The fifth section of the act of limitations of 1792 does not apply to judgments which existed before the act took effect. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

The ten years' statute of limitations, which in sec. 11, 12, ch. 139, of the Code 1860, is made applicable to judgments, applies to judgments rendered before the 1st day of April, 1860, at which date the Code took effect. Northwestern Bank v. Hays, 37 W. Va. 475, 16 S. E. Rep. 561.

Section 8, ch. 141, and sections 11 and 12, ch. 139, of the W. Va. Code 1881, prescribing limitations as to the time in which execution may issue upon a judgment, apply alike to judgments obtained before and to judgments obtained since the Code went into effect. Spang v. Robinson, 24 W. Va. 227. See generally, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Open Account.—In Brooke v. Shelly, 4 H. & M. 201, the act of 1792, which makes it the duty of the court to expunge, in an action upon an open account against an executor or administrator, all items appearing to have been due five years prior to the death of the testator or intestate, was construed to apply to open accounts existing before the first of October, 1793, when the act took effect.

Vendor's Lien or Owelty of Partition.—Prior to the Code of 1887, there was no statutory limit to the enforcement of a vendor's lien, or the lien for owelty of partition, but they continued to exist until waived, released, satisfied, or until payment was presumed. If the statute, sec. 2935, Code of 1887, applies to a lien for owelty of partition, it has no application to a case where the creation of the lien arose prior to the enactment of the statute. Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. Rep. 861.

Action for Recovery of Land.—The act of the legislature of West Virginia passed February 6, 1873, in so far as it attempts, in actions for the recovery of land, to exclude from the time fixed as the bar in such action by the statute of limitations, the period from the 28th day of February, 1865, to the date of the passage of the act, is unconstitutional and inoperalive as to actions which had become barred before the passage of the act. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 818. See monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

6. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES OF LIMITATION.

Reviving Remedy.—A distinction is made between the case of a remedy revived by an act of the legislature, which is lost by reason of a statute of limitations, and the case of a remedy cut off or destroyed by the same authority. The former does not violate the obligation of a contract; the latter does. The former is a privilege which may be conferred by the same power by which it was divested; the latter affects the vested rights of a party. Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 138, 6 Am. Rep. 270; Caperton v. Bowyer, 4 W. Va. 176. See for discussion and collection of authority, monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

Same—Recovery of Property.—The effect of the statutory bar in actions on express contracts, and in actions to recover possession of property, is essentially different, according to the uniform decisions of the courts. When an action in the first class is barred by the statute the remedy only is regarded as taken away and the right remains. But in the last class, and especially in the actions of ejectment and detinue, the rule is very different. It is well settled in such cases that the bar of the statute not only takes away the remedy, but it has the effect of transferring and vesting an absolute title in the possessor of the property. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 324. This subject is elaborated, with many authorities in the monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

Constitutionality of Acts Suspending Statute.—The several acts of the government of Virginia during the war suspending the statute of limitations, were valid to prevent the running of said statute to March 3, 1866. Conn. Insurance Co. v. Duerson, 28 Gratt. 630; Johnston v. Gill, 27 Gratt. 587.

The West Virginia act of Feb. 27, 1866, providing that the period of time from April 17, 1861, to the passage of the act, should not be computed in counting the time under any statute of limitations in certain counties, was held to be constitutional in Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 138, 6 Am. Rep. 270; Caperton v. Bowyer, 4 W. Va. 176.

Title Vested by Statute.—Where title to property is vested under the statute of limitations, no act can, by extending the statute or reviving the remedy, impair such title. It would be unconstitutional because of depriving one of property without due process of law; but where the demand is on contract, or any class of actions where the statute merely gives a defence, and does not vest property, there is no vested right to such defence, and the legislature may by repeal of the statute or otherwise revive the action, and deprive one of such defence. McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 30 S. E. Rep. 239.

7. STATUTORY PROVISIONS.—The general limitation act, ch. 102, Acts 1882, does not repeal by implication ch. 28, Acts 1872-73, providing for a special class of cases, and the said statute is still in force. Sturm v. Fleming, 31 W. Va. 701, 8 S. E. Rep. 263.

The saving in the act of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, sec. 13, in relation to wills, in favor of persons out of the state, is not repealed by the act of March 8, 1826, in relation to the limitation of actions. Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358.

The proviso in an act for limitations of suits as to rights existing when the Code takes effect, is restricted to actions and rights barred by that chapter (Code of 1849, ch. 149, sec. 19), and does not extend to the law limiting and regulating appeals. Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374.

8. POSSESSION OF LAND NOT ADVERSE.—Where the plaintiff has always remained in possession of land, claiming it, the statute of limitations does not run against his claim. Williams v. Lewis, 5 Leigh 686; Roberts v. King, 10 Gratt. 184. See generally, monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 187.

Where one buys land that is under a recorded deed of trust given by the owner from whom the purchase is made, the possession of such purchaser is not adverse to the right of the grantor in the trust deed, and the statute of limitations will not run against the deed of trust debt. Pickens v. Love, 44 W. Va. 725, 29 S. E. Rep. 1018.

A suit brought to set aside a tax deed, because the lands were redeemed, and because the party to whom the deed was made sustained such relation to the land that he could not acquire a title thereto, and it does not appear that any adverse possession was claimed, is not barred by the statute of limitations. Battin v. Woods, 27 W. Va. 58.

9. GENERALLY.

Dismissal of Suit.—Where a claim is barred by limitations, even though the court has jurisdiction of such a case, the suit should be dismissed. Johnston v. Va. Coal & Iron Co., 96 Va. 158, 81 S. E. Rep. 85.

Security for Debt.—Where a creditor holds a pledge or collateral security for his debt, he will be entitled to retain the same in his possession against the pledgor or debtor, notwithstanding the statute of limitations is, or might be, successfully pleaded against the debt for the security of which the pledge was made. Roots v. Salt Co., 27 W. Va. 483.

Vendor's Lien.—The statute of limitations has no application to bar a lien for purchase money reserved in a conveyance of land. Though action on a note, given for such purchase money, be barred, so as to defeat its collection out of other property of the debtor, the lien against the particular land conveyed is not barred. Evans v. Johnson, 39 W. Va. 299, 19 S. E. Rep. 623; Hopkins v. Cockerell, 2 Gratt. 88; Hull v. Hull, 36 W. Va. 155, 18 S. E. Rep. 49.

Petition Claiming Taxes in Proceeding to Sell Land.—Where a city files a petition in a proceeding by a commissioner of school lands to obtain a decree for the sale of a lot, which has been forfeited by the failure of the owner to enter the same upon the land books, claiming an amount to be due it for taxes on said lot, it will not be deemed thereby to have brought a suit for said amount of taxes, and the statute of limitations will not be applied to the taxes due thereon. Tebbetts v. A Forfeited Lot, 33 W. Va. 705, 11 S. E. Rep. 23.

Unascertained Owner of Ground Rent.—Where ground rent is reserved in land conveyed by trustees, by authority of an act of assembly, which rent is to be paid to the owner of the land when he is ascertained, the statute of limitations does not run against the claim of the proprietor against the purchaser to recover such rents. Mulliday v. Machir, 4 Gratt. 1.

III. WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

Lex Fori.—The statute of limitations of another state, where a contract was made, cannot be pleaded as a bar to an action in this state, as the lex fori, and not the lex loci contractus, governs in all cases as to the time, mode and extent of the remedy. Urton v. Hunter, 2 W. Va. 88; Johnson v. Anderson, 76 Va. 766.

In an action brought in Virginia on a judgment obtained in North Carolina, the act of limitations of the latter state cannot be pleaded in bar, but the law of the former state must prevail, as the act of limitations affects the remedy and not the right. Jones v. Hook, 2 Rand. 808, 14 Am. Dec. 783.

A contract to locate a treasury warrant on lands in Kentucky is made in August, 1782, and it appeared that the breach, if any, occurred before Kentucky became a state. It was held that the act of limitations of Virginia began to run from the time of the breach and was therefore a bar to an action on the contract brought in 1816. M'Alexander v. Montgomery, 4 Leigh 61.

A debt is contracted at Petersburg, Va., for goods sold there; the debtor resides at the time and continues to reside in North Carolina; the creditor brings suit in a court of this state against the debtor, who pleads the statute of limitations in bar. It was held that by sec. 14, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, he was precluded from making such defence. Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277 (1836).

IV. WAIVER AND ESTOPPEL.

Exhaust of Legal Remedies First No Waiver.—Where the liability of a sheriff and his sureties, for the wrongful release of property under levy, has been fixed, it cannot be affected by any delay short of the statutory limitation, and the fact that the party injured first exhausts his remedy against his debtor does not constitute a waiver. Sage v. Dickinson, 88 Gratt. 861.

Agreement Not to Sue for Given Time.—A mutual agreement between a debtor and creditor, that suit shall not be brought upon an account until the debtor shall have gone to Europe and returned, is a good bar to the plea of the statute of limitations during his absence from this country. Holladay v. Littlepage, 2 Munf. 816.

Notice of Trust No Estoppel.—Where a debtor conveys land in trust for the payment of his debts, and then for the benefit of his wife and children, and a creditor sues to enforce the trust and has the land sold to him under the decree, in an equity suit by the children of the debtor against this creditor to recover the land, it was held that he was not precluded from setting up the statute of limitations, because he acquired the land with notice of the trust in favor of the plaintiffs. Drumright v. Hite, 2 Va. Dec. 465 (1897).

Mandamus against Supervisors—Allowance of Claim by Them.—Powers and duties of a board of supervisors are not judicial in their character, but executive, and their allowance of a claim against the county is not an adjudication of the merits of the claim, so as to estop them, on application for a mandamus to compel its payment, from pleading the statute of limitations. Board of Supervisors v. Catlett, 86 Va. 158, 9 S. E. Rep. 999.

Commissioner Directed to Ascertain Rents for Erroneous Period.—A direction by the court to a commissioner to ascertain rents and profits for a period of time greater than five years prior to the commencement of the suit, does not preclude the defendant from relying upon the statute of limitations before the commissioner. Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213.

Suit by Administrator—Effect of Decision against Him When Wife Living.—A plaintiff suing for slaves as administrator of his wife is not barred by a decision against him in her lifetime in a suit to which he was not a party, the ground of the decision having been that under the act of limitations the opposite party had obtained a legal title to the slaves by five years' possession commencing during the coverture, during which also the right of the wife accrued and the husband having never had possession in his character as husband. Blakey v. Newby, 6 Munf. 64.

V. WHEN STATUTE BEGINS TO RUN.

1. GENERAL RULE.—It may be stated as a general rule that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the right of action accrues. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 138, 20 S. E. Rep. 910; Cann v. Cann, 45 W. Va. 568, 31 S. E. Rep. 923; Andrews v. Roanoke B. & L. Assoc., 98 Va. 445, 36 S. E. Rep. 531.

Thus the act passed March 8, 1826, for the limitation of actions against persons acting in a fiduciary character, only begins to run from the time when the liability sought to be enforced arises. Cookus v. Peyton, 1 Gratt. 481.

So in an action of debt by a sheriff against his deputy on his bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, the right of action does not accrue to the sheriff when the deputy made default in collecting, and the statute does not run against the action until the sheriff has paid some part of the debt occasioned by the default. Adkins v. Fry, 88 W. Va. 549, 18 S. E. Rep. 737; Adkins v. Stephens, 88 W. Va. 567, 18 S. E. Rep. 740.

2. DEPENDENT ON FUTURE EVENT.

Insurance Policy—Time to Pay.—A policy of insurance provides that proof of loss shall be furnished to the company within thirty days from the date of the loss, and that all claims under it shall be barred, unless prosecuted within six months from the same date, and it also provides that the loss shall be paid in sixty days after its approval. The six months' limitation begins to run at the close of the sixty days allowed the company for payment, and not from the actual loss. Murdock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 83 W. Va. 407, 10 S. E. Rep. 777.

Provision in Will.—A testator by will requested that a debt which he owed should be paid out of his estate, after the happening of a future event. The right of action did not accrue until the occurrence of that event, and the statute of limitations did not begin to run until then. Perkins v. Selgfried, 97 Va. 444, 34 S. E. Rep. 64.

Collection of Bond.—Where a father promised to let his son-in-law have the amount of a particular bond when collected, the claim of the son-in-law did not accrue until such collection, and hence the statute of limitations did not begin to run against him until that time. Scott v. Osborne, 2 Munf. 418.

Payment Out of Particular Fund.—An action of debt was brought on a note, payable one day after date, which stipulated that it was to be paid "out of the proceeds of the furnace." When more than sufficient funds had been realized by the sale of the furnace to pay the note more than five years previous to the institution of the action, it was held that it was barred by limitation. Sayers v. Sayers, 90 Va. 755, 19 S. E. Rep. 844.

Demand Necessary.—If a demand be necessary before suit, the period of limitation under statutes of limitation does not start until demand. But demand must be made within a reasonable time, which is the term fixed by the statute of limitation, if not made before. Where no demand is shown, it will be presumed that it was made within that period, and the statute will then run. Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795.

Withdrawal from Loan Association.—A withdrawing member from a building and loan association cannot sue to recover the withdrawal value of his stock until a sufficient sum is accumulated by the society to meet his demand, for until that event has happened he has no right of action. Andrews v. Building Assoc. & Inv. Co., 98 Va. 445, 36 S. E. Rep. 531.

Promise to Pay at Death.—If an employer promises to make compensation for services at the time of his death, by will or otherwise, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the death of such person. Cann v. Cann, 45 W. Va. 563, 31 S. E. Rep. 923.

Decree Appealed.—Where the decree against an administrator was appealed from, the plaintiffs had no right to have satisfaction until the decree was affirmed, and the act of limitations did not begin to run until then. Sheldon v. Armstead, 7 Gratt. 264.

3. FRAUD, MISTAKE AND DECEIT.

Discovery.—Where property has been delivered under a common or mutual mistake of fact, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the mistake has been discovered. Craufurd v. Smith, 93 Va. 623, 23 S. E. Rep. 235.

Cases of fraud, trust and mistake are not within the statute of limitations. Hunter v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. 145. At all events in cases of mistake and fraud, the statute does not begin to run until its discovery. Massie v. Heiskell, 80 Va. 789; Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 760.

In cases of concealed fraud or mistake, the act of limitations does not run except from the discovery of the fraud or mistake. Harshberger v. Alger, 81 Gratt. 52.

To a bill in equity by a creditor for relief against a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor, the act of limitations, if well pleaded in bar, would run only from the time when fraud is discovered. Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729.

Same—Contrary Doctrine.—Where a cause of action arises out of a fraud, the statute of limitations runs from its perpetration, and not from its discovery. Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795; Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511; Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474; Cook v. Darby, 4 Munf. 444; Fant v. Fant, 17 Gratt. 14. But this rule does not apply to fraudulent transfers. Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795.

It was said by BRANNON, J., in Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 799, that "The statute starts from the act of fraud done, open or concealed,—that is, whether the act be of such a character that it conceals itself or not; but fraudulent tricks or acts of the defendant to conceal and obstruct the prosecution of an action are another matter, for that is an express exception in the statute. That very exception denies the right to say that time does not run from the act of fraud, because it only allows the time of actual obstruction to be excluded. It assumes that the statute has begun to run, and excludes certain time for certain causes,—simply makes a subtraction from the total time. From reading, I think there has been a confusion of mind on this matter, and that it largely explains the conflict of opinion."

In an action for deceit in the sale of a chattel, there is a plea of the statute of limitations, a general replication thereto, and issue thereon joined. It was held that the cause of action accrued at the time of the practicing of the deceit, and that the limitation began to run immediately. Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474.

If the obligee of a bond transferred it to an assignee with knowledge that there was usury in the transfer, he was guilty of deceit, and the statute of limitations began to run from the time of the transfer. Fant v. Fant, 17 Gratt. 11.

4. FRAUDULENT AND VOLUNTARY TRANSFERS.

From Execution of Transfer.—A suit to avoid an assignment for a consideration not deemed valuable in law is barred after the lapse of five years, and the statute begins to run from the date of the execution of the deed (sec. 16, ch. 146, Code 1878), and not, as is the general rule in respect to such statutes, from the time the right of action accrued. Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 678.

Under sec. 14, ch. 104, Va. Code 1891, the period of five years, limiting a suit to avoid a voluntary conveyance, begins to run from the making of the conveyance. Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 87 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. Rep. 364.

The limitation provided in sec. 14, ch. 104, Code of 1868, for avoiding a conveyance on consideration not deemed valuable in law, commences to run at the time the deed was made if at all. Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321. See monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

From Recordation.—Where the plaintiff attempts to avoid a conveyance made by his creditor on the ground of its being voluntary, the statute of limitations runs from the date of recordation, and not from the plaintiff's knowledge that it was made without consideration, unless his ignorance of such fact proceed from the fraud of the grantor. Vashon v. Barrett, 99 Va. 344, 38 S. E. Rep. 200.

5. RECOVERY OF LAND.

Estates with Plurality of Tenants.—The statute of limitations does not run in favor of one co-tenant against the others until there has been actual ouster of possession, or some act equivalent to a denial of their rights in the property. Fry v. Payne, 82 Va. 759, 1 S. E. Rep. 197. See monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

From the time that co-tenants have knowledge or notice of ouster by another co-tenant, the possession of the latter will be adverse, and the statute of limitations will commence to run. Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505; Cooey v. Porter, 22 W. Va. 124.

After the death of a father one of his sons took possession of his land, claiming that it had been given to him by will for life, with remainder to his two sons. This possession by the son and those claiming under him began in 1823, and having existed continuously until suit was brought by the other co-parcener in 1848, such possession was adverse and the statute of limitations commenced to run from the time of such taking possession. Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505. See monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

Two Grants of Same Land.—Where a grantee enters upon land which is subsequently granted to another person, the statute of limitations begins to run in favor of the party taking possession, from the time of the issuance of the subsequent grant, and if he remains in actual possession long enough to bar the entry under the statute, he will acquire a valid title to the land. Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480.

Land Occupied Granted by State.—The statute of limitations commences to run in favor of an occupant of land against the grantee of the state from the date of the grant of the land so occupied. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318.

Notice to Surrender.—Equity follows the law in holding that time does not run against one who is in possession in the exercise or assertion of a right, and hence a vendee who enters upon land and holds it with the consent and acquiescence of the vendor will not be barred by the lapse of time, until he is put in default by notice to surrender the premises or pay the price. Abbott v. L'Hommedieu, 10 W. Va. 677.

Disavowal of Title—Where a sale of land under a decree is made and confirmed, the purchase money paid, but no deed is made, and possession is not taken, the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the purchaser until his title is disavowed, and notice of an adverse claim is brought home to him. Whitlock v. Johnson, 87 Va. 323, 12 S. E. Rep. 614. See Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 436.

Dower—Widow's Rights.—As a widow is entitled by sec. 2274 of the Code of 1887, to hold the mansion and curtilage, until dower is assigned to her, the statute of limitations will not begin to run until her possession ends or she publishes her claim and possession to be adverse, by actual and open disseizin. Hannon v. Hounihan, 85 Va. 429, 12 S. E. Rep. 157.

6. SUITS BETWEEN PARTNERS.—See monographic note on "Partnership."

Settlement of Accounts.—Where the dealings between merchant and merchant, or merchant and factor, have ceased and the accounts between them have been so adjusted that the party in whose favor the balance appears might bring an action at law thereon, then from the time of such adjustment the statute of limitations will commence to run as against such balances. Roots v. Salt Co., 27 W. Va. 463.

In a suit between partners for a settlement of the business, the statute begins to run from the time there is a settlement, or account stated of the partnership business between the partners made several years after the dissolution of the firm, which was then delivered and understood to include and adjust all the assets and liabilities, although it may subsequently appear that they were mistaken. Boggs v. Johnson, 26 W. Va. 321.

Suit to Settle Partnership—Outstanding Claims.—In a case of a bill by a partner against his co-partners for a settlement of partnership accounts, the statute of limitations will not begin while there are debts due to and by the partnership. Jordan v. Miller, 75 Va. 442.

7. LEGACIES.—See monographic note on "Legacies and Devises."

Dependent on Future Event.—Where a legacy is limited upon a future event, the statute of limitations will not begin to run against the right to claim it, until the happening of such event. Eminger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94.

Held by Executor.—The statute of limitations does not run against a legatee's claim for a specific legacy, while it is held by the executor, although he has long before assented to the legacy. Nelson v. Cornwell, 11 Gratt. 724.

Estate Not Administered upon.—Where a legatee dies shortly after the testatrix and before a qualification upon her estate in this country, and there having been no administration on the estate of the legatee for twelve years, the act of limitations does not bar the claim for the legacy during this period. Lyon v. Magagnos, 7 Gratt. 377.

8. REMAINDERS AND REVERSIONS.

Termination of Life Estate.—The statute of limitations does not commence to run against a remainderman or reversioner, until termination of the life estate. Ball v. Johnson, 8 Gratt. 281; Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 362, 15 S. E. Rep. 58; Merritt v. Smith, 6 Leigh 486; Hope v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 79 Va. 288; Eminger v. Hall, 81 Va. 100; Davis v. Tebbs, 81 Va. 606; Hannon v. Hounihan, 85 Va. 429, 12 S. E. Rep. 157; Cent. Land Co. v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 141, 9 S. E. Rep. 64.

A life tenant of a slave sells her interest and dies, and the purchaser continues to hold the slave. He does not hold under but adversely to the remainderman, and the statute begins to run on the death of the life tenant. Layne v. Norris, 16 Gratt. 236.

Where a mother is given a life estate in certain slaves with a remainder to her children, the right of the latter to the slaves does not accrue until the death of the mother, and consequently the statute of limitations does not begin to run against them until her death. Duncan v. Wright, 11 Leigh 542.

Same—Conveyance in Fee Vold as to Wife.—Where an attempted conveyance in fee simple by a husband and wife was void as to the wife, and therefore the grantees were only entitled to an estate for the life of the husband, the right of action of the wife, or any one claiming under her against the grantees, did not accrue until after the husband's death, and the statute of limitations did not run against them until that time. Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 134, 9 S. E. Rep. 61; Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 366, 15 S. E. Rep. 56; Arnold v. Bunnell, 42 W. Va. 473, 26 S. E. Rep. 359.

9. AGENCY.—See monographic note on "Agency" appended to Silliman v. Fredericksburg, etc., R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119.

In General Agency Statute Runs from Close.—In case of a general or continuous agency, as distinguished from a special agency, the statute of limitations runs between the parties to it from its close. Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 33 S. E. Rep. 544.

Same—Compensation for Advances or Services Prior to Termination—Repudiation by Principal—General Statement.—As a general proposition, where there is an undertaking or agency which requires a continuation of services, the statute of limitations does not begin to run against advances lawfully made by the agent in the prosecution of the undertaking or agency, or against compensation for the services of the agent, until the termination of the undertaking or agency. The law looks upon the employment as an entire contract, and regards the claim for disbursements and compensation as an entire demand to which the right does not accrue until the completion of the service, or the termination of the employment or agency. But, although the employment or agency is a continuing one, yet if the agent had the right to require payment for advances or compensation for services prior to the termination of the agency, or if the advances were repudiated by the principal as unauthorized, or not required to be made by the nature of the employment or agency, the statute begins to run from the time the agent had the right to demand payment for his services, or for advances, or, if the advances were repudiated as unauthorized, from the time of such repudiation. The statute begins to run whenever the right of action accrues, and such right accrues whenever the agent has the right to demand payment of his principal, and, if refused, to apply to the proper tribunals for relief. So that, although the agency be a continuing one, if the agent has the right prior to the termination of the agency to demand payment of his compensation or for advances, the statute begins to run from the time he had the right to make such demand. Riverview Land Co. v. Dance, 98 Va. 239, 85 S. E. Rep. 720.

Sheriff and Deputy.—A deputy sheriff is the agent of the sheriff, and the statute of limitations applies between them as between principal and agent. Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. Rep. 544.

Agent to Collect.—Where an heir appoints an agent to collect his share of the estate and turn it over to him there is no trust, and the limitation begins to run against his claim for the share so collected from the date of the collection, whether demand is made or not. Hasher v. Hasher, 96 Va. 584, 32 S. E. Rep. 41.

10. ACTION FOR SEDUCTION.—Where a daughter lived away from her father's house at the time of her seduction, but returned and was confined and nursed there, the statute of limitations will only begin to run from that time. Clem v. Holmes, 33 Gratt. 722. See also, Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. Rep. 671; Riddle v. McGinnis, 22 W. Va. 275; Allebaugh v. Coakley, 75 Va. 628.

Section 1, ch. 103, Code W. Va., does not alter the rule as to the commencement of an action by a father for the seduction of his daughter. Riddle v. McGinnis, 22 W. Va. 253.

11. DAMAGE BY RAILROADS.

From Time of Injury.—A railroad company in the construction of its road negligently floods an adjoining lot by the erection of an embankment. The statute of limitations begins to run in such case against the right of the owner to recover, not from the time the embankment was built, but from the time of actual injury to the lot by the invasion of the water. Henry v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 224, 21 S. E. Rep. 863.

So where a railroad bridge changes the current of a stream, and injures land lying lower down the stream by washing it as freshets come, the injury is intermittent, and the statute of limitations runs from the actual damage by washing, not from the erection of the bridge. Eells v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 49 W. Va. 65, 38 S. E. Rep. 479.

From Payment of Obligation.—The statute of limitations begins to run against the right of a surety to claim payment of his principal for reimbursement for the payment of a joint obligation from the time of actual payment of the obligation. Harper v. McVeigh, 82 Va. 751, 1 S. E. Rep. 193. See monographic note on "Suretyship."

From Decree against Executor.—Where an executor purchases a slave from his testator's estate, and fails to settle his accounts, in a suit brought against him for a settlement the sale is set aside and he is required to account for the hire of the slave, and in 1850 there is a decree against him. In an action against his surety founded upon this decree, it was held that the statute of limitations in favor of the surety, did not begin to run until the decree of 1850, notwithstanding the surety was not a party to the suit in equity. Franklin v. Depriest, 13 Gratt. 237.

that a sheriff may proceed against his deputy and his sureties, whenever he becomes liable on account of the default of his deputy, whether a judgment has been recovered against him or not. Section 47 of the same chapter authorizes the sheriff to proceed against the deputy and his sureties only when there has been a recovery against him, and the payment in whole or in part to the creditor. It was held under these statutes that where a deputy sheriff made default prior to 1869, and a judgment was obtained against the sheriff in 1874, which was paid by him in 1878, and in 1879 he proceeded against the deputy and his sureties for the amount so paid, that the claim was not barred although the default of the deputy occurred more than ten years before. Allebaugh v. Coakley, 75 Va. 628.

From Date of Assessments.—It was held in Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866, under sec. 3, ch. 57, Code 1873, that the statute of limitations only began to run against unpaid assessments from the time that such assessments were made.

Thus where the officers of a corporation, which has assigned all of its property, including the unpaid portion of its capital stock, neglect to levy an assessment for such stock, and the levy is made by a court in a proceeding instituted by the trustee, the statute of limitations begins to run from the date of such levy made by the court. Vanderwerken v. Glenn, 85 Va. 9, 6 S. E. Rep. 806.

From Conclusion of Trust.—Where a trustee retains money in his hands the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the demand of the cestui que trust until the trust is concluded. Lomax v. Pendleton, 3 Call 538, Wythe 4.

Repudiation of Trust—Notice.—It is well settled, that while in cases of direct or express trusts, as between the trustee and cestui que trust, the statute of limitations has no application during the continuance and recognition of the trust, yet if the trustee repudiates the trust by clear and unequivocal acts or words, and claims thereafter to hold and control the estate as his own not subject to any trust, and such repudiation and claim are brought to the notice or knowledge of the cestui que trust in such manner that he is called upon to assert his equitable rights, the statute will begin to run from the time that such knowledge is brought home to the cestui que trust. Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 629.

When the subject is land, of which the trustee has the legal title, and the cestui que trust is a member of his family living upon the land, if the trustee, asserting title in himself, conveys a part of the land by deed in his own name, to a third person whom he places in possession of the part so sold and takes the purchase money to himself, and the deed is put upon record, and there is no evidence that the trustee ever thereafter recognized the trust, but on the contrary claimed the residue of the land as his own, these acts and transactions will be regarded as a repudiation of the trust, and the statute of limitations will begin to run against the cestui que trust from that time. Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 629.

15. OTHER INSTANCES.

Claim against Decedent's Estate.—The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a claim asserted for a decedent's estate, till a qualification of an executor or administrator of the decedent. Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79.

Devastavit by Executor.—In an action by a creditor or legatee against an executor for a devastavit, the right accrues ordinarily, and the limitation commences to run when the wrongful act is committed. Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 792.

Where Administrator Is Distributee.—Where the characters of an administrator and distributee unite in the same person, who holds possession of personal property in the former character for more than five years, his right as distributee will not be barred by the statute of limitations. Vaiden v. Bell, 3 Rand. 448. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

No Qualification on Estate for Five Years—Presumption.—When a cause of action accrues to the estate of a decedent at the time of his death, and not before, and no one qualifies as administrator until more than five years thereafter, the law conclusively presumes that an administrator qualified on the last day of the five years, and the statute of limitations begins to run in favor of the estate of the decedent from that time, whether there is in fact any administrator of the estate or not. Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 326, 1 S. E. Rep. 740.

Contest between Widow and Purchaser—Statute Runs from Appointment of Executor.—Where the widow claims the slaves of the husband as her own property and holds possession of them for more than five years, and then the administration of her husband's estate is committed to the sheriff, in a contest between the widow and the purchaser, it was held that the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the administrator was appointed. Clark v. Hardiman, 2 Leigh 347.

Debt of Wife Collected by Husband.—Where a husband collected demands due the wife as her separate estate, the statute of limitations began to run against the wife's right of action to recover the amount so collected from the time when she obtained knowledge of the fact of the collection. Riggan v. Riggan, 93 Va. 78, 24 S. E. Rep. 920. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

Void Deed as to Wife—From Entry of Decree.—Where a deed by a husband and wife was a nullity as to the wife, in an action by the grantee to recover back the purchase money, it was held that his cause of action did not arise until the decree set aside the deed in favor of the wife, and that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against his claim until that time. Garber v. Armentrout, 32 Gratt. 235.

Note Payable on Demand.—The statute of limitations runs from the date and delivery of a note payable on demand, and not from the time of demand. Laidley v. Smith, 32 W. Va. 387, 9 S. E. Rep. 209, 25 Am. St. Rep. 825.

Death by Wrongful Act.—An action for damages for death by wrongful act, under sec. 5, ch. 103, W. Va. Code 1899, may be maintained within two years after the death of the person, although such death does not occur until more than a year has elapsed from the time of such injury. The statute makes no reference to the bar of the statute of limitations prior to the death of the injured person, and while the negligent injury is the real cause of action, it is not consummated until it results in death, and then the cause of action accrues to the administrator, and not until then. Hoover v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 268, 33 S. E. Rep. 224.

See monographic note on "Death by Wrongful Act" appended to De Ende v. Wilkinson, 2 Pat. & H. 668.

Sealed Agreement to Execute Notes.—Where there is a sealed agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the latter shall execute notes at a specified time in payment of land, the statute begins to run against the agreement at that time, although there is a covenant on the part of the former to convey the property at the same time and he fails to do so. Davis v. McMullen, 86 Va. 256, 9 S. E. Rep. 1095.

Covenant by Railroad to Build Crossing or Fence—From Date of Damage.—The statute of limitations will not bar an action against a railroad company upon a covenant in the grant of the right of way to build and maintain a crossing or fence, the action being merely for such failure; but if actual damage results from the failure to build such crossing or fence, the statute will begin to run from the date of such damage, in an action for compensatory damages. Douglass v. Ohio, etc., R. Co. (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 911.

Recovery by Vendor—From Time Title Passes.—No time bars the right, either under the statute of limitations or presumption of payment, of a vendor to recover purchase money for land, if he has not parted with the legal title. Evans v. Johnson, 30 W. Va. 299, 19 S. E. Rep. 623.

Claim for Improvements by Tenant in Common—From Time Partition Is Asked.—Where a tenant in common improved the property at his own expense, without the assent of his co-tenants, the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the equity for compensation until a partition is asked. Ballou v. Ballou, 94 Va. 350, 26 S. E. Rep. 840. As between joint tenants, see Fry v. Payne, 82 Va. 759. See monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

Judgments Transferred from Virginia to West Virginia—From April 1, 1869.—The statute of limitations, as to judgments rendered in the courts of Virginia in favor of that state, and by the act of general assembly transferred to the state of West Virginia, did not commence to run against the latter state for any purpose by the virtue of her laws as to said judgments until the 1st of April, 1869. See W. Va. Code 1868, ch. 35, § 20; Calwell v. Prindle, 19 W. Va. 604.

Appropriation by Supervisors for Bounties—From Presentation of Claim and Refusal to Pay.—Where a county by an order of its board of supervisors appropriates money to pay bounties to soldiers, and after such money becomes payable a soldier entitled to such bounty presents his claim to the board for payment, and it refuses to pay him, the statute of limitations begins to run against such claim from the time it was presented and payment thereof was refused, and becomes barred at the expiration of five years from that time. Shaw v. County Court, 30 W. Va. 488, 4 S. E. Rep. 439.

Liability of Assignor of Bond—Suit against Obligor.—A suit was brought against the obligor in a bond by the assignee, and it was referred to arbitration. It being proved that the bond had been discharged by payments to the assignor, and by set-offs against him, the arbitrators found for the defendant. Then the assignee sued the assignor, and in this suit upon the plea by the latter that the action against him did not accrue within five years, it was found that the debt originally due from the obligor had been discharged by payments and set-offs against the assignor, yet the assignee did not know until after judgment in his suit against the obligor that nothing was due, and it was also found that five years had not elapsed since the judgment. It was held that the action did not accrue against the assignor until the judgment was rendered. Scates v. Wilson, 9 Leigh 473.

VI. BY AND AGAINST WHOM STATUTE PLEADED.

1. GENERAL RULES.

Personal Privilege.—As a general rule the plea of the statute of limitations is a personal defence to be made only by the party against whom the demand is asserted, and can only be waived by him if he desires to do so. Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 65; Smith v. Hutchinson, 78 Va. 683; McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 198, 26 S. E. Rep. 419; Welton v. Boggs, 45 W. Va. 620, 32 S. E. Rep. 232; Clarke v. Hogeman, 13 W. Va. 730; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwerker, 44 W. Va. 229, 28 S. E. Rep. 829.

Same—Privies in Estate.—Privies in estate, such as heirs, devisees, vendees, or mortgagees of property, may use it to defend their property. McClaugherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246; Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588; Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487.

Same—Effect as to Strangers.—A mere stranger to a claim, as a creditor, although he may be injuriously affected by the failure of the debtor to plead the statute, cannot either set it up himself, or compel his debtor to do so, as the privilege is personal. Welton v. Boggs, 45 W. Va. 620, 32 S. E. Rep. 232.

Party in Interest.—It is competent for any party interested in a fund to take advantage of the statute of limitations, notwithstanding the executor of the deceased party refused to do so. Jackson v. Hull, 31 W. Va. 601; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 221; McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 203, 26 S. E. Rep. 421; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 666; McClaugherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246; Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588; Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487. See subsec. 1. "Creditors," infra.

2. SPECIFIC INSTANCES.

a. BENEFICIARIES.—Beneficiaries who have possession of the trust property cannot set up the statute of limitations to defeat the right of the other beneficiaries to share in the trust property. Turner v. Campbell, 3 Gratt. 77.

b. JOINT DEFENDANTS.—It is undoubtedly a general rule that the defence of the statute is a personal privilege, and must be pleaded by the party who would take advantage of it, but when the interest of the defendants is joint, and the plea of the statute by one is not purely personal as to him, it enures to the benefit of all. Ashby v. Bell, 30 Va. 811.

c. SHERIFFS.—The act of limitations will not bar a motion against a sheriff for clerk's tickets put into his hands to collect. Lee v. Peachy, 3 Call 220. See monographic note on "Sheriffs and Constables."

d. ASSIGNEES.—One of two assignees claiming the same judgment cannot plead the statute of limitations as against each other. Clarke v. Hogeman, 13 W. Va. 718.

Where the assignee sues upon a note, he may plead the statute of limitations against a set-off based upon a demand against the assignor. Walker v. Burgess, 44 W. Va. 399, 30 S. E. Rep. 99.

e. PUBLIC CORPORATIONS.—Statutes of limitation run against public corporations, whether they are municipal or mere agencies of the state. Such corporations are more or less branches of the government, and necessarily are clothed with the attributes and incidents of sovereignty; yet when they have power to sue and to be sued, to have a common seal, to take and hold property, and transact business, they are governed by the same laws and regulations, and subject to the same limitations, as natural persons, unless exempt by positive law. Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 326, 1 S. E. Rep. 740; McClanahan v. West. Lunatic Asylum, 88 Va. 466, 18 S. E. Rep. 977.

The statute of limitations applies as well to a municipal corporation as to individuals. Forsyth v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 318; Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36.

It was held in Teass v. City of St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 400, that in the absence of express statutory provision to the contrary, the statute of limitations runs against a municipal corporation.

f. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.—An insurance company chartered by another state, but doing business in this state in compliance with the statute of 1855-6, is to be considered, for the purpose of being sued, as domiciled in this state, and is entitled to rely on the statute of limitations just as if it were a company which had been chartered by the legislature of this state. Conn., etc., Insurance Co. v. Duerson, 28 Gratt. 630.

g. PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES, FIDUCIARIES, HEIRS, etc.

Personal Representative.—It is the duty of a personal representative to rely upon the statute of limitations in behalf of legatees and distributees, and also to protect creditors. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

Same—Construction of Statute.—It is provided by sec. 7, ch. 128, Code Va. 1873, that an administrator shall have no credit for paying a claim against the estate when he knows that a recovery of the same could be prevented. This statute does not require that the statute of limitations be interposed to a claim which is apparently barred, when the administrator knows it is inapplicable to such claim. Radford v. Fowlkes, 85 Va. 820, 8 S. E. Rep. 817.

Same—Administrator Sole Heir and Distributee.—Where there are debts against an intestate which are barred by the statute of limitations, the administrator cannot repel the bar in any way, although he be also sole heir and distributee, but it is his duty to plead the statute against the debts. If he refuses to do so, a judgment creditor of his by reason of his interest in the fund, is entitled to file the plea. Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 654.

Executors De Son Tort.—Executors in their own wrong are liable to account for the property of the decedent to his distributees or legatees, like other executors, and cannot rely on the statute of limitations to protect them from such accountability. Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79.

Fiduciaries—Sureties.—As to fiduciaries there is no limitation except what results from staleness of demand or presumption of payment, it is otherwise as to their sureties. Code of 1873, ch. 146, § 9; McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524.

Heirs.—A judgment against a personal representative of a decedent is not even prima facie evidence of the debts against the heirs of such decedent. And in a suit brought by the plaintiff in such judgment against the heirs to subject the real assets descended, such judgment against the personal representative will not prevent the heirs from relying upon the statute of limitations as a bar to the original cause of action in such suit. Saddler v. Kennedy, 26 W. Va. 636.

When an administrator presents a personal demand against his decedent's estate he must show that such demand is not barred by the statute of limitations. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 910.

h. LESSEES.—An action of assumpsit founded on the covenants contained in a lease, is not barred in five years, against a lessee who has not signed the lease. West Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. McIntire, 44 W. Va. 210, 28 S. E. Rep. 696. See monographic note on "Landlord and Tenant."

Possession Adverse.—In order for the statute of limitations to be a good defence for a tenant against those demanding possession, he must not claim under their title, but his possession must be adverse to them. Robnett v. Preston, 4 Gratt. 141.

i. ESCHEATORS.—An escheator who is defendant to a petition under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, sec. 14, by a creditor of a purchaser whose lands have been escheated, has the same right to plead the statute of limitations in bar of the petition that a representative of the debtor would have to plead the statute in bar of an action. Watson v. Lyle, 4 Leigh 236.

j. HUSBAND AND WIFE.—In Merritt v. Hughes, 86 W. Va. 366, 15 S. E. Rep. 60, it was said that the case of Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505, was authority for the proposition that the statute of limitations ran against a wife owning lands and against her husband during coverture. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

k. TRUSTEES.—A trustee cannot take advantage of the act of limitations against the claim of the cestui que trust or of persons claiming under him. Redwood v. Riddick, 4 Munf. 222.

Same—Constructive—A mere constructive trustee may protect his possession by the plea of the statute of limitations. Sheppards v. Turpin, 8 Gratt. 374.

Against Claim of Another Creditor.—While the right to plead the statute of limitations as a defence is generally personal to the debtor, yet where equity has taken possession of his estate for the purpose of distributing it among the creditors, any one of them interested in the fund may interpose the defence to the claim of another creditor. McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 198, 26 S. E. Rep. 419; Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 345; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588.

It was said in Elliot v. Trahern, 85 W. Va. 634, 14 S. E. Rep. 223, that it was settled law in West Virginia that in marshaling assets, unless it be in a proceeding to subject the real estate of a decedent to the payment of his debts, the statute of limitations could not be set up by one creditor of an estate against another creditor to give his claim precedence.

Same—Debtor Not Relying on It.—It is a settled law that one creditor may set up the statute of limitations in a creditors' suit against the demand of another, although the debtor himself did not rely upon it. Callaway v. Saunders, 99 Va. 350, 38 S. E. Rep. 182.

Creditors of Partnership.—Where there is a contest between the creditors of a partnership in a suit brought for the purpose of settling the partnership, one creditor should be allowed to plead the bar of the statute of limitations against the claims of the other creditors in any proper way, as by exceptions to the report of a commissioner made in the cause. Conrad v. Buck, 21 W. Va. 396.

Creditors of Deceased.—The creditors of a deceased may appear before a commissioner appointed in a creditors' suit to ascertain the debts, etc., and contest the claims of each other on the ground that they are barred by the statute of limitations, and it is the duty of the commissioner to report whether the claims are barred or not. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

In Suit against Sheriff for Default of Deputy.—Where a recovery by a creditor against the administratrix of a sheriff for the defaults of his deputy was barred by the act of limitations, it is for the deputy and his sureties to show that fact in the motion against them. Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323. See monographic note on "Sheriffs and Constables."

Judgment Creditors.—Where a suit was brought by a judgment creditor to subject the lands of a debtor to the satisfaction of his judgment, and the plaintiff alleges the fact that there is another judgment against the same defendant, older in point of time, but which has not been kept alive by issuing execution as is required by statute, but the defendant being alive and not pleading the statute as to the older judgment, the plaintiff in the suit has no right to file or to rely on the plea. Welton v. Boggs, 45 W. Va. 620, 32 S. E. Rep. 232.

Same—Against Each Other—Open Question.—The question as to whether one judgment lienor can plead the statute of limitations against other lienors of a common living debtor is apparently an undecided question in West Virginia. It was brought up but not finally passed upon in several cases, so may be considered as an open question. McClagherty v. Croft, 48 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Lee v. Feamster, 21 W. Va. 111; Conrad v. Buck, 21 W. Va. 411.

m. PURCHASERS.—If one creditor may plead the statute against another, as where they are contesting the claims of each other against the estate of a deceased debtor, a fortiori, a purchaser, who stands in no less favorable position, may rely upon the bar of the statute to protect his land from the claims of creditors of his deceased vendor. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588.

Pendente Lite Purchasers.—The statute of limitations does not run in favor of a pendente lite purchaser, and, being in possession of land so purchased, he will not be regarded as holding it adverse to the parties to the suit during the litigation. Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751.

When Contract Is Repudiated.—Where the owner of land repudiated a contract for its conveyance because of the failure of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the contract, he must restore the amount of the purchase money which has been paid him under the contract. Where he fails to refund this payment he keeps the contract open and cannot be permitted to rely upon the statute of limitations to protect himself from a decree for the repayment thereof. Bowles v. Woodson, 6 Gratt. 78.

Where Conveyance Attacked as Fraudulent.—Where the conveyance of land by a debtor in his lifetime is assailed by his creditors after his death on the ground of being fraudulent, the vendee may plead that the debts are barred by the statute of limitations. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588.

n. STATE.

Virginia Rule.—The English maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi, has been adopted in Virginia in relation to the commonwealth, on which principle it has been held, that the acts of limitation do not extend to the commonwealth in civil suits, not founded on any penal act expressly limiting the commencement of the action. Nimmo v. Com., 4 H. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488; Hale v. Branscum, 10 Gratt. 418; Staats v. Board, 10 Gratt. 400; Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. Rep. 802; Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Gratt. 572; Com. v. Ford, 20 Gratt. 688; Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 322; Kemp v. Com., 1 H. & M. 85; Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Gore v. Lawson, 8 Leigh 458; Saunders v. Com., 10 Gratt. 494; Koerner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420.

Subject to Statutory Change.—The statute of limitations never runs against the commonwealth, unless there be an express provision in the statute to that effect, and there is no such provision in our statute. Bensens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 236, 21 S. E. Rep. 347. See Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Koerner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420.

Dedication of Land to Public.—Where land has been dedicated to the public, no title by adverse possession can be acquired to it, as time does not run against the state, nor bar the right of the public. Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 200, 24 S. E. Rep. 830; Taylor's Case, 20 Gratt. 780; Norfolk v. Chamberlaine, 20 Gratt. 534; Yates v. Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. Rep. 818.

Exception.—But the maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi, never applied to the proprietors of the Northern Neck of Virginia. Birch v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 34.

Claim of Revolutionary Officers.—The act of limitations does not apply to the claim of an officer of the state navy of Virginia during the war of the revolution, who became supernumerary before, and so continued until the end of the war, and who was entitled to half pay for life under the act of May 1779. Com. v. Lilly, 1 Leigh 535.

Former West Virginia Rule.—It was formerly the rule in West Virginia, as it is in Virginia and at common law, that the statutes of limitation were inoperative to bar the right of the state. In Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318, it was said that it was an universal principle of law that time did not run against the state unless so declared in the statute which prescribes the limitations; and as the West Virginia statute did not in terms or otherwise refer to the state, there could be no adverse possession, where the title to land remained in the state.

Same—Possession of Land Forfeited for Taxes.—Where land has been granted and an adverse possession commenced to run against the true owner, and subsequently the land is forfeited to the state for delinquent taxes, after the forfeiture, such possession is not adversary against the state, until the land is regranted or sold by the state. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318.

Same—Ungranted State Lands—Beginning of Limitation.—The statute begins to run in favor of one in possession of ungranted lands of the state as soon as a grant issues to any one for such land. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 322; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480. See also, Virginia case of Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of an occupant of land, where the title thereto is vested in the state. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 318.

Present Rule in West Virginia.—But it is now provided by statute that the statute applies alike to state and individuals. Code 1899, ch. 35, sec. 20; State v. Sponangle, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. Rep. 283.

Thus the statute of limitations runs against the state and municipal corporations, as against individuals in all similar cases. Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. Rep. 327.

Same—Public Uses.—The maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi, applies to all the sovereign rights of the people of the state dedicated to public uses, and of which they cannot be deprived otherwise than according to their express will and appointment. Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. Rep. 326. The point decided was that an individual could not destroy a public easement by setting up a claim under the statute of limitations, as the people could not be deprived of their sovereign rights in this way.

Same—Public Easements in Highways.—It was held in the cases of Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 86, Forsyth v. Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 318, and Teass v. St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 400, that the public easement in the public highways of the state was subject to the bar of the statute of limitations. But in the later case of Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. Rep. 326, these cases are expressly overruled, and such easements held not subject to the statute.

Same—Common-Law Rule Abolished.—Section 20, ch. 35, of the W. Va. Code of 1868, abolished the common-law rule that time does not run against the state, and made the state's rights subject to every statute of limitation, the same as individual rights. State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; State v. Brookover, 38 W. Va. 141, 18 S. E. Rep. 476. See Code 1899, ch. 35, sec. 20.

Same—Same—Judgments—Repeal.—Section 19, ch. 55, of the Acts of 1875, providing that the statute of limitations should not apply to proceedings on "judgments on behalf of the state, or any claim due the state," did not wholly repeal sec. 20, ch. 35, of the W. Va. Code 1868, but only limited its operation by taking out of it judgments and money claims of the state; and when this section was subsequently repealed by the Act of March 17, 1881, ch. 13, such judgment and claims were again made subject to statutes of limitation. State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; State v. Brookover, 38 W. Va. 141, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

State a Party in Another State.—If a sovereign state enters the courts of a foreign state, she does so with no other rights and immunities than those which pertain to private corporations or individuals, and is not exempted from the operation of the statute of limitations of the lex fori. Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 326, 1 S. E. Rep. 740.

A state charitable institution, suing in the courts of a foreign state, is subject to the statute of limitations of the forum, even if at its domicile it be regarded as a part of the state government. Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 326, 1 S. E. Rep. 740; McClanahan v. Western Lunatic Asylum, 88 Va. 466, 13 S. E. Rep. 977.

VII. SUSPENSION AND INTERRUPTION OF STATUTE.

1. IN GENERAL.—The only way in which the operation of the statute can be avoided in any case, is by one or the other of the following circumstances: First, by a subsequent written acknowledgment or promise to pay money, signed by the party to be charged or his agent; second, by the existence of certain disabilities on the part of the plaintiff; third, by attempts on the part of the plaintiff to avoid the action, as by departing from the state, or by any other indirect way obstructing the plaintiff in bringing his action; and fourth, by the failure of a suit commenced in time. Morris v. Lyon, 84 Va. 381, 4 S. E. Rep. 784.

2. WAR AND STAY LAW.

Object of Stay Law.—By the 7th section of the act of March 2, 1866, entitled "An act to stay the collection of debts for a limited period," it was enacted that "the period during which this act shall remain in force shall be excluded from the computation of time within which, by the operation of any statute or rule of law, it may be necessary to commence any proceeding to preserve, or prevent the loss of any right or remedy." This act remained in force until January 1, 1869. The object of the act was the relief of the debtor class in the then condition of the country by staying the immediate enforcement of debts for a limited period, without prejudice to the rights of creditors. This was the evident purpose of the legislature. Norvell v. Little, 79 Va. 141. See Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 379.

Length of War and Stay-Law Period.—By virtue of several different acts of the legislature the operation of the statutes of limitation was suspended between April 17th, 1861, to January 1st, 1869. Davis v. Tebbs, 81 Va. 600; Hope v. Railroad Co., 79 Va. 288; Updike v. Lane, 78 Va. 132; Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 690, 8 S. E. Rep. 577; Brewis v. Lawson, 76 Va. 36; Norvell v. Little, 79 Va. 141; Morrison v. Householder, 79 Va. 627; Kerlin v. Kerlin, 85 Va. 475, 7 S. E. Rep. 849; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448; Conn. etc., Insurance Co. v. Duerson, 28 Gratt. 630; Bank of Virginia v. Handley, 14 W. Va. 823; Gore v. McLaughlin, 8 W. Va. 489; Hale v. Pack, 10 W. Va. 145; M'Allister v. Bodkin, 76 Va. 809; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 565; Pitzer v. Burns, 7 W. Va. 63; Hurst v. Hite, 20 W. Va. 183; Shields v. Farmers' Bank of Virginia, 5 W. Va. 259; Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 133, 6 Am. Rep. 270; Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 487; Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 487; Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 139; Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 379; Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Faulkner, 4 W. Va. 180 (action of assumpsit); Virginia, etc., Co. v. Hocver, 82 Va. 449, 4 S. E. Rep. 669 (action of ejectment); Johnston v. Gill, 27 Gratt. 587 (suit to set aside voluntary conveyance).

Writs of Ft. Fa.—It is provided by sec. 3577 of the Code of 1887, that in computing time as to writs of f. fa., that the period between the 1st of January, 1869, and the 29th of March, 1871, shall be omitted. James v. Life, 93 Va. 702, 24 S. E. Rep. 375.

Law Not Applicable to Appeals.—Section 7 of the Act of March 2, 1866, known as the stay law and the act amending it, do not apply to appeals, writs of error, or supersedeas, and therefore an appeal from a final decree made on the 1st of November, 1867, cannot be allowed on the 20th of June, 1871. Rogers v. Strother, 27 Gratt. 417.

Military Orders Staying Executions.—Military orders extending the time for a stay of execution on judgments, related only to the stay of execution and the forced sales of property, and did not operate to suspend the running of the statute of limitations. Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 379.

Time Excepted by Rev. Code.—By 1 Rev. Code, ch. 76, § 11, three different periods are excepted from the statute of limitations, from April 12, 1774, to Oct. 20th, 1873, amounting to five years and one hundred and seventy-four days. Clay v. Ransome, 1 Munf. 454.

3. INFANCY.—The suspension of the statute by the disability of infancy is practically without exception. Brown v. Lambert, 33 Gratt. 266. See monographic note on "Infants" appended to Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.

Joint Tenants—Common-Law Rule—Statute.—The doctrine that the infancy of one joint tenant prevents the application of the act of limitations to other joint tenants is based on the common-law rule that they must sue and be sued jointly. But that doctrine can have no application in Virginia, where by statute it is provided that undivided interests may be sued for and recovered. See ch. 125, Va. Code 1887; Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. —, 40 S. E. Rep. 630, 7 Va. Law Reg. 851; Marshall v. Palmer, 91 Va. 344, 21 S. E. Rep. 673; Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 710, 21 S. E. Rep. 345.

But the infancy of one joint tenant does not prevent the application of the act of limitations to other joint tenants not under disability. Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. —, 40 S. E. Rep. 630. See monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

Infant Legatee.—Where a deceased bequeathed a slave to his infant son, the act of limitations could never begin to run against his claim and title to the slave, until he had attained to full age. Lynch v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 682.

Claims under Marriage Settlement.—Where by a marriage settlement, the children are entitled to an absolute estate in certain slaves on the death of their mother and father, and the latter in their lifetime are deprived of the slaves, and depart this life leaving the children under age, the act of limitations does not begin to run against them until they have maintained their majority. Baird v. Bland, 3 Munf. 570.

Limitations after Removal of Disability—Suit to Avoid Will.—Where an infant reaches full age in 1856, he cannot file a bill in 1859, to set aside the probate of a will made in 1840, the disability of infancy having been removed more than one year. Va. Code 1849, ch. 122, § 35; McClintic v. Ocheltree, 4 W. Va. 249.

Same—To Recover Land.—The provision of the statute of limitations which allows infants to make entry or bring action within ten years after the removal of the disability of infancy, notwithstanding the fifteen years' limitation may have expired, does not curtail the time of the infant for the assertion of his rights in this case from fifteen years to ten years. But the operation of the statute is exactly the reverse. In such cases the time for the assertion of the rights of those under the disability of infancy is enlarged by giving them fifteen years in any event, or ten years, after the removal of the disability, in which to bring the action, and it is immaterial which period shall first expire. Birch v. Linton, 78 Va. 584.

Same—To Surcharge Administrator's Account.—A testator dies, leaving his estate to his children, one of whom dies shortly afterwards, leaving several children. The estate is administered on, but no accounts thereof are settled. A great many years afterwards, but within five years after arrival at age, the youngest grandchild, together with his brothers and sisters, brings a suit to surcharge the administrator's account, and for a full settlement of the estate. The statute of limitations does not bar the suit. Toler v. Toler, 2 P. & H. 71.

4. COVERTURE.—Before the enactment of the "Married Women's Acts," the statutes of limitation had no application, as a general rule, to women under the disability of coverture. Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 565. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 16 Gratt. 159.

Claim of Wife against Husband.—The claim of a wife against her husband is not barred by the statute of limitations during coverture, if at all, until twenty years from the original inception, or written renewal thereof. Richter v. Riley, 43 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. Rep. 357.

Wife Nominal Party in Bill.—Where a wife is merely joined in a bill with her husband as a matter of conformity, the coverture of the wife is no excuse for delay in suing. Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529.

Widow as Administratrix—After Removal Holds Slaves under Father's Will.—A widow is appointed administratrix of her husband and claims certain slaves under her father's will. She is afterwards removed and continues to hold the slaves. After having them in her possession for more than five years, the statute of limitations will protect her against any claims by the administrator d. b. n. and the next of kin of her husband. The fact of one of the latter being a married woman during the whole period, will not prevent the running of the statute against her. Livesay v. Helms, 14 Gratt. 440.

Recovery of Property Purporting to Have Been Conveyed by Wife.—A wife owning land in fee, not separate estate, makes a deed purporting to convey the land in fee, but her husband does not join in the deed. The possession of the grantee is adverse to both as the deed is void, and twenty years' possession will by sec. 4, ch. 104, of the Code of 1891, bar the right of the wife to recover although she remains married during the whole of the 20 years, and suit may be brought during coverture to recover the land, although ten years of such possession have elapsed. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. Rep. 56.

Where a deed by a married woman attempting to convey land in fee simple is void, the possession of the grantee thereby being adverse, if after the lapse of ten years the coverture ceases, under sec. 3, ch. 104, Code of 1891, suit must be brought within five years thereafter. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. Rep. 56.

5. MISTAKE.

Mutual Mistake with No Fault of Injured Party.—No lapse of time or delay in bringing suit, however long, will defeat the remedy in cases of mutual mistake, if the injured party was in the meantime ignorant of the mistake without fault on his part. Craufurd v. Smith, 93 Va. 623, 23 S. E. Rep. 235.

Discovery of Will—Money Paid Distributee.—Where the will of a supposed intestate was discovered twenty years after the distribution of his estate, the statute of limitations to recover from a distributee, who was not a legatee, the amount paid to him, did not begin to run until the discovery of the mistake. Craufurd v. Smith, 93 Va. 623, 23 S. E. Rep. 235.

House Built on Another's Land.—Where the plaintiff contributed money to build a house on the land of another, relying on the idea that she was to have an interest in the property, and her claim for the money so loaned was barred by the statute of limitations, no right of action accrued against the estate of the owner on his death, because of failure of consideration, or of the mistaken belief that she was entitled to such interest. Walker v. Tyler, 94 Va. 533, 27 S. E. Rep. 434.

Deficiency in Land Sold.—The right of a purchaser to recover the value of a deficiency in land sold, is not affected by the statute of limitations, when he is ignorant of the mistake, and suit is brought soon after its discovery. Hull v. Watts, 95 Va. 10, 27 S. E. Rep. 829.

6. IGNORANCE.

No Effect at Law—Otherwise in Equity.—While ignorance of law will not prevent the operation of the statute of limitations, the rule is different in equity, a court of conscience. In such court, moral as well as legal grounds may be considered, and a satisfactory moral excuse may be entertained, although it results from ignorance of law. Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594.

On Part of Creditor.—Mere ignorance on the part of a creditor is not sufficient to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations. Foster v. Rison, 17 Gratt. 321; Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 687.

To Be Effective Must Proceed from Fraud.—Where one partner for himself and another settles the partnership accounts with the acting partner, and receives payments of money for himself and the other, the fact that the other one was ignorant of the existence of the debt due from the partner who collected the money, until within five years before the institution of a suit, is not sufficient to repel the bar of the statute. To have that effect such ignorance must proceed from the fraud of the partner collecting the money. Foster v. Rison, 17 Gratt. 321. See Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 687.

Suit to Set Aside Voluntary Conveyance—Assignment of Title Bonds.—The rule that a suit to set aside a voluntary conveyance must be brought within five years from the day of the conveyance, and not from the time of the accrual of the cause of action, is not affected by the fact that the assignment of the title bonds in this case was without the knowledge of the creditor. Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 678.

Sale of Land Bound for Bond.—The assignor of a bond retained it and agreed to remain bound as assignor thereof, and to collect it. The land by which the bond was secured was sold to pay the debt, and was bought by the assignor. In the absence of knowledge on the part of the assignee that the land was sold, the statute of limitations did not begin to run from the day of the sale. Lightfoot v. Green, 91 Va. 509, 23 S. E. Rep. 242.

7. OBSTRUCTION OF PROSECUTION.

General Rule.—Where a person by any direct way or means obstructs the prosecution of a right, the time during which such obstruction continues shall not be computed in the limitation period prescribed in the Code, ch. 104. Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. Rep. 364; Morris Lyon, 84 Va. 331, 4 S. E. Rep. 734; Vanbibber v. Belrne, 6 W. Va. 168.

Debtor Confined during War.—Where shortly after a judgment was rendered against the debtor, he was taken and detained in close confinement during the war, until after the expiration of five years from the date of the judgment, he will not be prevented from appealing by reason of limitations. Wyatt v. Morris, 2 W. Va. 575.

8. BY PROVISIONS IN WILL.

Devise of Real Estate for Payment of Debts.—A devise of real estate for the payment of debts will not affect the operation of the statute of limitations upon such debts, whether they be barred at the testator's death or not, unless the contrary intention on his part plainly appears. The devise is not of itself sufficient evidence of the intent, but it must appear from some phrase or provision independent of the devise, which indicates the purpose of the testator. Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 379. See monographic note on "Wills."

Where a debt of the testator, for the payment of which real estate devised to a son was charged, was not barred at his death, the charge prevented the statute from running. Baylor v. Dejarnette, 13 Gratt. 152.

Personal Estate—Payment of Debts Ordered.—But a direction in a will of a testator that his debts shall be paid, does not prevent the bar of the statute as to the personal estate. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 26.

9. BY AGREEMENT OF PARTIES.

Covenant Not to Deliver Note.—Shortly after the making and delivery of a promissory note the parties thereto enter into a covenant in which it is agreed, that in consideration of the fact that the promisor has become the bail of the promisee, the note should be delivered to the former to be held, and only redelivered to the latter, when the former's liability as bail was ended. The effect of the covenant was to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations from the time the covenant was executed until the liability of the promisor as bail had ceased. Bowles v. Elmore, 7 Gratt. 385.

Stipulation in Insurance Policy.—It is valid for a fire insurance policy to contain a stipulation which limits the period within which suit can be brought thereon, to a shorter time than the period prescribed in the statute. Virginia, etc., Ins. Co. v. Wells, 83 Va. 736, 3 S. E. Rep. 349. See Virginia, etc., Ins. Co. v. Aiken, 82 Va. 424.

Insurance companies can grant an extension of time for a suit against them, in addition to that allowed by the policy, and after such extension has been given, the company cannot withdraw it, nor add conditions to it, without the consent of the party to whom it is given. Cochran v. London Assurance Corp., 93 Va. 553, 25 S. E. Rep. 597.

10. TACKING DISABILITIES.—Where a disability existing at the time the cause of action accrued is removed, another disability cannot be tacked to it, to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations. Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 3 H. & M. 289, 3 Am. Dec. 625; Hudsons v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352; Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

Thus the disability of coverture, arising after a cause of action accrues, cannot be tacked to that of infancy, existing previously, so as to prevent the statute of limitations from commencing to run on the expiration of the disability of infancy. Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495; Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529.

It seems if a party claim the benefit of the saving for infants and femes covert in an act of limitations, no other disability is available than the one which existed when the right of action accrued. Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

But where two or more disabilities exist in the same person when the right of action accrues, the rule is otherwise, and he is not obliged to act until the last is removed. Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529; Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

11. FRAUD.

Fraudulent Concealment of Facts.—If it appear by the proper pleadings supported by proof that the facts on which the cause of action is founded, were exclusively in the knowledge of the defendant, that he fraudulently concealed those facts, and that by such ways and means he deceived and obstructed the plaintiff from bringing his action within the time limited, the statute of limitations is answered. Vanbibber v. Belrne, 6 W. Va. 168. See monographic note on "Fraud" appended to Montgomery v. Rose, 1 Pat. & H. 5.

Concealment of Voluntary Deed from Creditors.—If a voluntary deed be made for lands, and its existence purposely concealed by the parties, and it is withheld from recordation for nine years, with intent to prevent the creditors of the grantor from knowing of its existence, and the creditors, being ignorant of it, are thereby lulled into a belief of security, and by reason thereof do not sue to avoid it, until after five years from the date of the deed, the time during which the creditors are thus obstructed is not to be computed as a part of the time limiting a suit to annul such deed. Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 87 W. Va. 3, 16 S. E. Rep. 364.

Fraudulent Possession of Slave.—If a slave be taken from the possession of his owner by fraud or violence, unaccompanied by any bona fide claim of property, no length of time will bar the action from the true owner. Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 4 Rand. 600.

To a bill by an heir to recover a slave, her increase and their profits, the statute of limitations was pleaded at the time of the purchase; the defendant had no notice of the plaintiff's title, and the plaintiff replied that the defendant's vendor had removed the slaves to a distance for the purpose of concealing them, and that they could not be found after a diligent search. Under all the circumstances, it was held that the statute was no bar to the bill. Farrar v. Jackson, Wythe 1.

12. ORDER OF REFERENCE IN CREDITORS' SUITS.

General Rule Stated.—It is laid down as a general proposition, which is supported by numerous authorities, that from the time of the entry of an order of reference in a creditors' suit, the statute of limitations will cease to run against all lien creditors, whether their claims be against a living debtor, or the estate of a dead debtor. The rule seems to arise from the theory that the court by ordering the account takes upon itself the distribution of the assets, and will enjoin the prosecution of independent suits having the same object. And many of these cases hold that it is unnecessary for the lien creditors to be parties to the suit, as the court which first acquires jurisdiction should from necessity have the power to compel all creditors to prosecute their claims in that suit, and from considerations of economy of costs and convenience to parties to prevent the institution of separate suits. Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565; Marling v. Robrecht, 18 W. Va. 440; Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625; Arnold v. Casner, 22 W. Va. 444; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Repass v. Moore, 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. Rep. 458; Covington v. Griffin, 98 Va. 124, 34 S. E. Rep. 974; Houck v. Dunham, 93 Va. 211, 23 S. E. Rep. 238; Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 531; Bank v. Allen, 76 Va. 200; Piedmont, etc., Ins. Co. v. Maury, 75 Va. 508; Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 289; Kent v. Cloyd, 30 Gratt. 555; Stephenson v. Taverners, 9 Gratt. 308; Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548; Norvell v. Little, 79 Va. 141; Bank v. Hays, 87 W. Va. 475, 16 S. E. Rep. 561; Craufurd v. Smith, 98 Va. 630, 23 S. E. Rep. 335; Bell v. Wood, 94 Va. 677, 27 S. E. Rep. 504; Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. Rep. 544.

Modification of General Rule.—In the late case of Callaway v. Saunders, 99 Va. 350, 38 S. E. Rep. 182, the general rule, as above stated, was materially modified. JUDGE BUCHANAN, delivering the unanimous decision of the court, said: "It is generally broadly stated that an order for an account of liens in a creditor's suit suspends the running of the statute against all lien creditors. But it is believed that there is no case which holds that the order for an account will prevent the running of the statute against the demand of a creditor who did not assert his demand in the suit. On the contrary the authorities show that the rule is only applied to such creditors as come in under the decree, or otherwise become parties to the suit, and that as to all others the statute continues to run." See this position approved in editorial note appended to the case in 7 Va. Law Reg. 42. See also, Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 381, 7 S. E. Rep. 531, and Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) 188 (note).

Effect on Pending Suits.—It is well settled that the entry of the decree for an account in one creditor's suit operates to suspend all other pending suits, and this order may be made in the first cause ready for hearing, although it was not the first suit brought. And where a creditor, with knowledge that there has been a decree for an account in another creditor's suit, brings a separate suit for his own debt, he will be compelled to pay the costs. Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565; Kent v. Cloyd, 30 Gratt. 555; Stephenson v. Taverners, 9 Gratt. 308; Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 289; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211. See generally, monographic note on "Creditors' Bills" appended to Suckley v. Rotchford, 12 Gratt. 60.

Invalid Consent to Decree by Guardian of Infants—Consent of Parties Sui Juris.—Where the consent of a guardian of infants to the making of an order of reference to ascertain the liens against the lands of such infants for the debts of their father, is invalid, such order will not stop the statute of limitations as to debts against the father of the infants. But as to the parties who are sui juris, their consent to such order will stop the statute as to liens against them, from the date of such reference. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

12. DEPARTURE FROM STATE.

Resident When Action Accrued.—For a departure from the state to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations, it is necessary by sec. 2933, Va. Code 1887, before it was amended, that at the time of the accrual of the right of action the defendant be a resident of the state, and that he shall depart therefrom after such time. Griffin v. Woolford, 100 Va. —, 41 S. E. Rep. 949.

Residence Depends on Intention.—The removal of a debtor from the state with the intention of changing his residence, will bar the statute while he remains without the state. But the question of residence is one of intention, and the old one will not be regarded as lost as long as the animus revertendi remains. Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 437.

Removal after Contracting Debt.—Where a debtor, who resides in the state, removes after contracting the debt to another state, the removal is itself an obstruction to the prosecution of a suit by the creditor to recover the debt, and the statute of limitations will not run against the debt while the debtor resides out of the state. Ficklin v. Carrington, 31 Gratt. 219; Abell v. Insurance Co., 18 W. Va. 415.

In Markle v. Burch, 11 Gratt. 26, a simple contract debt was made in 1819, when the debtor lived in Virginia, and shortly afterwards he moved out of the state, remaining absent until his death in 1826, and in 1840, a proceeding by a foreign attachment was instituted to recover the debt. The proceeding was barred by the statute of limitations.

Departure after Accrual of Right of Action.—A departure from and residence out of the state after the accrual of the right of action, are of their own force an obstruction to the prosecution of such right of action, excusing it from the statute of limitations. Fisher v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. Rep. 578.

Departure Prior to Right of Action.—If before both the origin of the cause of action and the accrual of the right of action, a resident of the state moved out of it, his departure and residence abroad will not save the action from the statute of limitations. Fisher v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. Rep. 578.

Section 18, ch. 104, of the W. Va. Code of 1887, in regard to the suspension of the statute of limitations by the departure of a debtor from the state, does not apply when the defendant, although once a resident of this state, removed therefrom before any right of action accrued against him, and before a transaction occurred out of which the plaintiff's cause of action arose. Walsh v. Schilling, 33 W. Va. 108, 10 S. E. Rep. 54.

Departure before Personal Judgment.—If a defendant, once a resident of the state, departs and resides out of it before a personal judgment is rendered against him, the time of his residence abroad will not excuse the judgment from the statute of limitations, though he was a resident when the cause of action on which the judgment rests arose or accrued. Fisher v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. Rep. 578.

Carpenter Leaving Family and Working in Several States.—A judgment debtor at the date of the judgment resided in the state, and was a carpenter by trade, and for several years after the judgment went from place to place in different states working at his trade, leaving his family all the time in the place where the judgment was obtained. His wife testified that only three months before her deposition he wrote that he was coming home, and that his family were expecting him home had he not died. It was held that these facts established no such obstruction as was contemplated by § 2933 of the Va. Code of 1887, as the judgment debtor had not left the state with the purpose of changing his residence. Brown v. Butler, 37 Va. 621, 18 S. E. Rep. 71.

Removal after Giving Note.—Where the maker of a note after giving it, removes from the state and remains away, he has obstructed the plaintiff's right to sue within Acts 1882, ch. 102, § 18, providing that where one leaves the state after a cause of action has accrued against him, the time of his absence shall not be computed, though suit is finally brought and service made by publication. Heflbower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16.

Contract Made Out of State—Temporary Absence of Plaintiff.—A contract is made out of West Virginia, to be performed within the state, with the plaintiff, who is a resident of the state, by the defendant, who had been a permanent resident of the state, but who was then temporarily absent from it. The time during which the defendant remains out of the state, is not to be computed as any part of the time within which the creditor is required by the statute of limitations to prosecute his suit on such contract. Abell v. Penn., etc., Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400.

No Agent of Insurance Company in State.—Where a fire insurance company is allowed to do business in a state on condition of having an agent there, on which service of process may be had, when there ceases to be an agent in the state, it is a departure of the company from the state, within the meaning of the limitation law. Abell v. Penn., etc., Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400.

Construction of Statute.—The broad proposition that the removal of the debtor operates proprio vigore an obstruction within the meaning of the statute (sec. 2933, Va. Code 1887) to the prosecution of the plaintiff's right, during the period of the debtor's absence, was modified in Wilson v. Kuntz,

7 Cranch (U. S.) 202, where a substantially similar statute of this state was the subject of construction. The court, speaking through CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL, held that it was essential in order to bring a case within the exception contained in the statute, that the plaintiff should have been actually obstructed or defeated in bringing or maintaining his action by the removal of the defendant. Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 621, 13 S. E. Rep. 71.

The same statute was construed in Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776, which case went up from the Eastern district of Virginia. This section provides that where a cause of action shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this state, if such person shall, by departing from the same, obstruct the prosecution of such action, the time such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed in determining the time within which the action ought to have been prosecuted. It was held that this section did not apply where the defendant had removed from the state before he made the contract sued on.

Where there is no evidence that the defendant was ever a resident of this state, nor that she in departing therefrom intended to obstruct or did obstruct the prosecution of any suit against her, the effect of the statute of limitations was not avoided by sec. 2933 of the Code, which provides that where a person by leaving the state or by any other indirect way obstructs the prosecution of a right, the time of such obstruction shall not be computed in considering the effect of the statute of limitations. Lovett v. Perry, 98 Va. 604, 37 S. E. Rep. 83.

Same—Residence in State.—If a person residing in another state, makes his home in this state, and thereafter departs from, and continues to reside out of the state, he will be considered as a person, "who before the action accrued, resided in this state," and who by his departure and residence out of it, has obstructed the payee in the prosecution of his right of action on such note, during such absence from this state. Hefflebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16.

Same—Preliminary Suits.—Section 20, ch. 146, of the Code of 1873, which suspends the operation of the statute if the defendant leaves the state, or by other indirect ways or means, obstructs the prosecution of the action, does not apply to a case when the obstruction was to suits which were necessary preliminaries to the suit in which the statute was pleaded. Bickle v. Chrisman, 76 Va. 678.

14. HAPPENING OF SUBSEQUENT EVENT.

Rule Stated.—When a right of action accrues to a party who is capable of suing, the statute of limitations begins to run, unless this is prevented by the case coming within some exception to the statute, and after the running of the statute has commenced, it cannot be stopped by the happening of any subsequent event or disability, such as death, want of personal representation, coverture, infancy, or any other disability. Handy v. Smith, 30 W. Va. 195, 3 S. E. Rep. 604; Harshberger v. Alger, 81 Gratt. 52; Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292; Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. Rep. 544; Mynes v. Mynes, 47 W. Va. 681, 35 S. E. Rep. 935; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505; Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 635; Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495; Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529; Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 289.

Thus it is well settled that when the statute of limitations has begun to run in the lifetime of the ancestor, it will not cease to run against his infant heirs, unless so specially provided by statute. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. Rep. 56; Wisons v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 182; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.

And if, after the right of action has accrued and the statute of limitations has begun to run, an ousted co-tenant dies, leaving infant heirs, the statute continues to run, and their rights are barred, notwithstanding their disability, in the same number of years as would bar their ancestor. They do not inherit the land, but a mere limited right of action, with days already numbered; and, unless they or their friends take the necessary legal steps to save the same within the period fixed by statute, their right of action is forever lost. Talbott v. Woodford, 48 W. Va. 449, 37 S. E. Rep. 388.

Unless there is an express saving in the statute of limitations, no person will come within its exceptions, and the prescribed limitations will operate against persons under disabilities as well as others; and the express exceptions refer only to such disabilities as exist at the time the right of action first accrued; for while, if several disabilities exist together at that time, the statute will only begin to run at the cessation of the last of them, yet if a second disability occur after those then existing have ceased, it cannot be pleaded; for it is the settled law that when the statute has once begun to run no subsequent event will interrupt it. Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 629.

15. MERGING CAUSE OF ACTION.—A personal judgment upon any cause of action merges and ends that cause of action, and thereafter the statute of limitations runs against the judgment. Fisher v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. Rep. 57.

A decree against an absent debtor merges the original cause of action and repels the statute of limitations, except so far as the statute may apply to a judgment or decree. Rootes v. Tompkins, 3 Gratt. 98.

16. VOID LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.—An attachment in equity was instituted in Virginia in July, 1861, against a nonresident debtor in the state of New York, and a garnishee, resident in Virginia. Service of process was made on the latter, and an order of publication was made against the former. The subject of the action was within the five-year limitation of the Virginia statute. The nonresident debtor was brought in the case by an amendment in 1879, and interposed the plea of the statute of limitations. It was held, that proceedings against him being void did not suspend the running of the statute. Dorr v. Rohr, 82 Va. 359. See 18. "Legal Proceedings," infra.

17. STATUTORY PROVISIONS.—Va. Code, sec. 2934, authorizing a new "action" within a year after abatement of a former action seasonably commenced, or reversal of a judgment on a ground not precluding a new trial for the same cause, notwithstanding the bar of limitation in the meantime, does not apply to equitable proceedings. Dawes v. New York, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 733, 33 S. E. Rep. 778.

Persons claiming rights of personal property, being under disability of infancy or coverture when their rights accrue, may prosecute any remedy in equity they are entitled to by prochein ami, at any time while the disability continues, no matter how long; or, in their proper persons, within five years the disability removed; the right to such remedy after being within the saving of the statute of limitations. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, sec. 12; Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh 79.

In an action against the maker and surety on a joint and several note, brought by the administrator of the payee, it appeared that the payee could have taken the suitors' test oath, prescribed by Acts 1868, ch. 136, sec. 27, and that the maker could take the oath, but the surety could not, it was held that as to the surety in such joint action the Acts of 1872, p. 76, extended the five-year limitation. Keller v. McHuffman, 15 W. Va. 64.

Section 3577 of the Code of 1887, which prescribes the limitation of the right to issue executions on a judgment, and to bring scire facias or action thereon, provides that "in computing time under this section there shall, as to writs of scire facias, be omitted from such computation the time elapsed between the 1st day of January, 1869, and the 29th day of March, 1871." This section as to the quoted clause was construed in Fadeley v. Williams, 96 Va. 397, 31 S. E. Rep. 515, not to apply to writs of scire facias.

In computing time under the statute of limitations, a period of one year from the qualification of the personal representative of a person for whose benefit an action is brought in the name of another cannot be excluded, since such person is not a party to the record. Acts 1887-88, pp. 345-6; Fadeley v. Williams, 96 Va. 397, 31 S. E. Rep. 515.

In ejectment the fact that the plaintiff had always claimed the land in controversy, and had not brought suit therefor because of his poverty, does not operate to suspend the operation of the statute. Section 2916 of the Code says: "No continual or other claim upon or near any land shall preserve any right of making an entry or bringing an action." Voight v. Raby, 90 Va. 799, 20 S. E. Rep. 824.

18. LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

a. PENDING SUITS IN GENERAL.

Suit to Enforce Mechanic's Lien.—Where a sub-contractor brings suit to enforce a duly recorded mechanic's lien, and makes the general contractor a defendant, and properly alleges the recorded lien in the bill, the act of limitation is stopped, not only as to the lien of the plaintiff, but also as to the general contractor's lien, and all claiming as contractors under him, and also suspends any suit by sub-contractors, instituted during the pendency of his suit. Spiller v. Wells, 96 Va. 508, 32 S. E. Rep. 46.

Administration Suit.—When an administrator or executor sues in equity to convene the creditors of the estate and administer the assets for their benefit, the statute of limitations stops running against their debts at the commencement of the suit. Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. Rep. 544.

Suit for Different Property.—An executor having delivered certain slaves to legatees as their property under the will, a subsequent action of detinue against him, for other slaves which the testator held in the same right, is not sufficient, though prosecuted to a judgment, to prevent the act of limitations from running, both at law and in equity, in favor of the legatees. Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 H. & M. 139.

Ward Delayed by Suit against Representative of Guardian.—The statute of limitations does not apply to a suit by a ward after becoming of age against the surety of his guardian, where the ward was delayed for more than ten years by the pendency of a suit against the administratrix of the guardian. Roberts v. Colvin, 8 Gratt. 368.

Claim Pending before Supervisors.—Where a party presents his claim against a county to the board of supervisors within the time limited by statute, and they decline to take it up and adjourn, and no entry is made of it until a subsequent meeting of the board, after the time of limitation, the statute will not be allowed to bar the claim. Dinwiddie County v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

Suit Pending from Beginning of Transaction.—The statute of limitations does not run to bar an order of restitution in a cause which has been pending from the beginning of the transaction to the entering of the decree complained of. Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

b. SUIT IN ANOTHER STATE.—In a suit by an administrator and widow of a decedent, brought in Virginia against his heirs, to sell lands to pay debts and satisfy the widow's dower, wherein the debts are decreed against the decedent's estate and subjecting its assets, such decree will not save such debts from the statute of limitations for the purposes of a suit prosecuted in West Virginia against lands there. Hull v. Hull, 35 W. Va. 155, 13 S. E. Rep. 49.

c. SET-OFFS.—In Hurst v. Hite, 20 W. Va. 183, the statute of limitations did not cease to run against the offsets of the defendant respectively, until the time the defendant's answer and account of offsets were filed in the cause. Sec. 9, ch. 126, W. Va. Code 1869. See Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. Rep. 544.

Voidable Executions Effective.—The issuance of an execution on a judgment contrary to an agreement of the parties entered of record, is voidable and not void, and is effectual to prolong the life of the judgment and protect it from the operation of the statute of limitations. Fulkerson v. Taylor, 100 Va. —, 8 Va. Law Reg. 255.

e. INJUNCTIONS.—The statute of limitations to judgments does not run while an injunction to the judgment is pending. Hutsonpiller v. Stover, 12 Gratt. 579. See monographic notes on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425, and "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

The pendency of an injunction suit, which prevents the enforcement of a right of action, will suspend the running of the statute of limitations against the claim. Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 30.

Against Sale of Executor's Land under Decree.—Before ten years had expired from the date of a decree against an executor, an injunction was awarded against the sale of the executor's place, but the decree was not assailed, nor the issuance of an execution thereon affected. This was held to be no such suspension as would permit revival after the lapse of ten years under sec. 13, of ch. 182, of Code of 1873. Series v. Cromer, 88 Va. 426, 13 S. E. Rep. 859.

f. AMENDMENTS.

General Rule.—When an amendment to a bill or declaration is properly allowed, so far as regards the statute of limitations, it will have the same effect as if it had been originally filed in the amended form at the commencement of the suit or action, and a cause not then barred will not be treated as barred at the time of the amendment by reason of such amendment. Kuhn v. Brownfield, 34 W. Va. 252, 12 S. E. Rep. 519; Lamb v. Cecil, 28 W. Va. 653. See monographic notes on "Amendments" appended to Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, and "Amended Bills" appended to Belton v. Apperson, 26 Gratt. 207.

Action on Insurance Policy.—In an action on a policy of fire insurance, an amended declaration may be filed claiming larger damages, or on additional property, under the same policy by the same fire. Where such amendment is made, the time as to the larger claim made by the amendment, whether under the statute of limitations or under a clause of the policy fixing a limitation for action under it, will stop running at the commencement of the suit, and not continue to the filing of the amended declaration. Bentley v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 729, 28 S. E. Rep. 584.

Action on Penal Statute.—The plaintiff in an action on a penal statute more than a year after the cause of action accrued, was allowed to amend his declaration, whereupon the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff ought not to maintain his action because it did not accrue within one year, or before he filed his amended declaration. It was held that under the law in force in West Virginia on the 9th of March, 1869, in such case the statute of limitations did not run in favor of the defendant up to the time of the filing of the amended declaration, but only until the commencement of the suit, that is the issuing of the original writ. Hart v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

g. LIMITATION CEASES ON COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION.

When Action Begins.—An action begins with the issuance of the summons to answer the declaration, and therefore the statute of limitations ceases to run at the date of the issuance of the summons. Lawrence v. Winifrede Coal Co., 48 W. Va. 139, 35 S. E. Rep. 925; Jones v. Jincey, 9 Gratt. 708.

Same—From Date of Summons.—A suit to enforce a mechanic's lien, in which summons was issued, but not served within six months from the recordation of the lien, is not barred by the statute, as the suit begins from the date of the summons, not from its service. U. S. Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 46 W. Va. 590, 33 S. E. Rep. 342.

Same—Original Writ Quashed.—The suing out of a writ is the commencement of an action, and where the original writ is quashed and a new writ is ordered, the commencement of the action, so far as the act of limitations is concerned, begins with the issuing of the new writ. Noell v. Noell, 93 Va. 433, 26 S. E. Rep. 242.

Same—Petition—Date of Filing.—Where one lien creditor files his petition by leave of court in a suit brought by another lien creditor against their common debtor, the statute of limitations ceases to run against the debt of such petitioner at the time he files his petition, and not at the time when the process to answer it is served on the defendant. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601.

Court of Appeals—Order for Supersedeas.—The order of a judge of the court of appeals for a writ of supersedeas, is the true commencement for the proceedings in that court, and therefore if it be within five years from the date of the judgment complained of, although the writ is not taken out until five years have elapsed, it will be in time. Overstreet v. Marshall, 3 Call 192.

Effect of Void Process.—A summons commencing a suit, which is void because it has a wrong return day, is nevertheless effective to bring into existence a suit, such that its dismissal by the court for that cause will give one year after its dismissal for a new suit under the statute of limitations. Ketterman v. Dry Fork R. Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. Rep. 683.

Suit to Enforce Contract for Sale of Land Not Process to Suspend Executions.—A suit to enforce a contract for the sale of a judgment debtor's land, is not such legal process, as under Code of 1873, ch. 182, sec. 18, suspends the right of the judgment creditor to sue out executions, and stops the statute of limitations against such judgments. Straus v. Bodeker, 86 Va. 543, 10 S. E. Rep. 570.

h. DISMISSAL, NONSUIT OR FAILURE OF ACTION.—A suit brought by a judgment creditor to enforce satisfaction of his judgment, suspends the operation of the statute of limitations during its pendency. But if it is dismissed without satisfaction of the judgment, it will not prevent the bar of the statute to another suit brought after its dismissal. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 25.

Failure to File Declaration.—A suit begun by the issuance of a summons, and dismissed at rule for the mere failure of the plaintiff to file his declaration, will not save his second suit for the same cause of action, brought within one year after such dismissal, from the statute of limitations. Sec. 12, ch. 104, Code of 1891; Lawrence v. Winifrede Coal Co., 48 W. Va. 139, 35 S. E. Rep. 925.

Adequate Remedy at Law.—If a bill in chancery be dismissed upon the ground that plaintiff's claim is exclusively cognizable at law, he cannot plead the pendency of such suit in chancery to prevent the act of limitations from being a bar to his subsequent recovery at law. Gray v. Berryman, 4 Munf. 181.

No Hand to Receive Fund.—Where a suit is brought and decided in 1858, but retained on the docket until 1867, because there was no hand to receive the fund, when it is dismissed with leave to reinstate it on motion of any person interested, and it is reinstated in 1878, and a supplementary suit is brought, the latter is deemed a continuation of the former as to questions arising under the statute of limitations. Sharpe v. Rockwood, 78 Va. 24.

Want of Formality.—It is no answer to the bar set up by the plea of the act of limitations, that the plaintiff sued out a writ for the same cause of action within the time prescribed by the act, which writ was executed and returned, and went off the docket for want of formality. Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511.

Nonsuit on Plaintiff's Motion.—Where an action is brought within the statutory period, and after the expiration of that period, the plaintiff is nonsuited upon his own motion, the statute of limitations is a bar to another action for the same cause. Mannell v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 183, 37 S. E. Rep. 357. See Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 25.

The operation of the statute to bar a judgment obtained against a testator in his lifetime, will not be prevented by scire facias sued out within five years from the qualification of the personal representative on which the latter suffered a nonsuit. Peyton v. Carr, 1 Rand. 436.

Unsuccessful Action of Ejectment.—An unsuccessful action of ejectment makes no change in the possession of land, and consequently does not stop the running of the statute of limitations. Nelson v. Triplett, 99 Va. 421, 39 S. E. Rep. 150.

Distress Warrant Unexecuted.—The contention that the issuing of a distress warrant fifteen years prior to the institution of the suit, which warrant was returned unexecuted, and which remained filed in the clerk's office, without vitality or effect until suit was instituted, would operate to suspend the running of the statute, was held unsupported by principle or authority in Ashby v. Bell, 80 Va. 811.

VIII. ACKNOWLEDGMENT, NEW PROMISE AND PART PAYMENT.

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT AND NEW PROMISE.

a. GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND RULES.

Statement of Rule.—An acknowledgment in writing, to operate as a new promise to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, must be a clear and definite acknowledgment of a precise sum, plainly importing a willingness and liability to pay, not in any wise conditional, nor by way of promise or attempt at settlement. Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 35 S. E. Rep. 986; Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Abrahams v. Swann, 18 W. Va. 274; Quarrier v. Quarrier, 36 W. Va. 310, 15 S. E. Rep. 156; Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 523; Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907; Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 23.

If the new promise is to be raised by implication of law from such acknowledgment, there must be an unqualified acknowledgment of a subsisting debt, which the party is liable and willing to pay. Abrahams v. Swann, 18 W. Va. 274; Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907; Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 523.

Conditions.—If the acknowledgment or new promise be coupled with any terms or conditions, they must be proven to have been performed, or else no recovery can be had. Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 23; Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Farmers' Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 603.

In an action of debt on a promissory note negotiable at a bank by the holders against the indorser, the latter pleads the general issue with leave to give the statute the limitations in evidence. At the trial the plaintiffs prove a conditional promise by the indorser to pay the debt within the period of limitations. Such conditional promise does not suffice to take the case out of the statute, unless performance of the condition be shown. Farmers' Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 603.

Promise "to Settle"—Acknowledgment of Debt.—Thus a promise to settle, or an acknowledgment that something is due, but mentioning no certain amount, although in writing, will not remove the bar of the statute of limitations. Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381. See also, Dinguid v. Schoolfield, 32 Gratt. 808; Horner v. Speed, 2 Pat. & H. 643; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 523; Gover v. Chamberlain, 83 Va. 287, 5 S. E. Rep. 174; Rowe v. Marchant, 86 Va. 182, 9 S. E. Rep. 995; Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907; Abrahams v. Swann, 18 W. Va. 280; Quarrier v. Quarrier, 36 W. Va. 317, 15 S. E. Rep. 156; Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329, and note.

United States Supreme Court Rule.—The doctrine is laid down by the supreme court of the United States in the leading case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351, that to remove the bar of the statute of limitations by a new promise, it must be determinate and unequivocal; and to imply a promise from a subsequent acknowledgment, the acknowledgment must be an unqualified admission of an existing debt which the party is liable for and willing to pay. This rule has been repeatedly recognized by the Virginia court. Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110.

b. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Promise "to Settle."—It requires a promise to pay, or such an acknowledgment in writing that a promise to pay may be implied from it, to take a debt out of the statute of limitations, and it is well settled that a promise merely "to settle" is not sufficient. Gover v. Chamberlain, 83 Va. 286, 5 S. E. Rep. 174; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110. See "A. General Principles and Rules," supra.

An acknowledgment by the defendant that the items in the plaintiff's account are just, but that he had some offsets thereto, and a subsequent promise "to settle" all differences and accounts fairly, and not to take advantage of the statute of limitations, is not sufficient to remove the bar of the statute. Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381, 33 Am. Dec. 246.

Where a testator said, "I am too unwell to do business now, but when I am better I will settle your accounts," these words were held not to import such promise to pay or acknowledgment of the debt as would take the case out of the statute of limitations. Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45.

The fact that the defendants had in writing referred to a "settlement," and one had written to one of the plaintiffs desiring and proposing a settlement, does not amount to such a promise as to prevent the bar of the statute. Pendleton v. Whiting, Wythe 38.

Undelivered Writing.—An undelivered writing or due bill, found among a supposed debtor's papers after his death, is not a sufficient acknowledgment to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 138, 20 S. E. Rep. 910.

Entries by Party.—Mere entries by a party in his own book of accounts will not operate as an acknowledgment, to take a demand out of the statute of limitations. Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 35 S. E. Rep. 986.

Deposition.—A deposition of a maker of a note given and signed by him, in a case in which the obligee was not a party, for the purpose of obtaining a credit for it as to be paid by him, and for which he was allowed such a credit in that case, is such an acknowledgment of the debt by him as will defeat the plea of the statute of limitations in an action on the note by the obligee against him. Dinguid v. Schoolfield, 32 Gratt. 803.

Statement of Account.—No statement of account can have the effect of stopping the running of the statute of limitations upon the items of account which are included in the account stated, and which will otherwise be barred, unless there be a writing signed by the party to be charged, or his agent, expressly promising to pay the balance thus ascertained to be due, or in which there is such an acknowledgment of the liability that a promise of payment may be inferred therefrom. Magarity v. Shipman, 93 Va. 64, 24 S. E. Rep. 466.

Same—Not Signed.—A stated account not signed by the parties will not operate as an acknowledgment to take the demand out of the statute of limitations. Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 35 S. E. Rep. 986.

Acknowledgment of Destruction of Bonds by Obligor.—The obligor and obligee of bonds, which were barred by the statute of limitations, resided together, and the obligor supposing the obligee in extremis, took the bonds and destroyed them. When the obligee recovered the obligor acknowledged that he had destroyed the bonds and that they were unpaid and stated their amounts. It was held that such acknowledgment implied a promise to pay the bond. Rowe v. Marchant, 86 Va. 177, 9 S. E. Rep. 995.

Promise of Personal Representative.—In West Virginia the administrator by his verbal promise can no more prolong the vitality of a debt of his decedent, not yet barred, beyond the limit of the statutory bar, than he can revive a debt already barred; neither has he any option about protecting the estate by interposing the statute of limitations when applicable. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 83 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 26.

In Virginia a debt which is barred by the statute of limitations at the death of the debtor cannot be revived by the promise of the personal representative to pay it. Seig v. Acord, 21 Gratt. 365; Brown v. Rice, 26 Gratt. 473; Brown v. Rice, 76 Va. 650; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 668; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 524.

Admission by Representative.—Where there are two joint executors or administrators, to one of whom the deceased was indebted in his lifetime for money loaned so long before his death, that when he died it was barred by the statute, the debt cannot be revived by the admission of the other administrator or executor that the money had been loaned and was due. Seig v. Acord, 21 Gratt. 365.

An administrator cannot by the acknowledgment in the pleading of a debt against his decedent, which is barred by the statute of limitations, or in any other way, remove the bar of the statute. Stiles v. Laurel, etc., Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 888, 85 S. E. Rep. 986.

Charge in Will.—A charge in a will for payment of debts will not revive a debt barred by the statute at the death of the testator. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601. See foot-note to Baylor v. Dejarnette, 13 Gratt. 152.

Although specific direction be given in a will, the executors cannot pay debts which are barred by the statute of limitations when relied on by the debtors. Dunn v. Renick, 33 W. Va. 476, 10 S. E. Rep. 810.

A provision in a will that the money arising from the sale of the testator's personal property, after the payment of his just debts, shall be applied to certain purposes, does not create a trust for the payment of debts, nor take any debt out of the operation of the act of limitations. Brown v. Griffiths, 6 Munf. 450.

C. CERTAINTY AND SUFFICIENCY REQUIRED.

Identification by Extrinsic Evidence.—If an acknowledgment of a debt or promise to pay is contained in a letter, it is not necessary that the amount of the debt or its date should be specified therein, but the particular debt, to which the letter refers, may be identified by extrinsic evidence; and if so identified clearly, and the promise is unequivocal, or the acknowledgment is of a subsisting debt, for which the defendant is liable and willing to pay, the bar of the statute is thereby removed. Abrahams v. Swann, 18 W. Va. 274.

Where there is a promise to pay, not specifying any amount, but which can be made certain as to the amount, it is sufficient. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

Fixed Sum.—A new promise, in order to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, must not be uncertain, but it must acknowledge a fixed sum or balance, which admits of ready and certain ascertainment. Quarrier v. Quarrier, 86 W. Va. 810, 15 S. E. Rep. 154.

"Agreed Balance"—Amount Not Appearing.—A promise to pay the "agreed balance on your judgment," is not good as a new promise, the amount of such agreed balance not appearing. If such balance refer to one thereafter agreed upon, and it does not appear that any balance was agreed, the promise is inoperative. Quarrier v. Quarrier, 86 W. Va. 810, 15 S. E. Rep. 154.

Acknowledgment of Property.—In an action of detinue brought for the recovery of a diamond pin, the act of limitations was pleaded, and the plaintiff replied that the defendant within five years next before the action was brought acknowledged the pin to be the property of the plaintiff. On demurrer to the replication, it was held that the acknowledgment was not sufficient to repel the effect of the statute, and that the five-year limitation could not be enlarged by any acknowledgment. Morris v. Lyon, 84 Va. 331, 4 S. E. Rep. 734.

d. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Section 2922, Code Virginia.—It is enacted by sec. 2922 of the Code that if any debtor on contract promises payment in writing, the creditor may maintain an action within the number of years after the promise that he might have maintained it, if it were the original cause of action. Robinson v. Bass (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 660.

Acknowledgment of Claimant's Right by Possessor of Land.—Whenever the possessor of land acknowledges a right in the claimant, the statute of limitations does not operate, because it negatives the idea of adverse possession. Ersine v. North, 14 Gratt. 60.

New Assumpsit for Store Account Barred.—A new assumpsit, for a store account barred by the six months' act of limitation, binds the debtor. Beall v. Edmondson, 3 Call 514.

Promise by Letter—Illustrative Case.—The plaintiff, as a member of a partnership, which ended in 1880 and alone from 1880 to 1888, was the physician of the testatrix, but during this time rendered no bills. From 1888 to 1895, when the plaintiff removed to another locality, annual bills were rendered and paid, with the exception of the latter year. When he removed the testatrix wrote the plaintiff that it was a shame that the failure of herself and his other patients to pay him had caused his departure, and that if he would send her his bill she would pay it in a short time. This letter was held not to remove the bar of the statute as to the accounts prior to 1888. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

e. WHO MAY MAKE.

Person Liable.—A promise, to repel the plea of the statute of limitations, must be made by the person against whom the right to maintain an action has accrued. See Code of 1873, ch. 146, § 10; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518.

By One Partner.—Although the acknowledgment of a debt by one or more of the partners of a mercantile firm, after the dissolution thereof, is competent to do away with the bar of the act of limitations in an action brought against the firm, the existence of the debt being first proved by other testimony, or admitted by the pleadings, yet such acknowledgment is not proper evidence of the existence of the debt, so as to charge the other partners. Shelton v. Cocke, 8 Munf. 191.

One partner cannot as against his copartner revive an old obligation, which is barred by the statute of limitations. Davis v. Poland, 92 Va. 225, 23 S. E. Rep. 292. See Woodson v. Wood, 84 Va. 478, 5 S. E. Rep. 277.

2. PART PAYMENT.

Must Be on Specific Debt.—In order for part payment to take the case out of the statute of limitations, it must be a payment upon a specific debt, and not a payment upon account. Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110.

Made after Debt Is Barred.—It was held in Gover v. Chamberlain, 83 Va. 286, 5 S. E. Rep. 174, that a part payment of a note made after it had become barred by limitation was not sufficient to remove the bar of the statute.

IX. IN EQUITY.

1. WHERE EQUITY HAS EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION.—The statute of limitations is not binding on courts of chancery in matters which are exclusively cognizable in equity. Heiskell v. Powell, 28 W. Va. 717. And where a suit is founded on a right purely equitable in its nature and without any corresponding legal right, there exists no analogy by which the statute of limitations may be applied, but it must be determined entirely upon equitable principles and rules, regardless of the statute of limitations. Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 504. Thus on partition, part of a tract was set off to the survivor of the two equal owners, and the remainder, belonging to the heirs of the deceased joint owner, was sold to complainant. Several years later it was discovered that the part set off to the surviving owner contained a large quantity in excess of his share, and that the part sold to complainant was proportionately deficient. The right to relief being purely equitable, the statute of limitations cannot be set up as a bar. Fore v. Foster, 86 Va. 104, 9 S. E. Rep. 497.

2. WHERE JURISDICTION IS CONCURRENT—RULE OF ANALOGY.—In Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 756, JUDGE BURKS, delivering the opinion said: "The general rule undoubtedly is that in the application of statutes of limitations equity follows the law, and wherever a demand would be barred at law, an equitable demand of the like character will be barred in equity. The bar is applied by analogy, or according to some authorities, by obedience to the statutory enactment." Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 189; Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 46; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; Drumright v. Hite, 2 Va. Dec. 465; Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 67.

Thus there can be no doubt that where a debt is of a strictly legal nature, of which equity has concurrent jurisdiction with law courts, it is as much subject to the operation of the statute of limitations in a court of equity as in a court of law. In such cases the statute virtually includes courts of equity. At all events the bar of the statute is applied by analogy, if not in obedience to the statutory enactment. Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 756; Wilsons v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 179; Houck v. Dunham, 92 Va. 211, 23 S. E. Rep. 238; Graham v. Graham, 16 W. Va. 508; Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. —, 40 S. E. Rep. 680, 7 Va. Law Reg. 851; McCarty v. Ball, 82 Va. 872, 1 S. E. Rep. 189; Ayre v. Burke, 82 Va. 841; Cottrell v. Watkins, 89 Va. 810, 17 S. E. Rep. 328; Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 163; Harrison v. Harrison, 1 Call 419.

Actions to Recover Land.—In Wilson v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 179, it was held that when a suit for land was not brought until twenty-five years after the right of action accrued, the bar of the statute was complete, as the time prescribed by statute to bar an entry on land was fifteen years when the cause of action accrued.

Thus it was held in Drumright v. Hite, 2 Va. Dec. 465, that sec. 2915 of the Code, limiting an action to recover land east of the Alleghany mountains to fifteen years next after the right to bring it accrues, will be applied in equity when a suit is brought for the land, and for an account of the rents and profits. Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 759; Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 67; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 257.

Mortgages and Deeds of Trust.—In Virginia the limitation in equity as against mortgages and deeds of trust, if the statute of limitations does not govern, is twenty years, and such limitation is based upon the presumption of payment, and even when more than twenty years have elapsed from the time the right to sue accrues, in some cases the payment will not be presumed. This limitation is not by analogy to the statute of limitations as applicable to ejectment, or any other real action, but by analogy to the limitation from presumption of payment, in actions at law or upon a single bill, if it is not merely a rule of courts of equity. Pitzer v. Burns, 7 W. Va. 63.

The right to enforce the lien of a deed of trust, being an equitable remedy, the statute of limitations has no direct operation upon such right. But courts of equity have adopted a general rule as to the limit for the enforcement of such lien by analogy to the right of entry at law under the old statute of limitations—21 Jac. 1. ch. 15. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 674. See monographic notes on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197, and "Deeds of Trust."

Claim for Deficiency in Land.—A claim for compensation for deficiency in quantity of land conveyed by deed, where the purchase money has been paid, is a mere personal demand, not cognizable alone in equity, but at law, and is subject to the statute of limitations. Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. Rep. 1028.

Claim for Money Deposited.—Money deposited by one person with another to be paid to a third, and not paid, does not create a trust cognizable alone in equity, not subject to the statute of limitations, but is only a legal demand and is subject to the statute. Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. Rep. 1028.

Exception in Case of Trust.—An exception exists to the rule that equity applies the statutory bar by analogy, in the case of controversies between trustee and cestui que trust, which are subsisting technical trusts cognizable only in courts of equity. Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 52.

Liability of Guardian.—Although an action by an infant on the bond of his guardian is barred both as to the guardian and his sureties, after ten years from the arrival of the ward at age, yet an action may be maintained against a guardian on his general responsibility in equity, if not barred by laches. Magruder v. Goodwyn, 2 P. & H. 561.

Vendor's Lien.—In the leading case of Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 242, it was decided that although an action at law to recover the purchase money was barred by the statute, yet the right to maintain a suit in equity to enforce the vendor's lien on the land could not be affected by any lapse of time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 892, 11 S. E. Rep. 565.

Judgments.—Although a judgment is actually barred by the statute of limitations, yet the remedy in equity to enforce the lien is not affected by any time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Gibson v. Green, 89 Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 661; Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 531. See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Bond or Note Secured by Deed.—In equity a deed of trust is regarded merely as a security for the debt, and therefore as long as a recovery on the bond or note given for the debt is not barred by the statute, the right to enforce the lien of the trust continues and it may be enforced. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 674.

X. IN CRIMINAL CASES.

In State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 777, which was decided in 1882, it was held that sec. 12, ch. 13 of the Code which said, "The time that any act is to be done shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last," applied to criminal as well as to civil statutes of limitation.

Presentment.—A presentment is the bringing of a prosecution, and if the prosecution is not barred when commenced, the failure to file an information before the regular time expires will not bar it. Com. v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631.

Information.—An information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, though in form a criminal proceeding, yet is in substance a civil proceeding for the trial of a civil right, and therefore the act which limits the prosecution of an information on any penal law to one year does not apply to such informations. Com. v. Birchett, 2 Va. Cas. 51.

Information for Assault.—Under the Act of Jan. 25, 1805, sec. 2, amending the penal laws, an information for an assault cannot be filed after more than one year from the commission of the assault. Com. v. Chichester, 1 Va. Cas. 312.

Presumption.—After a conviction on a trial for a misdemeanor, the presumption in the appellate court is that the offence was proved to be within the period of limitations, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary. Earhart v. Com., 9 Leigh 671.

Averments.—When the time within which the prosecution for offences is limited by statute, the time as averred in the indictment should appear to be within the limit; but it is not necessary to aver that it occurred within that period. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

If an indictment for an offence, the prosecution of which is by statute limited to a certain period after the offence was committed, shows upon its face that at the time of the indictment the prosecution was barred by such statute, it is fatally defective, and the defendant may take advantage of such defect by motion to quash the indictment, by demurrer, or by motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645. See generally, monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674, and the other criminal law titles of this series.

XI. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. THE PLEA.

Foundation for.—It is essential as a foundation for the plea of the statute of limitations that there be proof of adversary possession. Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147.

Trespass—Certainty.—In an action of trespass on the case for damages for removing and mining coal, a plea of limitations that more than three years before the commencement of the suit, the defendants were in peaceful possession of the land, claiming title under lease, and that they have continuously remained in possession more than three years before the commencement of the action, was bad for want of certainty, and for the reason it did not state under whom the lease mentioned was claimed. Perdue v. Caswell Creek Coal & Coke Co., 40 W. Va. 372, 21 S. E. Rep. 870.

Assumpsit—General Rule.—The plea of nonassumpsit within five years, if general, will refer to the time of the plea pleaded, whereas it ought to refer to the institution of the suit, and should conclude with an averment. Smith v. Walker, 1 Wash. 134.

2. MUST BE PLEADED.

General Rule.—Nothing is better settled than the rule that in order for the statute of limitations to be of avail to a party it must be relied on in the pleadings. Gibson v. Green, 89 Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 661; Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh 6; Smith v. Hutchinson, 78 Va. 683; Colvert v. Millstead, 5 Leigh 88; Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460; Seborn v. Beckwith, 30 W. Va. 774, 5 S. E. Rep. 450.

It is the established rule that where the statute is pleaded, either at law or in equity, the plaintiff to bring himself within its savings, must set forth the facts specially upon which he relies, either by replication to the plea, or by amendment of the bill. Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518.

Wherever it is necessary to plead the act of limitations, in order for it to form a bar, it ought to be specially pleaded, or at least insisted on; that is, the term prescribed by statute should be particularly pleaded, or relied on, to let the plaintiff show in his replication, avoidance of the bar, if he can. Hudsons v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352.

Waiver.—Before a party can have the benefit of the bar created by the statute of limitations, he must plead the statute, or in some manner indicate his intention to claim the benefit of it, otherwise, it will be considered by the court to be waived. Smith v. Brown, 44 W. Va. 342, 30 S. E. Rep. 160.

Action for Seduction.—In an action by a father for damages for the seduction of his daughter, if the defendant would rely on the statute of limitations of one year, he must plead it before or at the trial. It cannot be relied upon by instructions to the jury. Riddle v. McGinnis, 22 W. Va. 253.

Action on Store Account.—A defendant cannot take advantage of the act imposing a limitation of one year on actions on store accounts without pleading it, the court not being directed to cause such items as have been of more than one year's standing in such accounts to be expunged, or to instruct the jury to disregard them, and the jury not being required to disallow and reject them without a plea. Taylor v. Richards, 8 Munf. 8.

Appellate Court.—Where the statute of limitations is not pleaded nor relied upon in the lower court, the appellate court will consider that the statute is out of the case. Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 312. See section XII "Appeals," infra.

Writs of Error.—The statute of limitations of writs of error, if it applies to writs of error coram nobis, cannot be relied on without being pleaded. Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh 308.

Exception—General Replication to Equitable Set-Off.—As a general rule the statute of limitations must be pleaded specially or it cannot be relied on, but there are some exceptions to the rule. In the case of equitable set-off under sec. 3299 of the Code, it cannot be specially pleaded, and the only reply that can be made to such plea is a general replication, and under it the statute of limitations may be relied upon. Sexton v. Aultman, 92 Va. 20, 22 S. E. Rep. 838.

1 HOW PLEADED.

Sufficiency—Statement of Facts Constituting Bar.—

The defence of the statute of limitations is an affirmative one, and a plea of the statute which merely avers the pleader's conclusions of law, is bad. The plea must as a general rule set up the facts constituting the bar, as for instance, that the alleged cause of action did not accrue within certain designated years previous to the institution of the suit. Atkinson v. Winters, 47 W. Va. 226, 84 S. E. Rep. 834.

A plea of the act of limitations should state on what act defendant relies. Wortham v. Smith, 15 Gratt. 487.

Same—Covenant.—A plea to an action of covenant that the defendant "did not, within twenty years next before the bringing of this suit, break his covenant as the plaintiff hath alleged," is a good plea of the statute of limitations, as it is equivalent to saying that the cause of action did not accrue within that time. Davis v. McMullen, 86 Va. 256, 9 S. E. Rep. 1005. See monographic note on "Covenants, The Action of."

Same—Assumpsit.—In an action of assumpsit for the use and occupation of land, where the cause of action arises upon the breach of the contract, and not at the time of making the same, the plea that the defendant did not assume, as in the declaration set forth, within five years prior to the commencement of this suit, is not a proper plea. It should be that the action did not accrue within five years, etc. Atkinson v. Winters, 47 W. Va. 226, 84 S. E. Rep. 834. See monographic note on "Assumpsit" appended to Kennalrd v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 183.

Mistake of Counsel Sufficient Grounds.—A mistake of the defendant's counsel in advising him that he could avail himself of the defence of limitation without pleading it, is sufficient grounds for leave to file the pleas in addition to the answer. Jackson v. Cutright, 5 Munf. 308.

Action of Debt.—Where an action of debt is brought on a judgment after ten years from the date thereof, and the defendant wishes to avail himself of the statute of limitations, it is necessary that he should do so by plea. A demurrer to the declaration is not the proper mode to take advantage of the statute. Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591. See monographic note on "Debt, The Action of" appended to Davis v. Mead, 13 Gratt. 118.

b. DEMURRER.

In Equity—West Virginia Rule.—In West Virginia it is held, contrary to the Virginia doctrine, but in accordance with the general rule in the other state courts, and in the supreme court of the United States, that the defence of the statute of limitations can be taken advantage of by demurring to a bill. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601; Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795; Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 26; Whittaker v. Southwest Va. Imp. Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. Rep. 507; Paxton v. Paxton, 38 W. Va. 617, 18 S. E. Rep. 765; Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 17, 14 S. E. Rep. 412; Seborn v. Beckwith, 30 W. Va. 774, 5 S. E. Rep. 450; Laidley v. Laidley, 25 W. Va. 530; Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 637.

Although the rule is that a defendant at law must plead the statute of limitations and cannot raise the defence by demurrer, yet where a cause of action which did not exist at law is given by statute, and the bringing of the suit within a certain period is made an essential element of the right to sue, and there is no saving or qualification, objection may be taken by demurrer. Such a statute is not strictly a statute of limitations, and the right to sue must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it. Lambert v. Ensign Mfg. Co., 42 W. Va. 818, 26 S. E. Rep. 431.

Since the disuse of special replication in equitable practice, if the bill in equity shows on its face that the relief it prays for is barred by the lapse of time, advantage may be taken of such bill by demurrer, as well as by plea. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601.

Same—Virginia Rule.—In the recent case of Hubble v. Poff, 98 Va. 646, 87 S. E. Rep. 277, it was decided that the statute of limitations could not be interposed in Virginia by a demurrer to a bill in equity. The conclusion of the court is founded on the principle that if the statute could be interposed by demurrer, the plaintiff would thereby be cut off from introducing new matter to show that the bar had been removed by a new promise or otherwise. The following cases were cited in the opinion: Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh 10; Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329; Colvert v. Millstead, 5 Leigh 93; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 665; Gibson v. Green, 89 Va. 526, 16 S. E. Rep. 661.

At Law.—The declaration in an action for death by wrongful act showed on its face that the action was instituted more than twelve months after the injury occurred. A demurrer to the declaration was properly sustained. Manuel v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 188, 87 S. E. Rep. 957.

See, for full collection of cases, monographic note on "Demurrers" appended to Com. v. Jackson, 1 Va. Cas. 501.

c. ANSWER.

Sufficiency.—Anything in an answer which apprises the plaintiff that the defendant relies on the statute of limitations, is sufficient, if such facts are stated as are necessary to show that the statute is applicable. Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329.

In a bill by a creditor of a testator against the executor of a legatee, where the latter relies upon the statute of limitations in his answer, it is sufficient to protect the estate from a decree against the executor. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601.

The same strictness of pleading is not required in equity as at law. It is not common to plead the statute specially or formally in equity, but only to rely upon it in general terms in the answer. The only reason for requiring the defence to be made by a plea or answer is that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to take the case out of the operation of the statute if he can. Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 664.

d. AMENDMENT.—In White v. Turner, 2 Gratt. 502, a defendant in equity was allowed to amend his answer for the purpose of setting up the statute of limitations in bar of the plaintiff's claim.

In an action of detinue, the replication to the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations being insufficient, a demurrer was sustained, and the action was dismissed. The declaration contained the averments for the lack of which the replication was defective. It was erroneous to dismiss the action, as the plaintiff should have been given leave to amend the replication. Morris v. Lyon, 1 Va. Dec. 615.

After issue has been joined and the cause set for hearing, the defendant in chancery may be permitted for good cause shown to amend his answer and plead the statute of limitations. Jackson v. Cutright, 5 Munf. 308.

e. EXCEPTION TO COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.—The bar of the statute may be set up in equity by excepting to the report of the commissioner. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 221; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 666; Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 384; Jincey v. Winfield, 9 Gratt. 721; Leith v. Carter, 83 Va. 889, 5 S. E. Rep. 584; Ayre v. Burke, 82 Va. 838, 4 S. E. Rep. 618; Blair v. Carter, 78 Va. 621.

If a creditor fail to contest a claim, which on the face of the commissioner's report appears to be barred, he may except, and it is the duty of the court to sustain the exception, unless it appear that the bar of the statute had been removed, or he may for good cause recommit the report. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

f. BEFORE COMMISSIONER.—The statute of limitations may be relied on before a commissioner, even where it has not been pleaded before the court prior to the order of reference. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

In a suit by a creditor against an expired corporation, where the corporation in its answer pleads a set-off against the plaintiff's demand, the plaintiff may file a plea of the statute of limitations before the commissioner, or in any other manner make that defence before the commissioner taking an account in the case. Stiles v. Laurel, etc., Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 35 S. E. Rep. 986.

g. ON TRIAL.

Set-Off—Notice—Opportunity for Replication.—If a defendant in an action of debt does not plead a set-off, but gives notice of it, and files an account of set-off, the plaintiff has no opportunity to reply to the statute of limitations, and may avail himself of the statute upon the trial. Sexton v. Aultman, 92 Va. 20, 22 S. E. Rep. 838; Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 664; 4 Min. Inst. (1st Ed.) 660.

h. REPLICATION.—In Virginia a defendant may make the defence of set-off, other than the equitable set-off under the Code, sec. 3299, either by a formal plea or by a notice of the set-off, accompanied by an account of set-offs. If the defence be by plea, the plaintiffs must reply the statute specially. Sexton v. Aultman, 92 Va. 20, 22 S. E. Rep. 838; Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460.

4. WHEN PLEADED IN GENERAL.

After New Trial Granted.—The statute of limitations may be pleaded after a new trial has been granted, the jury having found against the presumption of payment, which prevented its being pleaded on the former trial. Tomlin v. How, Gilmer 1.

After Joinder of Issue on Another Plea.—A plea of the act of limitation ought not to be received after issue has been joined on another plea, unless some good reason be assigned why the plea of the act was not sooner tendered. Martin v. Anderson, 6 Rand. 19.

No Right Accrued.—It is provided by secs. 8 and 9 of ch. 146, of the Va. Code of 1873, that the statute of limitations shall not begin to run in favor of the sureties of an administrator until the return day of an execution against him, or from the time the right arises under an order of court acting on his accounts to require payment. Hence the plea of the statute was untenable where there was no order of the court directing payment, until the entry of the decree against which the statute is pleaded. Robertson v. Gillenwaters, 85 Va. 116, 7 S. E. Rep. 371.

Barred by Mistake.—In assumpsit, defendant pleaded the general issue at the September term 1818, his death was suggested in October, 1823, and the cause was revived against his administrator at the March term, 1824. The administrator obtained leave, at the October term, 1825, to plead the statute of limitations, but by mistake, as it appeared, the plea was not then filed. At the March term, 1826, the cause was called for trial, and the administrator asked leave to put in his plea. Held, that it could not then be received. Clopton v. Clarke, 7 Leigh 385.

Office Judgment Set Aside.—A defendant cannot plead the act of limitations upon setting aside an office judgment, after the next succeeding term, without good cause shown. Backhouse v. Jones, 5 Call 462.

5. REPLICATION.

Sufficiency—Action of Detinue.—In an action of detinue a replication to a plea of the statute of limitations is bad, which admits an averment in the plea that the cause of action accrued more than the statutory five years before the action was brought, but alleges a subsequent acknowledgment by the defendant of title to the property in question in the plaintiff, made within five years of bringing suit. This replication was deficient in not averring a promise to deliver the possession. Morris v. Lyon, 1 Va. Dec. 615. See Morris v. Lyon, 84 Va. 331, 4 S. E. Rep. 784.

Same—Action for Deceit.—In an action on the case for a deceit, if the defendant pleaded that the cause of action did not accrue within five years next before suing out the writ, a replication that the fraud came to the plaintiff's knowledge within that time is not good, and issue joined upon it should be set aside by the court as immaterial. Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511.

Same—Promise of Defendant to Pay.—A plea of the act of limitations in bar of a scire facias to revive a judgment cannot be repelled by a replication that the defendant within five years next before the suing out of the scire facias promised to pay the amount of the judgment. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

Insufficient Replication.—To an answer setting up the statute of limitations, the plaintiff files his replication, alleging that he did bring and prosecute his suit in his behalf, within five years from the time of the defendant's liability to be sued, and notice to the plaintiff of the matter complained of in the bill. This replication will not avoid the statute of limitations. Vanbibber v. Beirne, 6 W. Va. 168.

Suit against Corporation—Affidavit Required by W. Va. Code 1868.—Acting under legislative authority the county of Greenbrier, W. Va., made a parol contract in 1862 for the purchase of salt. Suit was not brought thereon until 1875, hence it was barred by limitation. To the plea of the statute the plaintiff could not reply that he could not truly make the affidavit required by the Code of W. Va. 1868, ch. 106, sec. 27, as no plaintiff can do so when he sues a corporation. Stuart v. County of Greerbrier, 16 W. Va. 95.

Allegation of Obstruction to Action.—A replication to a plea of the statute of limitations under sec. 18, ch. 104, of the W. Va. Code, need not allege that the defendant removed from the state with intent to obstruct the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action, as the removal itself is such an obstruction. Abell v. Penn., etc., Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400 (1881).

Allegations of Suspension by War.—To an action brought upon a bond or promissory note after the Code of West Virginia went into operation on the 1st day April, 1869, sec. 5, ch. 104, applies; and consequently a special replication to the plea of the statute of limitations, that said statute was suspended in any county during the whole of the late war between the so-called Confederate States and the United States, presents an immaterial issue and should be rejected. Huffman v. Callison, 6 W. Va. 301.

Same—Certainty Required.—A special replication to the plea of the statute of limitations, which does not allege the exact period of the war, or exactly how long the courts were closed, when these facts are relied upon as an avoidance, is bad, for that period only could be excepted from the computation of time which might otherwise prove a bar; for it should appear upon the face of the pleading that, after taking out the excepted time, five years have not elapsed since the action accrued. The replication by not stating the period, but leaving it wholly in blank, does not present a certain issue. Huffman v. Callison, 6 W. Va. 301.

Fraud Answer to Plea.—It seems that if fraud was not discovered until some time after it was practiced, and within the time of limitation, this would suffice to take the case out of the statute. To enable the plaintiff to avail himself of such matter he must plead it specially in his replication. Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474.

Exceptions in Act.—If the defendant in equity plead the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff comes within any of the exceptions in the act, he will not be entitled to the benefit thereof, unless he sets it forth by a replication. Lewis v. Bacon, 8 H. & M. 89.

Where the claim upon which a suit was predicated was barred by the statute of limitations, if the plaintiff relied upon any exception to take the claim out of the operation of the statute, it should have been set forth in a replication to the plea of the statute by the defendant. Laidley v. Smith, 32 W. Va. 387, 9 S. E. Rep. 209.

Want of Replication Not Cured by Verdict.—A plea of the statute of limitations concludes with a verification, and should be replied to before trial, and a want of replication is not cured by verdict. Balt., etc., R. Co. v. Faulkner, 4 W. Va. 180.

Allegations Must Be Supported by Evidence.—In order for a replication to the plea of the statute of limitations to take the case out of its operation, its essential allegations must be established by the evidence. Ragland v. Owen, 84 Va. 227, 5 S. E. Rep. 91.

Former Suit.—In assumpsit the defendant pleaded the act of limitations, and if the defendant would avoid the plea by a former suit having been brought in time he must reply to the former suit specially; he cannot give it in evidence under general replication to the plea. Bogle v. Conway, 3 Call 1.

Insufficient Replication and Plea.—If a replication be insufficient and demurred to as such, yet if the plea be also insufficient, the court will go up to the first fault and give judgment for the plaintiff. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104. See Baird v. Mattox, 1 Call 261; Kirtley v. Deck, 3 H. & M. 388; Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511.

Action against Administrator for Slaves.—In an action of assumpsit against an administrator, he pleaded the statute of limitations. It is no answer to the plea that the defendant's intestate sold to the plaintiff slaves in payment of the debt declared on, and that the defendant since the death of his intestate had, as administrator, sued for and recovered upon the title alone, without regard to the intestate's indebtedness to the plaintiff, the slaves from the plaintiff within five years before the action was brought. Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1.

Joinder of Counts.—In an action of assumpsit against an administrator de bonis non, counts upon promises made by an executor or former administrator of the deceased debtor may be joined with counts on promises by the deceased debtor himself in order to save the statute of limitations. Bishop v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 532.

Action of Debt—Subsequent Acknowledgment.—If, in any case of an action of debt on simple contract, the plaintiff would rely on a subsequent acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute of limitations, it seems he must count on such subsequent acknowledgment in his declaration. The rule is otherwise in an action of assumpsit. Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519. See monographic note on "Debt, The Action of" appended to Davis v. Mead, 13 Gratt. 118.

7. INSTRUCTION.

Burden of Proof.—An instruction to the jury that the burden of proving the cause of action to be barred by the statute of limitations is upon the defendant, and further charging as to the time when the said statute begins to run, is insufficient and misleading, if not erroneous, where it does not go further and state that the cause of action would be barred and the plaintiff entitled to recover, if the suit was not instituted in the time limited by law. Hansbrough v. Neal, 94 Va. 722, 27 S. E. Rep. 593.

When Plaintiff Entitled to Defence without Pleading.—Where a plaintiff has a right to the defence of limitation without pleading it, an instruction that the same if believed would be a defence, is not erroneous as operating as a surprise to the defendant. Sexton v. Aultman, 92 Va. 20, 22 S. E. Rep. 838.

Action for Seduction.—If the defendant in an action for the seduction of a female would rely on the statute of limitations, he must plead it at or before trial, and he cannot rely on it, and raise the question upon instructions to the jury. Riddle v. McGinnis, 22 W. Va. 253.

Correct Instruction Refused.—Where the statute of limitations has been pleaded, the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that more than five years elapsed from the day the note sued on fell due and became payable, until the institution of this suit, then it is barred by the statute of limitations." Huffman v. Callison, 6 W. Va. 301.

8. EXECUTION.

Two Years after Judgment.—An execution issued upon a judgment after two years from its rendition without an order of court allowing its issuance, is properly quashed. State v. Brookover, 33 W. Va. 141, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

9. VERDICT.

Sufficiency.—In Hansbrough v. Neal, 94 Va. 722, 27 S. E. Rep. 593, the court said: "The jury found in favor of the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages for the full amount claimed by them. To do this it was of course necessary for the jury to find that the defendant has assumed to pay as alleged in the declaration, and that he had done so within the statutory period. The verdict was a full response to both issues and in the usual form."

Same—Detinue.—Issues being joined in an action of detinue on the general issue and the act of limitations, a verdict that the defendant doth detain the slaves, in manner and form, etc., is sufficiently responsive to both issues. Boatright v. Meggs, 4 Munf. 115.

Curative Effect.—When the plea of the statute is defective, but is not demurred to, it is cured after verdict by sec. 3, ch. 177, Code 1873. Davis v. McMullen, 86 Va. 256, 9 S. E. Rep. 1095.

A plea of the statute of limitations concludes with a verification and should be replied to before trial, and the want of replication is not cured by verdict. Balt., etc., R. Co. v. Faulkner, 4 W. Va. 180.

10. BILL OF REVIEW AND DISCOVERY.

Necessity of Pleading Act.—It is not necessary to plead the act of limitations against a bill of review, for it ought to appear in the bill itself that it is exhibited within the time prescribed by law, or that the complainant is protected by some of the savings in the act, otherwise it ought not to be received. Shepherd v. Larue, 6 Munf. 529.

When Received.—A bill to review a decree pronounced before the 11th of February, 1814, could not be received after five years had elapsed from the date of such decree. Shepherd v. Larue, 6 Munf. 529.

Discovery When Defendant Made New Promise.—Where an action of assumpsit is brought at law, and the statute of limitations is pleaded, the plaintiff may file a bill of discovery in equity calling on the defendant to answer whether he has not made a new promise within the time of limitation, in order to use this matter on the trial of the action at law, in avoidance of the bar of the statute, and the defendant shall answer the allegation of the new promise on oath. Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284.

XII EVIDENCE.

1. ADMISSIBILITY, SUFFICIENCY AND WEIGHT.

Length of Possession against Commonwealth.—Evidence as to length of possession against the commonwealth is improper, as time does not run against it. Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. Rep. 802.

Agreement Not to Sue.—A mutual understanding and agreement between the debtor and creditor, that suit shall not be brought on an account until the debtor shall have gone to Europe and returned, may be given in evidence to prevent the court's expunging from such account items appearing to have been due five years before his death. Holladay v. Littlepage, 2 Munf. 316.

Deed Fixing Date of Transaction.—Upon an issue joined on the plea of the statute of limitations, the court did not err to the prejudice of the plaintiff by admitting in evidence a deed, which tended to fix the date of the transaction, out of which the action arose. Kyger v. Roberts, 27 W. Va. 418.

Assumption by Partner of Partnership Debt.—If one of several partners, after the partnership is dissolved, assumes a partnership debt, but afterwards pleads the act of limitations, jointly with the other partners, the assumpsit may be given in evidence, for the plea of nonassumpsit admits that the defendants did once assume. Brockenbrough v. Hackley, 6 Call 51.

Statutory Notice Must Be Given.—Under Va. Code, sec. 2922, providing that a new promise may be shown in evidence by a plaintiff without pleading it to repel a bar of the statute of limitations, pleaded by the defendant, on reasonable notice to the defendant before trial, it is not error to reject such evidence where no notice has been given. Noell v. Noell, 93 Va. 433, 25 S. E. Rep. 242.

Immaterial Evidence.—The right of action to recover back money paid on a war-trespass judgment, accrues as soon as the constitution was adopted, which declares such judgment void. And an order thereafter made setting aside a judgment under the provisions of sec. 3, ch. 58, Act of 1872-3, upon the only issue in the case, which was on the plea of the statute of limitations, would be immaterial evidence, and the court would not err in refusing to admit it in evidence. Kyger v. Roberts, 27 W. Va. 418.

Parol Gift of Slaves.—Although under the act of 1758, evidence of a parol gift of slaves cannot be given, yet such testimony may be received in order to prove five years' possession, so as to bar the plaintiff's demand. Jordan v. Murray, 3 Call 85.

Assumpsit of Executor.—On the trial of an issue on the assumpsit of the testator within five years, an assumpsit of his executor cannot be given in evidence to prevent the operation of the act of limitations. Fisher v. Duncan, 1 Hen. & M. 563.

Insolvency of Debtor Making New Promise.—Although a debtor is insolvent when he makes a new promise, while such fact is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether there is collusion between the debtor and creditor, it is not proof of the same. Robinson v. Bass (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 660.

Replication That Trade Was between Merchants Unsupported.—A replication was filed to the plea of the statute of limitations that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant; no evidence was adduced to prove that either party was a merchant during the time of their dealings, nor any evidence of the character of the dealings between them. The replication was not supported by the evidence and the demand was therefore barred by the statute. Watson v. Lyle, 4 Leigh 236.

2. PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Presumption of Payment.—The presumption of payment of a debt does not, as a matter of law, arise within the statutory period of limitations, though the lapse of time may be relied on in connection with other circumstances as evidence of payment. Parsons v. McCracken, 9 Leigh 495.

Presumption as to Demand.—If a demand be necessary before suit, the period of limitation does not commence to run until demand; but demand must be made within a reasonable time, which is the term fixed by the statute of limitations; and where no demand is shown, it is presumed to have been made within that period. Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795.

Where Executor Fails to Pay Himself in Statutory Period.—Where an executor, having power to retain and appropriate so much of his testator's estate as is equal to a demand due to himself, neglects so to do within the period of time limited by law, he will be presumed to have abandoned the same or to have received satisfaction therefor; and when it appears that such executor kept no accounts, and a bill brought by his representatives long after his death, praying the payment of a balance which was due to him from his testator, the statute of limitations may be pleaded in bar. Pendleton v. Whiting, Wythe 38.

Burden on Party Pleading Statute.—The burden of proving that his case comes within the statute of limitations lies upon the one pleading it. Lewis v. Mason, 84 Va. 731, 10 S. E. Rep. 529. So where suit is brought in August, 1889, for lumber delivered in 1884, and does not allege in what month it was delivered and the defendant fails to show it was delivered prior to August, a verdict for the plaintiff is proper. Goodell v. Gibbons, 91 Va. 608, 23 S. E. Rep. 504.

The burden of removing the bar of the statute of limitations by a new promise rests upon the defendant, and an acknowledgment or admission to have that effect, must not only be unqualified in itself, but there must be nothing in the attendant acts or declaration, to modify or rebut the inference of willingness to pay. If the acknowledgment be coupled with terms or conditions of any kind, a recovery cannot be had, unless they are fulfilled. Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 28.

The burden of showing that a conveyance attacked as voluntary was made more than five years before the institution of the suit, is upon the party who pleads the statute. Vashon v. Barrett, 99 Va. 844, 38 S. E. Rep. 200. See Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 28.

But the defendant in detinue may protect himself under the general issue without pleading the act of limitations, by proving that he and those under whom he claimed had possession of the property in controversy more than five years before the issuing of the writ. Elam v. Bass, 4 Munf. 301.

In an action by the administratrix of a sheriff, against a deputy and his sureties, for default of the deputy in not paying over money collected by him on an execution, where the defence is that the claim of the creditor against the administratrix is barred by the statute of limitations, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show such fact. Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323.

XIII. APPEALS.

1. FROM INTERLOCUTORY DECREES.—The statutory bar of one year to appeals from decrees applies only to final decrees, and not to interlocutory decrees. Barker v. Jenkins, 84 Va. 805, 6 S. E. Rep. 459. See Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76. See generally, on this subject, monographic notes on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Ferry Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263, and "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

The statute of limitations is not applicable to an interlocutory decree and an appeal will lie therefrom in a proper case, regardless of the length of time that has elapsed since it was made. Jameson v. Jameson, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. Rep. 480.

Although by sec. 3454, of the Va. Code 1887, the right of appeal is given from certain interlocutory decrees, still a party entitled to such appeal is not bound to appeal from them when they are rendered, but may do so at any time within a year after a final decree has been rendered in the cause, provided all the other requisites for an appeal exist. Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 36 S. E. Rep. 395. See Jameson v. Jameson, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. Rep. 480; Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. Rep. 785.

2. RAISING QUESTION ON APPEAL.—Limitation is no defence, unless pleaded or otherwise relied on in the lower court. Seborn v. Beckwith, 30 W. Va. 774, 5 S. E. Rep. 450.

In a creditors' suit, if the statute of limitation has not been specially pleaded, nor relied on before the commissioner, and he failed to recognize the statute, and therefore endorsed no exception on the report, the appellate court will consider the statute of limitations out of the case, although the report upon its face shows that some of the claims allowed by the commissioner were barred by the statute. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211. See Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213.

Where, in an action to enjoin a sale under a trust deed on the ground that it has been merged in a judgment on the bond secured by it, the bill not only fails to plead the statute of limitations as to the judgment, but prays that the parties entitled to it be required to enforce it in the usual way, the statute is not available on appeal. Gibson v. Green, 89 Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 661, 37 Am. St. Rep. 888.

3. MOTION TO DISMISS.—A motion to dismiss an appeal, granted on insufficient petition, made more than three years after the appeal was granted, and after the right to appeal has become barred, on the ground of such insufficiency, should not be sustained. Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 268, 24 S. E. Rep. 928.

4. APPEAL BOND.

Must Be Given in Proper Time.—Section 17, ch. 178, of the Code of 1873, provides that an appeal from a final decree shall be dismissed whenever two years elapse since its date, before bond is given. Where a final decree is entered June 2, 1877, and an appeal is allowed therefrom May 8, 1879, but the bond is not given until June 9, 1879, under this section the appeal must be dismissed. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292. See monographic notes on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107, and "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Ferry Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

5. PRESENTATION OF PETITION.

a. IN VIRGINIA.

Five Years.—The act limiting appeals to the court of appeals, refers to the time of presenting the petition for an appeal to the court or a judge in vacation; and if the petition be presented within five years from the date of the judgment or decree, the appeal is not barred by the statute. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

Same—Applies to Commonwealth.—The act of April 16, 1831, which limits the right of appeals to the courts of appeal to five years, applies to the commonwealth. Com. v. Moore, 1 Gratt. 294.

Prior to Act November 5, 1870.—The longest period of limitation within which a petition for an appeal, writ of error and supersedeas can be presented is two years nine months and ten days, as to final judgments, decrees and orders rendered before the passage of the act of November 5, 1870, and as to those since rendered, such period of limitation is two years. Callaway v. Harding, 23 Gratt. 542.

Two Years—Act March 15, 1867.—The act of March 15, 1867, which amended sec. 3, of ch. 182, of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of time for presenting a petition for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend sec. 26, of that chapter which allows five years for perfecting an appeal. Therefore an appeal might be perfected at any time within five years from the date of the decree. But see sec. 17, ch. 178, of the Code of 1873; Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Bills of Review—Six Months—Acts 1884.—Under secs. 3 and 17, ch. 18, of the Sess. Acts of 1884, requiring a petition for an appeal from a decree refusing a bill of review to a final decree, rendered more than twelve months before, to be presented within six months from such refusal, it is immaterial whether the statute intended the refusal to be of the prayer of the bill or merely of permission to file it, and in either case, after the expiration of the prescribed time the appeal cannot be granted. Jordan v. Cunningham, 85 Va. 418, 7 S. E. Rep. 540.

If a final decree, from which an appeal is asked, is a decree refusing a bill of review to a decree rendered more than six months before, no appeal from or supersedeas to such decree shall be allowed unless the petition be presented within six months from the date of such final decree, Va. Code 1887, sec. 3455; Mason v. Mason, 97 Va. 108, 33 S. E. Rep. 1015. The limitation begins to run from the actual date of the decree appealed from, and not from the beginning or end of the term at which it was rendered. Buford v. North Roanoke Land Co., 94 Va. 616, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

Delivery of Record to Clerk.—It is provided by sec. 3474 of the Code that the record, with petition for a writ of error, is to be delivered to the clerk of the court of appeals and bond given, within one year from the entry of the judgment or decree appealed from, exclusive of the period between the presenting of the petition and the delivery of the papers to the clerk, or the writ of error is to be dismissed. This section contemplates merely an actual delivery to the clerk, and where the petition and papers are received on the last day of the period allowed, and the bond is not filed until the next day, the writ should be dismissed, although the clerk did not know that he did not have the petition and record, until the time when the bond was filed. The statute of limitations in such cases is imperative, and the appellate court cannot relieve the plaintiff or appellant from the effect of misfortune, accident or mistake. Bull v. Evans, 96 Va. 1, 30 S. E. Rep. 468. See Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292; Otterback v. R. Co., 26 Gratt. 940; Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374.

b. IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Two Years.—Under ch. 157, Acts 1882, the court of appeals of West Virginia has no authority to award an appeal from any appealable decree, or to review errors in it or any decree or order preceding it in the cause, unless the appeal from such appealable decree is taken before the expiration of two years from its date. Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778.

If, after the expiration of two years from the date of an appealable decree, an appeal is properly obtained from a subsequent decree for errors not arising out of the first decree or any order or decree preceding it, the court of appeals can only consider and review the errors complained of in such subsequent decree, or the orders and decrees entered in the cause subsequent to said appealable decree. Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778.

Five Years.—Under provisions of sec. 3, ch. 44, W. Va. Acts 1877, and sec. 3, ch. 157, W. Va. Acts 1882, no petition can be entertained by the court of appeals for an appeal from a decree of any character, which was rendered more than five years before the petition was presented for the appeal. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534.

A party cannot be granted an appeal upon a petition assigning errors in appealable decrees rendered more than five years before the petition is presented, although the errors thus assigned may be the foundation of, and be given effect in, a subsequent decree rendered within five years, from which an appeal is also prayed. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534.

XIV. THE STATUTE IN PARTICULAR INSTANCES.

In this section the application of the statute in particular instances has been set out. The collection of cases is by no means exhaustive, and reference is made to the monographic note on each specific subject of the series, where all the cases will be found relating to the limitation of actions in that particular branch of the law.

1. ACCOUNTS.

Retail Store Accounts.—Sec. 5, ch. 149, Code 1849, limiting actions on store accounts to two years, does not embrace wholesale dealings of importing and wholesale merchants, but applies exclusively to the store accounts of retail dealers with their customers. Wortham v. Smith, 15 Gratt. 487.

Same—Auctioning Imported Goods.—The act of October 1779, "for discouraging extensive credit, and repealing the law prescribing the method of proving book debts," providing that all actions founded on accounts for goods sold and delivered, or for any articles charged in any store account, shall be commenced within six months after the cause of action accrues, applies only to store accounts of retail merchants, and not to an action for wares and merchandise imported for sale by one who kept no retail store, but who sold the same at public auction and delivered them twelve months before the suit was brought. Tomlin v. Kelly, 1 Wash. 190.

Same—Accounts Stated.—Retail store accounts, though barred by limitations in two years, when presented to the debtor, and agreed by him to be correct, become accounts stated, and are governed by a different statute. Radford v. Fowkes, 85 Va. 820, 8 S. E. Rep. 817.

Suit to Surcharge and Falsify Accounts.—There is no statute of limitations, fixing time within which suits may be brought to surcharge and falsify settlements of accounts of committees of lunatics. Trowbridge v. Stone, 42 W. Va. 454, 26 S. E. Rep. 353.

Recovery of Money from Attorney.—The act of limitations is a good plea to a suit in equity, brought to recover money collected by an attorney for the plaintiff, and not accounted for by him. Kinney v. McClure, 1 Rand. 284.

Accounts between Merchants and Factors.—The accounts between merchant and merchant or merchant and factor, which are excepted from the operation of the statute, must be a direct concern of trade. Liquidated demands or bills and notes, which are only traced up to the trade of merchants, are too remote to come within the description and they are not excepted from the bar. Roots v. Salt Co., 27 W. Va. 483.

Merchant and Merchant.—The saving in sec. 4 of the act of limitations, 1 Rev. Code 488, applies also to sec. 7 of the same act, by which an action between merchant and merchant is neither barred by one year, nor by five years. Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 488.

Administration Accounts.—In 1755 a creditor was made an executor and guardian of the children of his debtor, but attended very little to the duties of executor. The devisees obtained possession of the estate of the testator, and the executor endeavored to have a settlement of the administration. In 1766 he died. In 1784 all parties expressing a desire for a settlement of accounts, an order was entered for that purpose, but the defendants refusing to proceed, the administrators of the executor filed a bill for that purpose. The defendants plead the statute of limitations which was held to be a bar. Pendleton v. Whiting, Wythe 38.

The act of 1792, which directs a court in an action upon open accounts against administrators or executors to strike out all items appearing to have been due five years before the death of the testator or intestate, was construed in Brooke v. Shelly, 4 H.

& M. 286, to relate only to open accounts and not to settlements of assumptions. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

2. BANKRUPTCY.

Accrual of Action to Assignee.—The federal statute of limitations requires that the assignee in bankruptcy shall bring his suit against persons claiming an adverse interest within two years from the time the cause of action accrued. Under this statute it is held that the assignee's cause of action accrued from the maturity of his cause of action, and not from the date of the assignment. Smith v. Proffitt, 82 Va. 832, 1 S. E. Rep. 67. See monographic note on "Bankruptcy and Insolvency" appended to Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 343.

Application.—The federal statute limiting actions by or against assignees in bankruptcy, as to property vested in them to two years, does not apply to suits against purchasers from such assignees. Moorman v. Arthur, 90 Va. 455, 18 S. E. Rep. 869.

3. BONDS.

Previous to July 1, 1850.—There was no positive limitation of time as to the right of action upon bonds before the passage of a statute which took effect July 1, 1850, and as to bonds payable before that time the statute of limitations began to run that day. Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 690, 8 S. E. Rep. 577; Bell v. Wood, 94 Va. 677, 27 S. E. Rep. 504. See monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

Fiduciary Bond—Act 1826.—The act of limitations of March 8, 1826, does not apply to suits against fiduciaries for the balance of estates in their hands, but to suits on their official bonds against them and their sureties. Winston v. Street, 2 P. & H. 169.

Same—Accrual of Cause of Action.—By sec. 9, ch. 146, Code 1873, an action on a fiduciary's bond is only barred after ten years from the time the cause of action accrued. This is from the return day of the execution against the fiduciary, or from the time of right to require payment or delivery from the fiduciary. Sharpe v. Rockwood, 78 Va. 24; Morrison v. Lavell, 81 Va. 519; Robertson v. Gillenwaters, 85 Va. 116, 7 S. E. Rep. 371. See McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 594.

Same—Same—Guardian.—The right of action of a ward on an official bond of his guardian, within the meaning of the act, Sup. Rev. Code 1819, ch. 200, sec. 1, accrues to the ward immediately on his arrival at age, and if brought therefore more than ten years afterwards, it will be barred by that statute. See Code 1849, ch. 149, sec. 5, 6, 17; Magruder v. Goodwyn, 2 P. & H. 561.

Same—Same—Executor or Administrator.—It is provided by sec. 9, ch. 146, Code 1873, that limitation of an action upon the bond of an executor or administrator is ten years after the accrual of a right of action. There is no other limitation applicable to the sureties upon the official bonds. Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 792. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Where an administrator settles his administration accounts, by giving his bond to the widow for the balance due her, from the moment of its execution and delivery, a right of action accrues thereon, and where more than ten years elapses before she brings suit thereon, his sureties are discharged by the statute of limitations. Sec. 8, 9, ch. 149, Code 1873; Tilson v. Davis, 32 Gratt. 92.

Bonds of Married Women.—Bonds given by a married woman with the intention of binding her separate estate, are valid in equity as evidences of debt against such estate, and therefore are not barred by the statute of limitations as simple contract debts. Garland v. Pamplin, 32 Gratt. 305.

Forthcoming Bond.—The statute of limitations 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, sec. 5, whereby the remedy on a judgment by debt or scire facias is limited to ten years, is no bar to a motion on a forthcoming bond of more than ten years' standing. Lipscomb v. Davis, 4 Leigh 303.

Bond of Cashier—Misappropriation of Funds.—In an action on the bond of a bank cashier, where it appears that the cashier had misapplied an amount equal to the penalty of the bond within ten years next preceding the commencement of the action, it is immaterial whether the limitation in such cases be ten years or more. Elam v. Commercial Bank, 86 Va. 92, 9 S. E. Rep. 498.

4. CONVERSION.—Where a party delayed ten years after his right of action accrued before he began his action of trover, it was barred by the statute of limitations. Phillips v. Martiney, 10 Gratt. 333. See monographic note on "Trover and Conversion" appended to Eastern Lunatic Asylum v. Garrett, 27 Gratt. 163.

The period under the statute of limitations for an action for the unlawful conversion of personal property, or for its proceeds if sold, is five years. Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795.

The act of limitations may be pleaded in bar to an action against a carrier for fraudulently embezzling goods entrusted to his care. Cook v. Darby, 4 Munf. 444.

5. DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

Virginia Rule.—It was held in Anderson v. Hygeia Hotel Co., 92 Va. 687, 24 S. E. Rep. 269, that where personal injuries result from the wrongful act, neglect or default of a person or corporation, an action to recover damages therefor must be brought within one year from the time the injury occurred under sec. 2927 of the Code, notwithstanding secs. 2902, 2903 and 2906. See monographic note on "Death by Wrongful Act" appended to De Ende v. Wilkinson, 2 Pat. & H. 663.

Limitation Determined by Object of Action.—The limitation of an action is not determined by its form but by its object, hence if the substance of a wrong is an injury to the person, the limitation in an action of trespass on the case in assumpsit is the same as if the action were in form ex delicto. Birmingham v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 98 Va. 548, 37 S. E. Rep. 17.

Extension.—The act, January 29, 1894, providing that the right of action for death by wrongful act shall not be determined by the death of the person injured, does not extend the time for commencing actions caused by negligence from a year, as under the statute, to five years. Birmingham v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 98 Va. 548, 37 S. E. Rep. 17. See sec. 2927 of the Code.

Incidental Damages.—A claim for indirect and incidental damages arising from an injury purely personal in its nature, does not cause the action brought to recover for such injuries, to survive, and hence the limitation is one year. Birmingham v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 98 Va. 548, 37 S. E. Rep. 17.

West Virginia Cases.—Secs. 5, 6, ch. 103, W. Va. Code 1891, is the West Virginia Lord Campbell's Act, creating a cause of action where none existed at common law for wrongfully causing the death of a person, and the provision that any such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such deceased person is an essentially restraining element of the right of action given. Lambert v. Ensign Mfg. Co., 42 W. Va. 818, 26 S. E. Rep. 481.

One year is the bar prescribed by the statute of limitations for the recovery of damages for an injury to the person in all cases, except the right of action given by secs. 5, 6, ch. 103, of the Code, to the personal representative of a decedent against any party, wrongfully causing his death. Curry v. Town of Mannington, 23 W. Va. 14.

It is declared by sec. 13, ch. 104, of the W. Va. Code 1881, that the limitation of all personal actions, if they be for matters of a nature that in case of the death of a party, they could not be brought by or against his representative, shall be one year from the time the right to bring the same shall have accrued. Curry v. Town of Mannington, 23 W. Va. 14.

6. DECREES.—Where no execution has been issued on a decree within a year after it was rendered, and no proceeding has been had to revive it within ten years thereafter, it is barred by secs. 12, 13, ch. 182, Code 1873. Series v. Cromer, 88 Va. 426, 13 S. E. Rep. 859. See monographic note on "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

Interlocutory.—There is no statute limiting a petition for rehearing an interlocutory decree which is not appealable. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Decree against Absent Defendant.—The limitation of seven years has no application to so much of a decree against an absent defendant, as it acts in personam, and establishes a personal demand. Rootes v. Tompkins, 3 Gratt. 98.

7. JUDGMENTS.

Ten-Year Limitation.—A judgment is barred by the statute of limitations in ten years, if no execution is issued on it, and no scire facias is sued out to revive it, in that time. Dabney v. Shelton, 82 Va. 349, 4 S. E. Rep. 605; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; White v. Offield, 90 Va. 386, 18 S. E. Rep. 436. See further, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

When Execution Issues and Return Made—Virginia Rule.—The right to issue a scire facias upon a judgment is not barred by the act of limitations in a case where execution was issued in due time, and return was made thereon, until the lapse of twenty years. Gee v. Hamilton, 6 Munf. 32; Brown v. Campbell, 33 Gratt. 402.

Under sec. 12, ch. 186, Code 1860, the limitation within which an alias execution may be issued is twenty years, where there is return of an officer, but whether such return is valid or sufficient is not a question which can arise under the section. Hamilton v. McConkey, 83 Va. 533, 5 S. E. Rep. 724.

Judgment was recovered against a debtor Sept. 1810, an execution was sued out in the same month, and another in Oct. 1815, but neither was returned. To a scire facias to revive the judgment against the executor of the debtor, sued out in July 1826, the defendant plead the statute of limitations. The plaintiffs reply the two executions, but on demurrer the statute was held a bar to the action. Fleming v. Dunlop, 4 Leigh 338.

Where a judgment in a justice's court was obtained February 23, 1866, and was duly docketed, but upon which no execution was issued and where a judgment of the circuit court of November 2, 1866, was also duly docketed, and on which no execution was issued, and suit was not brought to enforce a lien of these judgments until April 30, 1887, it was held that the right to recover was barred by limitations in accordance with secs. 3673, 3677, 3678, Va. Code 1887. Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 621, 13 S. E. Rep. 71.

Same—In West Virginia.—In no event can a judgment be revived, under the West Virginia statute, sec. 11, ch. 139, Code, after ten years have elapsed from the return day of the last execution issued thereon, and, if more than five years of that period elapse during the life of the execution debtor, then the creditor has only the remainder of the ten years within which to revive the judgment against the personal representative of such debtor. Handy v. Smith, 30 W. Va. 196, 3 S. E. Rep. 604. See Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565.

Where an execution has been issued upon a judgment more than ten years after the return day of the last preceding execution issued thereon, and a suit is brought by the creditor to enforce the lien of such judgment against the real estate of his debtor, the issuance of such execution will not avoid the bar of the right to enforce such lien, notwithstanding the said execution is merely voidable, and not liable to be assailed in a collateral suit. Reilly v. Clark, 31 W. Va. 571, 8 S. E. Rep. 509.

The lien of a judgment, on which no execution has ever issued, will not be enforced in a court of equity in a suit brought after the lapse of ten years from the date of the judgment, and where the debtor dies, the time in which it can be enforced may be less, as in no case can it exceed five years after the qualification of his personal representative, unless perhaps it may be kept alive by suing out successive executions after the death of the debtor, or by having sued out a scire facias continued his right to do so. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 30 W. Va. 588.

A judgment is rendered against an executor to be paid de bonis testatoris on November 30, 1870. An execution issued on this judgment on December 16, 1870, returnable to March rules 1871, and was returned then "no property found." Another execution issued September 13, 1880, returnable to December rules 1880, and ordered "to lie." At July rules 1881, a bill was filed to compel the executor to settle his accounts, claiming that there were sufficient assets in his hands with which to pay this judgment, and which he ought to have applied to its payment, and asking a personal decree against him for the amount of such judgment. This suit was not barred by the statute of limitations, and could have been brought without being so barred, at any time within ten years after December rules 1880, the return day of the last execution on the judgment. Hurst v. Morgan, 31 W. Va. 531, 8 S. E. Rep. 285.

Same—Same—Exception—Parol Evidence.—To avoid the bar of the statute of limitations in respect to the right to enforce the lien of a judgment, the creditor must bring his case within one of the exceptions declared in the statute, and he cannot by parol evidence or otherwise avoid such bar upon any ground not embraced in the statute, as by parol agreement binding him not to sue out execution or enforce the judgment until within ten years before the bringing of such suit. Reilly v. Clark, 31 W. Va. 571, 8 S. E. Rep. 509.

his personal representative after his death, within five years from the time of his qualification, is barred by the statute of limitations. Peyton v. Carr, 1 Rand. 436.

Section 17 of the statute of limitations, providing that debt or scire facias on judgment against decedents in their lifetime, shall not be brought against their representative after the expiration of five years from the qualification of the representative, and that such judgment shall after the expiration of five years be deemed to be paid and discharged, is a bar to debt or scire facias on such judgments against an administrator of a deceased debtor, although no assets of the debtor's estate came into the hands of the representative within five years after his qualification, and the administrator is bound to plead the statute to actions of judgment creditors prosecuting the claim to which the act of limitations does not apply. Tunstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh 1.

Sections 10 and 11, ch. 139, of the Code, are applicable to judgments rendered by a justice, so far as to provide that upon such a judgment, on which no execution within two years from the date of its rendition has issued, an action may be brought at any time within ten years after the date of the judgment; but, if such action be against a personal representative of a decedent, it shall be brought within five years from the qualification of such representative. Livesay v. Dunn, 33 W. Va. 453, 10 S. E. Rep. 806.

Same—Revival.—Under the provisions of secs. 11, 12, ch. 139 of the Code, a judgment may be revived by scire facias against the personal representative of the judgment debtor within ten years from the return day of the last execution thereon, although that time may be more than ten years from the date of the judgment; provided, such revival be made within five years from the date of the qualification of such representative. Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 505.

Limitation in 1825.—In Randolph v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490 (1825), it was held that at that time there was no limitation by statute to an action of debt or scire facias upon a judgment, except only in the case of a judgment on which no execution had been taken out, and in cases of executors and administrators, upon a judgment against their testator or intestate. In all other cases the remedies were as at common law, and at that law there was nothing like a limitation upon them except the presumption of payment, arising after twenty years.

Lien Ceases with Right to Enforce.—The lien of a judgment ceases when the right to sue out execution on the judgment, or to revive it by scire facias, is barred by the statute of limitations. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588; Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487.

Judgment Quando Acciderint.—A judgment quando acciderint, does not come within the operation of the statute of limitations in relation to judgments. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, sec. 5; Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Supersedeas.—A supersedeas awarded by a circuit court is not issued because of a vacancy in the office of clerk, and although a clerk is soon afterwards appointed, the plaintiff delays ten years before applying for the writ. As it is provided by statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, sec. 19, that no supersedeas shall be granted to a judgment after five years from the time when the judgment becomes final, it was proper to refuse the issuing of the supersedeas. Anderson v. Lively, 6 Leigh 77.

Action of Debt.—The statute 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 489, ch. 128, sec. 5, declaring that where execution has issued and no return is made thereon, the party in whose favor the same was issued may obtain other executions for ten years from the date of the judgment and not after, does not bar such party from maintaining an action of debt on the judgment after ten years. Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

8. MALICIOUS PROSECUTIONS.—An action for malicious prosecution sounding in consequential and punitive damages, although affecting business and property, does not survive to the personal representative, and is barred within a year after the accrual of the cause of action. Porter v. Mack, 50 W. Va. 581, 40 S. E. Rep. 459. See monographic note on "Malicious Prosecution."

Section 2027 of the Code provides a limitation of five years in every personal action for which no limitation is otherwise prescribed, "if it be a matter of such nature that, in case a party died, it can be brought by or against his personal representative; and, if it be for a matter not of such nature, shall be brought within one year next after the right to bring the same shall have accrued." In Mumpower v. City of Bristol, 94 Va. 737, 27 S. E. Rep. 581, which was an action on the case for maliciously and without probable cause enjoining the plaintiff from the use of waters of a creek for the purpose of running his mill, it was held that this action did not survive and was barred within a year after the dissolution of the injunction.

9. MOTIONS.

Virginia.—Motion to correct errors in judgments or decrees by default given by sec. 5, ch. 177, Code 1878, is barred after the lapse of five years from the date of the judgment or decree. Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646.

West Virginia.—A motion to correct a decree rendered by default under sec. 5, ch. 134 of the Code, is barred in five years from the date of the decree. Dick v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 159.

Motion for Quotas.—It was held in Stratton v. Mutual Assurance Soc., 6 Rand. 22, that on a motion for quotas the act of limitations did not apply because the declaration for insurance was a sealed instrument.

Terminology.—Motions are included in the terms "suits" and "actions" in the act of 1789, for limitation of suits upon penal statutes. Auditor v. Graham, 1 CaM 475.

10. NOTES.—Under the act of limitations of 1882 (Acts 1882, p. 300, ch. 102, sec. 6), a note given is barred by the lapse of five years from the date of its maturity, after excluding the periods when the statute is barred. Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 437. See monographic notes on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 622, and "Contracts" appended to Enders v. The Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364.

Indorsement on Demand Note.—An indorsement of a note payable on demand, imports a guarantee of the note according to its terms, which cannot be altered by parol proof; and if an action on the guarantee is not brought within five years from the date of the note, it is barred by the statute of limitations. Watson v. Hurt, 6 Gratt. 633.

Deed of Trust as Collateral Security.—A deed of trust executed as collateral security for the payment of a promissory note, does not raise such note to the dignity of a specialty, and the note is barred by the lapse of five years. Wolf v. Violet, 78 Va. 57.

Husband and Wife—Surety—Failure to Claim.—A second husband with his wife's money, paid a note to which he was not a party, but on which his wife's first husband, who had left her his estate, was surety, and the administrator of the second husband afterwards brought suit and recovered the amount paid of the principal obligor. It was held that the failure of the wife, having control of her estate by reason of a marriage contract, to lay claim to this fund within five years, bars an action by her administrator to recover it. Leith v. Carter, 83 Va. 889, 5 S. E. Rep. 584.

11. PAROL CONTRACTS.

Virginia.—Sec. 2920 of the Va. Code provides that no action shall be brought upon a verbal contract, unless within three years from the time the right of action accrues, and a verbal contract for stock is subject to this limitation. Liberty Saving Bank v. Otter View Land Co., 96 Va. 352, 31 S. E. Rep. 511. See monographic note on "Contracts" appended to Enders v. The Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364.

West Virginia.—A parol contract, not being under seal, is barred by the statute of limitations after the lapse of five years. Stuart v. County of Greenbrier, 16 W. Va. 95. See W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 104, sec. 6.

12. PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNTS.

Five-Year Limitation.—An action of account or a suit in equity by one partner against his copartner for a settlement of the partnership accounts must be commenced within five years next after the cause of action, and unless so commenced will be barred by the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code 1819, ch. 128, sec. 4, for such accounts do not concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant and therefore are not embraced by the exception to the statute. Coalter v. Coalter, 1 Rob. 79. See monographic note on "Partnership."

Dissolution and No Valid Claims for or against.—In order to subject a suit brought for the settlement of partnership accounts to the bar of the statute of limitations, it must not only appear that there has been a dissolution of the partnership more than five years before the institution of the suit, but that there were no valid claims for or against the firm, paid or received or outstanding, within that time. Any claim outstanding, paid or collected by either partner, would form an item in account between them, and take the case out of the bar of the statute. Smith v. Zumbro, 41 W. Va. 623, 24 S. E. Rep. 653; Smith v. Brown, 44 W. Va. 342, 30 S. E. Rep. 160; Sandy v. Randall, 20 W. Va. 244.

Upon a bill filed by surviving partner against the administratrix of a deceased partner, the plea of the statute of limitations cannot be sustained, where it appears that there were good debts due to the firm outstanding within five years before the suit was brought. Marsteller v. Weaver, 1 Gratt. 391.

Partial Settlement.—Where there has been a partial settlement between partners, and a balance is ascertained in favor of one of the parties against the other, although the settlement is not full and complete, the statute will run as to such balance and the portion of the account embraced in it. Foster v. Rison, 17 Gratt. 321; Roots v. Salt Co., 27 W. Va. 491; Sandy v. Randall, 20 W. Va. 244; Boggs v. Johnson, 26 W. Va. 821.

Settlement by One Partner.—One partner, for himself and another, settles the partnership accounts with the acting partner, and receives payments of money for himself and the other. As to the money so received, the statute of limitations will run from the time he received it, although it may be necessary to go into chancery to ascertain the portion which each of the parties is entitled to receive, yet the statute will run against the claim. Foster v. Rison, 17 Gratt. 321.

Construction of Statute.—In sec. 5, ch. 149, of the Code 1849, the words, "five years from a cessation of the dealings in which they are interested together," do not refer to the cessation of the active operations of the partnership, but to the time when the affairs of the partnership are wound up. Foster v. Rison, 17 Gratt. 321. See Smith v. Zumbro, 41 W. Va. 623, 24 S. E. Rep. 653; Sandy v. Randall, 20 W. Va. 247.

13. TRUSTS.

Statute Applicable to Indirect Not to Direct Trusts.—The statute of limitations does not run in cases of direct or express trusts, and is ineffectual to bar the rights of one of the parties. But in indirect or constructive trusts the rule is otherwise, and the statute is applied as in any other case. Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. —, 40 S. E. Rep. 630, 7 Va. Law Reg. 851; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 171; Hunter v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. 145; Redwood v. Riddick, 4 Munf. 222; Turner v. Campbell, 8 Gratt. 77; Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 763; Saum v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510; Massie v. Heiskell, 60 Va. 789; Williams v. Lewis, 5 Leigh 686; Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373; Gapen v. Gapen, 41 W. Va. 422, 23 S. E. Rep. 579.

Not Applicable to Trustees.—The statute of limitations has no application to persons acting as trustee, whether regularly appointed or not. Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147.

When Statute Begins.—The statute does not run in favor of trustees, as between trustee and cestui que trust, mortgagor and mortgagee, so long as the confidence may fairly be presumed to continue, but it runs both in equity and at law in favor of disseisors and tortfeasors. Harrison v. Harrison, 1 Call 418. See Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 H. & M. 139; Redwood v. Riddick, 4 Munf. 222.

And if a trustee unequivocally repudiates the trust, and such is brought to the knowledge of the beneficiary, the statute begins to run from the time of such knowledge. Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 766; Nease v. Capehart, 8 W. Va. 95.

So where the relation of parties was that of trustee and cestui que trust, the statute of limitations did not commence to run until there had been an open denial and repudiation of the trust by the trustee, brought home to the cestui que trust in such a manner as required the latter to act as upon an asserted adverse title. Key v. Hughes, 32 W. Va. 184, 9 S. E. Rep. 77.

Thus where the treasurer of a special fund of a town died, and his personal representative delivered all securities, books, and papers belonging to the office, to his successor, with evidence of the decedent's exact indebtedness to the treasury, on which an action at law might have been maintained against the personal representative, the trust was terminated, and the statute of limitations began to run against the recovery of such indebtedness from that day. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 26.

Same—Absolute Deed a Mortgage.—Where a vendor conveys land by deed, which though absolute on its face, is in fact a mere trust or mortgage, and continues in possession after the conveyance, such possession will not be adverse to the title of the vendee, and start the running of the statute of limitations, there must be a disclaimer or repudiation of the trust relation, and notice of that fact to the vendee. Flynn v. Lee, 81 W. Va. 487, 7 S. E. Rep. 430.

Notice of Trust.—Where a purchaser buys with notice of a trust he becomes charged with it himself, and the statute of limitations does not run against the rights of the beneficiaries. Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 163.

Same—Secret Trust.—A fraudulent secret trust was partly executed by the trustee who did not object to completing it. The trust property having come into the hands of one of the cestuis que trust, on a bill filed by the others to have the trust executed, against the cestui que trust in possession, the statute of limitations is no bar. Turner v. Campbell, 3 Gratt. 77; Turner v. Campbell, 1 Pat. & H. 256.

Mortgages—In Equity—Presumption of Payment.—Although the remedy on a claim secured by a mortgage, deed of trust or vendor's lien, may be barred at law, yet the remedy in equity to enforce the lien is not affected by any time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 531; Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243; Smith v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 33 Gratt. 617; Bowie v. Poor School Soc. of Westmoreland, 75 Va. 300; Stimpson v. Bishop, 82 Va. 190; Roots v. Mason, etc., Min. Co., 27 W. Va. 483; Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388.

Executors as Trustees—The doctrine is well established that an executor, as respects legatees and distributees, is to be deemed a trustee exercising a continuous trust, not affected by any statutory limitation. Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 792; Jones v. Jones, 92 Va. 590, 24 S. E. Rep. 255. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Fiduciaries—Sureties.—The statute of limitations has no application to fiduciaries. It is otherwise as to their sureties. Sec. 9, ch. 146, Code 1873; McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524; Peale v. Thurmond, 77 Va. 753.

Possession Must Be Fiduciary as to Plaintiff.—To prevent length of time from barring a claim, on the ground that the possession of the defendant was fiduciary, such possession must have been fiduciary as to the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, its being fiduciary as to any other person, is not sufficient. Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 H. & M. 139.

Applies to Beneficiary as Well as Trustee.—If the statute of limitations will bar the action of the trustee against a third person for the recovery of the trust property, it will equally bar the action of the cestui que trust for the same subject-matter. Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 374.

Possession Five Years by Sale under Deed of Trust.—Property conveyed in a deed of trust was taken under execution and sold, and the purchasers remained in peaceful possession thereof for five years before suit was instituted by the trustees, or cestui que trust to recover it. The statute of limitations is a bar to recovery. Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 374.

Possession of Slaves Five Years.—A fraudulent bill of sale is made of a female slave, absolute on its face with a secret trust for the grantor's daughters, of whom the grantee becomes guardian in 1827, and in 1829 he settles his guardianship accounts, both wards having then attained to full age; they then set up a claim to the property, which the grantee denies to be just, and in 1837, they file a bill to establish the secret trust. Held, the statute of limitations would alone be a bar to the bill, as the law is well settled that the quiet possession of slaves for five years transfers title to the holder. Owen v. Sharp, 12 Leigh 427. See also, Turner v. Campbell, 1 Pat. & H. 256.

A testator left property to be equally divided among his children, on condition that if either of his daughters die without lawful heirs, then her part should be divided among his surviving children. One of the daughters having taken possession of certain slaves as her share, and having married, died without issue. Her husband for more than five years after her death held and used the slaves as his own without any demand being made by any of the surviving children. His possession was considered adverse, and a purchase from him was protected by the act of limitations. Garland v. Enos, 4 Munf. 504.

Trust by Will—Nudum Pactum.—A trust created by will for the payment of debts by a general direction that all the testator's debts shall be paid, extends only to such as he was bound in conscience to pay, and therefore an undertaking which is merely nudum pactum is not comprehended, and may be barred by the act of limitations. Chandler v. Hill, 2 H. & M. 124.

14. VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCES.

Five Years.—The limitation of actions to avoid conveyances that are voluntary, or on consideration not deemed valuable in law, is five years. Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 11, 14 S. E. Rep. 410; McCue v. McCue, 41 W. Va. 151, 23 S. E. Rep. 689; Thorn v. Sprouse, 46 W. Va. 225, 33 S. E. Rep. 99; Himan v. Thorn, 82 W. Va. 507, 9 S. E. Rep. 930; Glascok v. Brandon, 85 W. Va. 84, 12 S. E. Rep. 1102; Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91; McCue v. Harris, 86 Va. 687, 10 S. E. Rep. 981. See monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

Where a bill is filed to set aside a conveyance, the debt, which grew out of a partnership, having existed prior to the conveyance, which was more than five years before the institution of the suit, but no settlement having been had until within less than five years, the action is barred by the statute. The fact that no settlement had been made, and the amount due the complainant had not been ascertained, did not postpone the running of the statute until the settlement was made. The plaintiff had a right under sec. 2460 of the Code to avoid the conveyance even if his debt had not been due and payable at the time the conveyance was recorded. Vashon v. Barrett, 99 Va. 344, 38 S. E. Rep. 200. See 1 Va. Law Reg. 596.

But where a testator about a year before his death put each of his children in the possession of a tract of land, but did not convey it, and about the same time made his will in which he devised to each the land in his or her possession, it was held that neither the act of putting them in possession nor the devise to them, entitled them to the protection of sec. 16, ch. 146, of the Code 1873, which provides that no gift, transfer or conveyance, which is not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be avoided in whole or in part, for that cause alone, unless the suit is brought within five years after it is made. Lewis v. Overby, 31 Gratt. 601.

Recordation in Ten Days.—Sec. 2929 of the Va. Code 1887, limits suits to set aside conveyances as voluntary to five years from the time the right to avoid it accrued, but sec. 2467 provides that where the conveyance is recorded within twenty days after being acknowledged, it is as valid to creditors and purchasers as if it had been admitted to record on the day it was acknowledged, and the five years' limitation begins to run from the latter date. Vashon v. Barrett, 99 Va. 344, 38 S. E. Rep. 200. By Acts 1895-6, p. 285, sec. 2467 is amended by requiring admission to record within ten days from the acknowledgment.

Has No Application to Fraud.—Although a deed cannot be attacked as voluntary after the lapse of five years prescribed by statute, still there is no limitation by statute upon the right of a creditor to institute a suit to attack a deed as fraudulent in fact. Of course the right to institute such suit can be lost in equity by laches. Bumgardner v. Harris, 92 Va. 188, 23 S. E. Rep. 229; Snoddy v. Haskins, 12 Gratt. 363; Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 343; Thornburg v. Bowen, 37 W. Va. 546, 16 S. E. Rep. 828; Hutchinson v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. Rep. 267; Williams v. Blakey, 76 Va. 254.

Has No Application Where There is Valuable Consideration—The statute of limitations as provided in sec. 14, ch. 104, Code 1891, has no application to contracts founded on a valuable consideration, but is limited, by the wording of the statute, to contracts on consideration not deemed valuable in law. Bogges v. Richards, 39 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. Rep. 599.

15. OTHER INSTANCES.

Abatement of Action.—If an action be commenced within five years from the time the cause of action accrued, and then it abates, the plaintiff is within the equity of the proviso in the act of limitations, if he recommences his action within a year after the abatement, otherwise he is barred. Brown v. Putney, 1 Wash. 302.

Assignments.—Where a party assigns a non-negotiable instrument he warrants its validity, and if the instrument is invalid there is an immediate breach of warranty, and a right of action accrues at once to the assignee to recover back the consideration paid. The limitation in such case is five years, and it begins to run from the date of the breach of the warranty, of the validity of the instrument assigned, unless some circumstance appears, which will avoid the commencement of the running of the statute at that time. Merchants' Nat. Bk. v. Spates, 41 W. Va. 27, 23 S. E. Rep. 681.

By the terms of an unsealed assignment of a bond, the assignor agreed to remain bound to the assignee without his taking any steps to enforce its payment, and to collect it without charge, giving as a reason that the assignment was for the accommodation of the assignor, in payment of a debt. It was held that as long as the bond was not barred, and the assignor lived and could perform his agreement, the statute was no bar against the assignee in the assignment. Lightfoot v. Green, 91 Va. 509, 22 S. E. Rep. 242. See monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

Assumpsit.—The period of the statute of limitations against a demand for money had and received by one for the use of another is five years, and it begins on the receipt of the money. Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. Rep. 575. See monographic note on "Assumpsit" appended to Kennaird v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 183.

Awards.—When the conflicting claims of a judgment creditor and the beneficiaries under a trust deed, to the surplus from a prior trust deed, are submitted to arbitration, seven years after the award, the successful party under the award will be protected by the statute of limitations. Leslie v. Brown, 1 P. & H. 216. See monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 684.

Breach of Promise.—The statutory bar is one year in an action for damages for the breach of a promise to marry. Sec. 12, ch. 102, Acts 1882; Flint v. Gilpin, 29 W. Va. 740, 3 S. E. Rep. 33.

Contribution.—The right of action which one surety has against his co-surety for contribution is based upon the implied promise arising from the equitable relations which the sureties bear to each other, and not upon the written contract by which they become sureties. Hence the limitation in such case is three years, and not the limitation which is applicable to the bond, note, or other writing which they have been compelled to pay. Tate v. Winfree, 99 Va. 255, 37 S. E. Rep. 956.

Covenant.—In an action of covenant for breach of warranty, if it appears that a portion of the land conveyed with covenants of general warranty was in the adverse possession of a stranger at the date of the conveyance, and held by a paramount title, the grantee in such deed will be held to be evicted on the day of the execution of such deed, and the statute of limitations will commence to run against the action from that date and will be barred in ten years thereafter. Isley v. Wilson, 43 W. Va. 757, 26 S. E. Rep. 551. See monographic notes on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167, and "Covenant, The Action of."

In covenant for alleged breach of contract to execute purchase-money notes, the fact that defendant accepted a deed to the property from plaintiffs six years after the time specified in the agreement does not constitute a waiver of the stipulation, so as to cause the statute of limitations to run only from the acceptance of such deed, where plaintiffs do not aver that they were ready and willing and offered to convey at the time specified, or were prevented from being ready and willing to convey or from conveying at that time by defendant, and there is no evidence that at the time of defendant's accepting the deed there was an agreement that the original contract was waived. Davis v. McMullen, 86 Va. 256, 9 S. E. Rep. 1005.

Detinue.—An action of detinue brought in five years by mortgagees to obtain possession of slaves, who had been sued under execution, is brought in time. Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 186. See monographic note on "Detinue and Replevin" appended to Hunt v. Martin, 8 Gratt. 578.

Dower.—The statutory bar to a widow's remedies for the recovery of her dower is the lapse of ten years, from the death of her husband, when her right to sue accrues. Smith v. Wehrle, 41 W. Va. 270, 23 S. E. Rep. 712; Morris v. Roseberry, 46 W. Va. 24, 32 S. E. Rep. 1019. See monographic note on "Dower" appended to Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

Ejectment.—By sec. 17, ch. 138, Code 1849, it is provided that a tenant, against whom judgment has been recovered for arrears in rent, and execution issued for the land, shall be barred of all rights to be restored to the land, if he fail in twelve months after execution issued to file bill for relief from such forfeiture, or pay the arrears of rent. Leonard v. Henderson, 23 Gratt. 331. See monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Fee Bills.—Previous to 1839, no time was prescribed within which fee bills were to be placed in an officer's hands for collection. By the statute of March, 1839, collection by distress or suit was prohibited after the expiration of five years. Until the claims were placed in the officer's hands and returned, no cause of action existed, and as the statute of limitations relates to the time the cause of action accrued, if such tickets had never been put in the officer's hands for collection and returned, there was no limitation upon them. Craig v. Lobb, 12 Leigh 627.

Impressed Property.—The act of November, 1781, relative to the adjustment of claims for property impressed for public service, and the subsequent continuing laws, were acts of limitations, and barred claims not asserted before the first of September, 1787. Com. v. Banks, 4 Call 338.

Justices.—After a lapse of eleven years a deputy sheriff is barred from suing the justices who gave judgment against him. County Justices v. Fulker-son, 21 Gratt. 182.

Liens.—Land burdened with a vendor's lien is conveyed, and as part payment the vendee conveys other land to the vendor, and in the deed charges it with a lien to indemnify the first grantee from the first lien. Money is paid by the grantor in the first deed to his grantee, with the agreement that it shall be applied to the payment of the vendor's lien, but this is not done. The right to claim such money as a discharge of the lien of indemnity is not subject to the statute of limitations, up to the amount of the lien, but beyond that it is subject to the statute. Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. Rep. 1028. *

Mortgages.—The right to enforce the lien of an equitable mortgage is not barred by the statute of limitations until such time has elapsed as would bar relief upon the instrument creating such lien. Wayt v. Carwithen, 21 W. Va. 516. See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197.

Obstruction to Right of Way.—An action for obstructing a right of way over real estate is a personal action, which may be brought within five years, as provided in sec. 12, ch. 104, W. Va. Code 1899, being a matter of such nature that in case a party die it can be brought by or against its personal representatives. It is not barred within one year. See also, sec. 20, ch. 85, W. Va. Code 1899; Fleming v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 168.

Ouster by Co-Tenant.—Acts of exclusive ownership by one of two co-tenants, such as the open sale, conveyance, and delivery of possession thereunder of the whole subject-matter, amounts to a complete ouster of the other co-tenant, and unless he brings suit within ten years thereafter his right of recovery will be barred by the statute of limitations. Talbot v. Woodford, 48 W. Va. 449, 37 S. E. Rep. 580. See monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

Personal Services.—Where a son, after his father's death, manages the estate for his mother, his claim for compensation for his services is barred by limitation, except for the five years preceding the death of the widow. Chancellor v. Ashby, 2 P. & H. 26.

Where a son makes improvements on his mother's land more than fifteen years prior to her death, his claim for compensation after she dies is barred by the statute of limitations. Griggsby v. Osborn, 82 Va. 371.

Rents.—Where trustees by authority of an act of assembly sold and conveyed land, reserving in the deed a ground rent to be paid to the proprietor when he should be ascertained, and the proprietor afterwards filed a bill against the purchaser to recover the ground rent, the general statute of limitations was no bar to the recovery. Mulliday v. Machir, 4 Gratt. 1. See monographic note on "Landlord and Tenant."

Set-Offs.—Where an action is brought upon a claim and the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of a set-off, which accrued prior to the institution of the action, the period of the statute of limitations is five years before the commencement of the action. Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460.

But where the set-off accrued subsequent to the institution of the action, the period of limitation is five years before the plea of set-off is pleaded, or the account of off-sets is filed. Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460.

Specific Performance.—In a suit in equity by the assignee of the purchase money of land against the purchaser and assignor, the suit being for a specific performance of the contract, the statute of limitations is no bar to the claim as it is inapplicable to the case. Mayor v. Carrington, 19 Gratt. 74. See monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 248.

Sureties.—Where the distributees delay twenty-five years after the last settlement of the administrator before bringing suit against the administrator and his sureties for settlement of his administration, the plea of the statute of limitations as a bar to the demand against the sureties, should be sustained. Castleman v. Dorsey, 78 Va. 342.

Trespass.—The act of February 27, 1866, in relation to the statute of limitations, extending the time within which actions of trespass and trespass on the case may be brought in certain counties, does not apply to an action of trespass on the case in assumpsit, nor to actions ex contractu, but only to actions of trespass and trespass on the case. Gore v. McLaughlin, 3 W. Va. 489.

Unlawful Detainer.—A plaintiff cannot recover in unlawful detainer unless he prove that the defendant has not held possession of the land unlawfully for three years previous to the institution of the action. See sec. 1, ch. 130, of the Code 1873; Pettit v. Cowherd, 83 Va. 20, 1 S. E. Rep. 302. See monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

February, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P. and BROOKE, J.)

Slaves—Injunction—Equity Jurisdiction—Case at Bar.

—A feme sole owning slaves made a bill of sale of them for 500 dollars, took from the purchaser his bond for that sum, and on the same day made her will releasing the bond. She died soon afterwards, and her will was offered for probat to the county court of Nelson, and the case continued until the next term. Before that term a bill in equity was exhibited to a judge in vacation, by the purchaser against two defendants, setting forth that at the time the instruments were executed the slaves were in Stafford, but that after the death of the testatrix, and before her will could be proved, one of the defendants went to Stafford and took possession of the slaves, and together with the other, who aided him in getting possession of them, had clandestinely removed

them, or was clandestinely removing them, from the county of Stafford, and would probably sell them to a trader, or so secrete them as to put it out of the complainant's power to regain the possession of them. An injunction was awarded, and the order directed to the clerk of the circuit court of Nelson, though neither the defendants nor the slaves had ever been in that county. The defendants, in their answers, objected to the jurisdiction, but did not set up any title to the slaves except through the decedent, and as her next of kin. HELD, 1. that the case made by the bill was not one for the equitable jurisdiction of any court; and 2. that if it were, that jurisdiction could not have been properly exercised by the circuit court of Nelson.

On the 8th of October 1833, Mary H. P. Brent, a maiden lady then living in Orange county, made a bill of sale to her cousin Henry S. Peyton for five slaves, for the consideration expressed therein of 500 dollars. The slaves consisted of a negro woman, her three children, and a girl named Eliza.

For the 500 dollars a bond was executed; but on the same day miss Brent made her will, whereby she gave the bond to Peyton. Charles B. Quisenberry and another witness attested the bill of sale and the will, and the place of execution 605 *of both was Quisenberry's house in Orange. Frederick S. Peyton was by the will appointed executor.

The testatrix, after making her will, removed to the residence of Henry S. Peyton in Nelson county. She died soon afterwards.

On the 26th of November 1833, the will was offered for probat in the court of Nelson county, and the case continued until December court.

Before December court, to wit, on the 4th of that month, Henry S. Peyton exhibited a bill, setting forth that at the time of the execution of the said instruments Eliza was in the possession of Quisenberry, but the negro woman and her children were in the county of Stafford; that a short time after the death of miss Brent, Quisenberry, who was the husband of her sister, came to Nelson, but that immediately after her funeral, and before her will could be proved, he went to Stafford and took possession of the negro woman and her children, and together with one John Brent, who aided him in getting possession of them, had clandestinely removed them, or was then clandestinely removing them, from the county of Stafford, and that he would probably sell them to a trader, or so secrete them as to put it out of the complainant's power to regain the possession of them. The bill prayed that Quisenberry and Brent might be made defendants; that they, and all others combining and confederating with them, might be enjoined from selling or removing the said slaves out of the county where they then were; that a receiver might be immediately appointed to take possession of the said slaves and hold them in safe custody until the complainant's rights should be established to the satisfaction of the court, or until the farther order of the court; that the said slaves might be restored to the complainant, and the said Quisenberry and Brent compelled to account for the value of such as had been, or might be, sold by them or either of them; and for general relief.

606 *Judge Thompson, to whom the bill was presented, awarded an injunction, and directed his order to the clerk of the circuit court of Nelson. Process issued from that court, by the judge's order, directed to the sheriff of any county in the commonwealth. And the process was served by the sheriff of the county of Orange, in which county the defendants and the slaves were at the time of service.

In the answers of the defendants, the jurisdiction of the court was objected to on two grounds: 1st, that if the plaintiff had a right to the slaves under the bill of sale, his remedy at law was complete; and 2dly, that the defendants were not residents of the county of Nelson, and never acquired or held possession of the slaves one moment of time in that county. The defendants set up no title to the slaves except through the decedent, and as her next of kin. They impeached the transactions of the complainant with the decedent for fraud and imposition, alleging that the decedent was incompetent to make a valid contract, because of her great imbecility of body and mind, and that she did not know the contents of the papers she was executing. Quisenberry also alleged, that at the time of his attestation, the complainant misrepresented to him the nature of those papers.

On the 24th of December 1833, the sentence of the county court of Nelson was pronounced, refusing to admit the will to record. From this sentence the executor appealed. And on the 30th of September 1834, the circuit court reversed the sentence and ordered that the will be established.

The next day, to wit, the 1st of October 1834, the injunction cause was heard, and the following opinion pronounced by the circuit court:

"The court is of opinion, that in consideration of the pendency, in the courts of this county, of a contest for probat; in consideration that the bill of sale and 607 will are so closely connected and interwoven in time, place, circumstances, and consideration moving to their execution, as to constitute but parts of one transaction, making even the bill of sale, with the parol agreement therewith

*The language of the bill was as follows: "At the time of the execution of the deed aforesaid, your orator executed his note to the said Mary H. P. Brent for the sum of 500 dollars, the interest of which, during the life of the said Mary, he was to pay to her. But it being the intention of the said Mary that the principal of the note should not be exacted of him after her death, she made a will on the same day of the execution of the deed, by which she bequeathed him the amount of the note, or in other words released him the debt."—Note in Original Edition.

connected, though a contract as to some purposes, yet testamentary as to others; and in consideration of the fact that the defendant Charles B. Quisenberry was a subscribing witness to the bill of sale, and is now seeking to impeach his own attestation,—that some court of equity had jurisdiction to interpose by injunction, and, under the circumstances of this case, that that jurisdiction attached to this court, notwithstanding the nonresidence of the defendants and the absence of the property, relied on in the answers.”

Wherefore the court decreed that the injunction be made perpetual; that the defendants deliver up to the plaintiff the slaves mentioned in the bill; and that the said defendants render before a commissioner an account of the heirs of the said slaves from the time they became possessed thereof.

On the petition of the defendants Brent and Quisenberry, an appeal was allowed.

James Garland for the appellants. It is a standing and unyielding principle of equity, that where a party has a complete remedy at law, equity will not interpose. Story's Eq. Pl. 373; Mitford's Eq. Pl. 123; Cooper's Eq. Pl. 124; Beames's Pleas in Equity 79; Thornton & others v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. 142; Tarpley's

608 *adm'r v. Dobyns, 1 Wash. 185. This principle has been so rigidly adhered to, that in cases where parties had a just legal defence, but neglected to make it at law, equity has refused to interfere. Chapman &c. v. Harrison, 4 Rand. 336. What fact is stated in the bill, that interposed the slightest obstacle to a complete remedy at law? Is it the apprehension that the appellants, on taking possession of the slaves, would remove them from the county of Stafford to some other county? This was no obstacle, because the remedy at law existed as well in one county as another. In whatever county the defendants were, they were amenable to the process of the court of that county; and the bill does not intimate that they intended any removal, either clandestinely or otherwise, out of the state. A suspicion is faintly expressed that the slaves would be sold to a trader; but even with this suspicion, the appellee does not intimate that the appellants would so remove their persons as to be out of the reach of the process of a court of law.

II. The circuit courts, sitting in chancery, have jurisdiction over all persons and in all causes in chancery within their respective counties. Sess. Acts 1830-31, p. 47, § 22. The defendants were not, when the bill was filed, and never had been, residents of the county of Nelson; and the slaves were not, and never had been, in that county. The question of jurisdiction is not affected by the probate case. If the defendants had demurred to the bill for want of jurisdiction, the demurrer must have been sustained: the record of the probate case could not have been introduced into the injunction case, for the purpose of overruling the demurrer. The exception taken to the jurisdiction in the answers was equivalent to a demurrer.

Patton on the same side. The appellee shews by his bill that he was able to 609 establish the validity of his title *at law, and makes no suggestion that the defendants were concealing themselves so as to evade legal process. The process from a court of law would have been just as effective as this bill. The bill is in effect an action of detinue. The class of cases authorizing the interference of equity to prevent the sale of property under execution may be relied on: but the jurisdiction exercised in those cases is not extended to others. In Parks's adm'r and heirs v. Rucker, 5 Leigh 149, a stronger case than this was presented for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction, but the court refused to interfere.

II. If any court of equity could interfere, there is no foundation for the exercise of jurisdiction by the circuit court of Nelson. The rule on this subject is prescribed by the act 1 R. C. 1819, p. 203, ch. 66, § 38; Sess. Acts 1830-31, p. 56, ch. 11, § 41; Supp. to 1 Rev. Code, p. 151, § 41. And the interpretation placed upon this act in Randolph's ex'or &c. v. Tucker & al., 10 Leigh 655, is decisive of the present case. Here the bill makes no suggestion that any proceeding was apprehended in Nelson; the act apprehended was an act in Stafford. There is no suggestion even that the defendants contemplated removing the slaves out of the commonwealth; and in this respect the case is less strong than Randolph's ex'or &c. v. Tucker & al.

Robinson for the appellee. Upon the statement in the bill the defendants were clandestinely carrying off property to which neither of them had any right. That right was in the plaintiff, if his bill of sale was valid; and if the bill of sale was void, the right would be in the personal representative of the grantor, when there should be a grant of probat or administration. Brent and Quisenberry had right in neither aspect, and they claimed none. They were mere bailiffs or trustees for the parties 610 having right: and when it was seen that *they were violating their duty, any one interested had a right to come forward and ask a court of equity to do what was necessary to preserve the property. This is but one of many cases in which the interference of equity by injunction is indispensable “to secure the enjoyment of specific property; or to preserve the title to such property; or to prevent frauds or gross and irremediable injustice in respect to such property.” 2 Story's Equity, p. 190, § 905.

The striking feature in the case is, that according not only to the allegations of the bill, but the admissions of the answers, the defendants had no legal title to the property. They were merely a part of the next of kin of the decedent, and could claim only through her personal representative such proportion of the slaves as might remain after the payment of debts, and could not have that unless the bill of sale were void. It could not be necessary for the plaintiff to go to law to recover a legal title from them, when they asserted no legal title at all. All that they had a right to ask was, that the property should be preserved until there should be a personal representative capable of disputing with the plaintiff the legality of his title. The injunction which the plaintiff sought would attain this, and the granting it, therefore, meted out exact justice to both parties. Suppose the case reversed,—suppose that after the death of miss Brent and before the grant of probat or administration, Peyton had obtained possession of the slaves, and been clandestinely removing them, and in this state of things a distributee had filed a bill asking an injunction to prevent the property from being improperly removed before there was any personal representative; can there be a doubt that such injunction would have been awarded? It would have been indispensable to justice, since the distributee would have no legal remedy against the plaintiff. Atkinson v. Henshaw, 2 Ves. & Beames 85.

611 *Here, too, an action of detinue would have been wholly inadequate. The defendants were going from county to county, and by the time the plaintiff could get a writ from the office of any county, and give it to a sheriff, they would have been in another. Independently of which, detinue has never been considered so efficient a remedy to preserve slaves as an injunction, where a removal is apprehended and distinctly alleged. No other remedy would have been effectual except that adopted here; to wit, a subpoena and injunction directed to the sheriff of any county in the commonwealth.

II. Admitting that some chancellor might award such injunction, judge Thompson clearly had jurisdiction to award it. For the act referred to on the other side (§41), provides that the judges shall each have and exercise a general jurisdiction in awarding injunctions, whether the judgment or proceeding enjoined be rendered within or without their respective circuits, or the party against whose proceeding the injunction be asked be resident within or without the circuit. The objection is merely that the order of the judge was not directed to the clerk of the circuit court of that county in which the proceeding was apprehended. But where was the proceeding apprehended? If the slaves had already been removed from Stafford, it was not there. It must have been in some other county, through which the removal was then going on, or in which the sale or secretion was then taking place; but in what other county, was unknown to the plaintiff and to the judge. Was this a sufficient reason for a denial of justice? Surely not. The general principle, that where a jurisdiction exists, every necessary power shall be implied to carry it into effect, forbids any such conclusion.

It would be peculiarly improper under this statute, which is remedial. Such a construction should be put upon it as will advance the remedy. The case of Cocke & Co. v. Pollok & Co., 1 Hen. & Munf. 612 499, exhibited the curious *spectacle of two chancellors respectively disclaiming jurisdiction of a bill for an injunction to a judgment, in a case in which jurisdiction ought to have been exercised by some chancellor, and could not have been exercised by any save one of those two judges. And what is a little remarkable, judge Tucker thought both right in refusing. But the two other judges did not think the state of the law quite so defective, and redress was obtained. The legislature nevertheless acted on the subject. They thought it best that the judge of each superior court of chancery should have a general jurisdiction in awarding injunctions. Sess. Acts 1813-14, p. 48, ch. 16, § 18. Instead of determining, as the court of appeals had done, which of the two should have jurisdiction, the legislature determined that jurisdiction might be exercised by either of them, or by any other judge. The term jurisdiction excludes the idea that any party or any officer can refuse to obey the order of a judge awarding an injunction, upon the ground of its being extrajudicial. The judge having jurisdiction, his order is to bind to the extent to which he acts. No clerk is to refuse to issue process, upon the ground that the judge had no jurisdiction to order him to issue it; no sheriff or party is to refuse to obey, upon the ground that the judge has directed his order to, and caused the process to issue from, an improper court. What then is the meaning of the latter part of the section? It does not determine when the judge has jurisdiction, but it points out a course for making his jurisdiction effectual. It is a guide to him in the exercise of his jurisdiction, which he is to follow wherever he can. But where, from the nature of the case, the direction in the latter part of the clause furnishes no guide, the judge must act as he would have done had there been no such direction. In such case the judge of a district court of chancery would have directed his order to his own clerk.

613 Now, the judge of a circuit *court has several clerks within his circuit, and he must of necessity direct his order to one of those clerks; to which of them, is left to him in the exercise of a sound discretion. In the original act, the direction in regard to a ne exeat was, that it should be directed to the clerk of the court of that district in which the defendant resided. The consequence of this being palpable, the legislature made an amendment by the act in 1 R. C. 203, § 38. Their meaning is thus shewn to be, that in the cases in which the judge acts under the 38th section, such a course is to be pursued by him as will make his order effectual. That course, here, was to direct the order to the clerk of some court within the circuit; and the remarks of the judge, contained in his opinion, shew that Nelson court was more proper than any other.

Stanard was on the same side, but added nothing to the views presented by Robinson.

C. Johnson in reply. The case of Armstrong v. Huntons, ante, pp. 323, shews that, as a general rule, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to try the title to slaves. In the present case, a writ in detinue might have been more readily served than the process of injunction, and the finding a full value would have given as much security for obtaining the specific property as any action of a court of chancery. The plaintiff sets up a title under an absolute conveyance; a title purely legal. The defendants stand amenable to him without regard to the fate of the will. They have the possession of the property, and have a right to oppose that to the plaintiff. It is necessary that the plaintiff should state in his bill some ground of equity; but there is none. The judge of the circuit court of Nelson, however, has thought proper to bring the case into his court, because another case was pending in that county, (not in his court but *in the county court) and because the deed and will were executed about the same time. Because two questions depend on similar evidence, are they to be tried together? But there is not even foundation for this: the decedent might be competent one hour, and incompetent the next. In such a case as this, not even consent could have given jurisdiction.

II. If the case of Randolph's ex'or &c. v. Tucker & al. be law, it is conclusive of this case. If that bill ought to have been sent from James City, this ought to have been sent from Nelson. But it is said, the bill did not give information where the proceeding was apprehended. It is new ground, that a defect in the bill is to be made the foundation of jurisdiction. Suppose the bill had been carried to the judge of the circuit court of Orange, and he had directed the order to the clerk of the circuit court of Nelson, would that have given jurisdiction to Nelson court? Under the former law, no judge could act beyond the limits of his district. Under the present law, any judge may award an injunction; but the order is to be directed to the clerk of the proper court, and is to have the same effect as if made by the judge of that circuit.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the resolution of the court:

The court is of opinion that the case made by the bill was not one for the equitable jurisdiction of any court; and if it were, that jurisdiction could not have been properly exercised by the circuit court of Nelson. On this ground, without deciding or even considering any other question in the case, the court is of opinion that the decree is erroneous: therefore it is decreed and ordered that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the appellee do pay to the appellants their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal. And this court proceeding to pronounce such decree as *the said circuit court ought to have pronounced, it is further decreed and ordered that the bill of the appellee be dismissed, and that he pay unto the appellants their costs by them about their defence in the said circuit court expended.

The United States v. Cottingham.

[40 Am. Dec. 710.]

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Army—Construction of Act of Congress.—Construction of the eleventh section of the act of congress of March 16, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States.

Same—Enlistment*—Alien—Discharge.—A person of full age voluntarily enlisting in the army of the United States is not entitled to be discharged from the service upon the ground of his being an alien.

In October 1841, George Cottingham presented a petition to the judge of the first circuit, setting forth that he was born in the city of Dublin in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland: that he migrated to this county in or about the year 1836, and shortly after, to wit, on the 16th of May 1837, enlisted in the army of the United States for three years, and served as a private in captain E. S. Hawkins's company (H.) of the seventh regiment of infantry of the said army of the United States: that he became entitled to and received an honourable discharge on the 16th of May 1840: that two days before the expiration of his term of enlistment, to wit, on the 14th of May 1840, he enlisted a second time in the army of the United States, to wit, in troop B. in the second regiment of dragoons, to serve as a private for five years: that at the time of such enlistment he the said Cottingham was an alien, not having taken the oath of allegiance to the United *States, nor taken any steps towards naturalization according to the laws of the United States: that being an alien he cannot legally be enlisted in the army of the United States: and that he is stationed at fortress Monroe, under the command of lieutenant colonel Alexander C. W. Fanning, where he is detained in custody without legal authority. The petition prayed for a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum.

Affidavit being made by the petitioner of the truth of the facts set forth in the petition, the judge to whom the application was made granted the writ, directed to colonel Fanning.

Colonel Fanning brought the petitioner

Contracts of Enlistment, Civil Contracts—Points of Difference between.—The principal case is cited in U. S. v. Blakeney, 3 Gratt. 415, 425; Burroughs v. Peyton, 16 Gratt. 492.

See foot-note to U. S. v. Blakeney, 3 Gratt. 406.

before the circuit court of Norfolk county, and certified the cause of his detainer to be, that he was duly enlisted in the army of the United States. The material facts proved were made a part of the record. In the opinion both of the circuit court and of this court, they shewed the said George Cottingham to be an alien. And on the ground of alienage, the circuit court held that he was illegally detained in custody, and ordered that he be discharged.

The United States, by Robert C. Nicholas esq. their attorney for the eastern district of Virginia, presented a petition to the court of appeals for a writ of error, insisting that there is no legal impediment to the enlistment of aliens in the army of the United States, and that the judgment was therefore erroneous.

The writ of error was awarded accordingly.

- Nicholas for plaintiffs in error. In the first place it will be shewn by a reference to the general principles of law applicable to all contracts, that an enlistment in the army of the United States by an alien, (which is a contract between the U. States on the one hand, and the recruit on the other; U. States v. Bainbridge, 1 Mason 71,) is as binding upon the alien, as it would be upon a natural born citizen of the United States.

617 *A contract, in its most enlarged signification, is defined by the elementary writers to be "an agreement upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing." 2 Blac. Com. 442. It is essential to every contract, that there should be at least two contracting parties competent to make a contract. These parties may be either natural or artificial persons. Every natural person is competent to make a valid and binding contract, unless he labours under some particular disability making his case an exception to the general rule; and it is incumbent upon those who deny the capacity of a party in any given case to make a contract, to shew affirmatively the existence of such disability. To ascertain what are the disabilities which render persons incompetent to contract, we must have recourse to the jurists and elementary writers who have treated of this branch of the law.

Among the various causes of incompetency to contract, enumerated in the works upon this subject, mere alienage is not included. Chitty on Contracts, ch. 2, p. 107, (4th american from 2d London edi.) It is true, as we are informed in the same work, (p. 150,) that the contract of an alien enemy is void and cannot be enforced, because, as the writer says, "if an alien enemy were allowed to sue in the english courts on a contract made before or during his disability, he would be enabled to withdraw from this country resources which might be converted to purposes injurious to its interests." But the disability does not extend to an alien ami, to whom the considerations of public policy which have been adverted to do not apply. And cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex.

Moreover, although aliens labour under some disabilities, such as an incapacity to hold lands, to vote at elections, and to be appointed to offices &c. they nevertheless enjoy many of the rights and privileges of citizens, and are capable of acquiring, 618 holding and transmitting *moveable property in like manner as citizens; and they can bring suits for the recovery and protection of that property. 2 Kent's Com. 62; 1 Blac. Com. 371-2.

The right of aliens to make valid and binding contracts is sanctioned by the general policy of our government, as indicated in the federal constitution, and by legislative enactments made in pursuance thereof. By the constitution of the United States, art. 3, sect. 2, it is provided that the judicial power shall extend (among other enumerated cases) to controversies between the citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects. The judiciary act of 1789, sect. 11, gives to the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature in which an alien is a party. 1 Story's Laws of U. S. 57. The authority thus conferred upon aliens to sue in the federal courts presupposes a capacity upon their part to make contracts; and the obligation of contracts must be necessarily mutual, and binding upon the alien as well as the citizen; for reciprocity of obligation is of the essence of all contracts. If an alien contracts a debt with a citizen or with the government, or makes a contract with either to do a piece of work, he would not be exempted from its performance by being an alien, but might be coerced by suit to a compliance with his engagements. Why therefore may he not make a valid contract to render military as well as any other species of personal service?

But it may be argued on the other side, that though there is no personal disability in the alien to make other contracts, his enlistment is nevertheless void on account of illegality, being inconsistent with the allegiance which he owes to his own sovereign or country.

That argument is founded upon a misconception of the duties and obligations which devolve upon individuals during their residence in a foreign country; and springs from an incorrect idea of the nature of allegiance.

619 *Allegiance, we are told, is distinguished by the law into two sorts or species, the one natural, the other local; the former being also perpetual, the latter temporary. Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the king's dominions, immediately upon their birth. Local allegiance is such as is due from an alien or stranger born, for so long a time as he continues within the king's dominion and protection; and it ceases when he transfers himself to another country. 1 Blac. Com. 370; 2 Kent's Com. 63. And to the same effect see Vattel, book 1, ch. 19, sect. 213. The authorities cited clearly establish the proposition, that a citizen or subject of one state or kingdom, by removing to and becoming a resident of a foreign country, thereby incurs the obligation of allegiance to the latter country, in consideration of the protection which it affords him, whilst a sojourner within its limits. Nor is this duty of temporary allegiance affected by the consideration that an individual may be involved in difficulties by owing allegiance to two different sovereigns at the same time; for it is his own act which brings him into this embarrassment.

Moreover, the argument against the enlistment of aliens, founded upon its incompatibility with the allegiance due to their native sovereign, would equally apply to the enlistment of naturalized citizens; who, according to the doctrines of the english law, (which have not been affected by any statutory provision in this country,) cannot by such naturalization throw off or renounce their allegiance to their native country. 2 Kent's Com. 48, 9. Now the counsel on the other side will hardly contend that a naturalized citizen may not be lawfully enlisted in our army.

But again, it is contended on our part that there is not only no illegality in the enlistment of aliens, but that, according to the principles of national law as laid down by the most eminent jurists, it is perfectly lawful for *the citizens of one country to enlist in a foreign service. 620 Vattel, book 3, ch. 2, sect. 13. And the practice of all nations ancient and modern, it is believed, has been in conformity with the opinions expressed by the writers on public law.

If then there be nothing, either in the general principles of law applicable to contracts or in the law and usages of nations, which forbids the enlistment of aliens, let us enquire in the next place whether such enlistments are made illegal and void by the acts of congress relative to the army of the United States. It is contended by those who deny the legality of such enlistments, that they are in violation of the 11th section of the act of congress approved March 16, 1802, in 2 Story's Laws U. S. p. 832.

What was the object of this section? Was it designed to invalidate and render void every enlistment which was not in strict compliance with the regulations prescribed by it? It is absurd to suppose that such could have been the design of congress in adopting the provision in question. For, if it were, then every deviation from the requirements of the section, however trivial, would avoid an enlistment, and entitle the recruit to his discharge. For example, if he should want an inch of the required height, it would be just as valid an objection to his enlistment as the want of citizenship, which is relied on in this case. The requisitions in the section are merely directory to the recruiting officers, and a departure from them will not affect the validity or legality of their acts. Whitney & al. v. Emmett & al., 1 Baldwin's C. C. R.

315, 16. The correctness of this position is sustained by decisions of the supreme court in analogous cases. For instance, in the case of The United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. 720, it is decided that the laws requiring disbursing officers of the government to settle their accounts at short and stated periods, are merely directory 621 to such officers, *and intended as a security to the government, but constitute no part of the contract with the sureties of such officers; and that consequently a failure by the government to require the settlements in the mode and time prescribed, will not affect the liability of the sureties for any default of the principal. See also U. States v. Vanzandt, 11 Wheat. 184, and U. States v. Nicholls, 12 Wheat. 505.

But it may be said, that the section referred to imposes a penalty on the recruiting officer for a deviation from its provisions, and that every contract which is prohibited under a penalty is void, although the statute do not expressly declare it to be so; and that consequently the enlistment in this case was void, the recruit not being a citizen of the United States.

Without questioning the correctness of the general principle of law referred to, its application to the case before the court is denied. For in the first place, suppose it was the design of the legislature to annex the penalty to a deviation from any one of its requirements, in regard either to age, height, or citizenship; upon whom is the penalty imposed? Why clearly upon the recruiting officer, who is the mere agent of the government. The contract of enlistment, however, is a contract with the government itself. Now the principle of law before cited invalidates a contract, and takes away all right of action upon it, wherever a penalty is imposed by statute upon the parties to such contract, or either of them: but in this case no penalty attaches to either of the contracting parties, the government or the recruit; it is designed merely as a security to the former for the faithful execution of the law, with which the latter has no concern.

But on our part it is contended further, that if the imposition of the penalty is to have any influence upon the construction of this section of the act, the penalty itself was not designed to be applied to the 622 enlistment *of persons not citizens of the United States, but merely to the enlistment of minors without the consent of their parents, guardians or masters: for although the first part of the section allows the sum of two dollars to the recruiting officer for the enlistment of each citizen of the U. States of a certain height and age, it does not prohibit the enlistment of persons not citizens; the only words of prohibition are contained in the proviso in regard to the enlistment of minors, and the penalty is annexed to the violation of that proviso only.

But conceding, for the sake of argument, that it was the intention of congress, by the section under consideration, to prohibit under a penalty the enlistment of any person not a citizen of the United States, the question naturally arises as to the true meaning of the words "citizen of the United States," as used in the act. We contend that those words must be taken in a restricted or qualified sense, and do not mean a citizen entitled to all the privileges which appertain to citizenship in its most enlarged signification. It has been already shewn in a former part of this argument, by reference to Vattel, that an alien under the protection of a foreign state is for some purposes and to a certain extent to be regarded as a citizen, and as owing a temporary allegiance to that state. The principle is moreover well established, that for all commercial purposes, a person may acquire, without naturalization, and by residence merely, the rights of a citizen of another country; and the domicil of a party, without reference to the place of birth, becomes quoad hoc the test of national character. 1 Kent's Com. 75; 2 Id. 49.

Again, by the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, before cited, the circuit courts have jurisdiction of suits between citizens of different states, and the averment of the citizenship of the parties is a necessary averment, and must be proved under the general issue. But it has been repeatedly decided that the *citizenship spoken of in the constitution and in the judiciary act, in reference to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, means nothing more than residence. To constitute a person a citizen of a state, so as to sue in the courts of the United States, he must have a domicil in such state. If he removes into a state animo manendi, that is sufficient, whatever may be his motive for removal. Catlett v. The Pacific Ins. Co., 1 Paine's C. C. R. 594; Case v. Clarke, 5 Mason 70; Cooper's lessee v. Galbraith, 3 Wash. C. C. R. 546.

These authorities are abundant to shew that the word "citizen," employed in an act of congress, is not always to be understood in its most extended signification, but is sometimes used to express an inferior degree of citizenship, such as is described by Vattel. And such, it has been attempted to prove, is the proper interpretation to be placed upon the term "citizen" in the act under consideration.

By this construction the act of congress will be made to harmonize with the principles established by the law of nations, which have been shewn to authorize the enlistment of temporary residents. And according to the decision of the supreme court in the case of Talbot v. Seeman, 1 Cranch 1, "the laws of the United States ought not, if it be avoidable, so to be construed as to infract the common principles and usages of nations, or the general doctrines of national law." See opinion of the court in that case, delivered by chief justice Marshall, Id. p. 43.

Segar for defendant in error. It may be conceded that on general principles an alien may contract, either with the government or its citizens. But the case of Cottingham, and all like it, are taken out of the operation of general principles by special legislation. The 11th section of the act of congress of the 16th of March 1802 forbids the enlistment of aliens in 624 the army. *Surely the legislative power may place either citizen or alien under disability to contract about a particular subject. Here the disability is created by express law, and extends to both the contracting parties, unless the prohibition in the act of 1802 is to go for nothing.

That it was the intention of the legislature to exclude aliens from the military service, will clearly appear from the history of the legislation on this subject. In 1811, 1812, 1813 and 1814, laws were passed which virtually repealed the act of 1802, and dispensed with citizenship as a qualification of the recruit, by authorizing the enlistment of able-bodied men. See Story's Laws U. S. p. 1205, 1208, 1285, 1433. This change in the law of enlistment evidently grew out of the emergency of the case; the country being then either on the verge of war with Great Britain, or actually engaged in it, and requiring, in order to fill up its armies, a relaxation of the policy which had governed the previous peace establishment. But the war having terminated, and the emergency passed away which caused the suspension of the act of 1802, congress, by its act of March 3d 1815, (Story's Laws U. S. p. 1510, § 7,) repealed the laws of 1810, 1811, 1812 and 1813 which allowed the enlistment of aliens, and reinstated the 11th section of the act of 1802 and the 5th section of the act of 1808, which prescribed citizenship as a requisite of enlistment. This ascertains clearly the intention of congress that none but citizens should be employed in the military peace establishment. And the intention being discovered must prevail. Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. 365. So imperative indeed is the legislative will, that where it can be ascertained by expressive circumstances, it will prevail even over the literal sense of terms. 1 Kent's Com. 462. There was an obvious and twofold motive for banishing aliens from the peace establishment. First, (in the absence of all emergency) to add to the moral character and respectability, by improving 625

*the material of the army, which could be accomplished by no other means so well as by substituting the native born american for the alien mercenary. Secondly, there has ever been in this country an excessive jealousy of standing armies in time of peace, which would naturally lead the representatives of the people, in framing a military peace establishment, to compose it of citizens. There is far more ground for distrust of aliens in time of peace than of war, for in the latter case the number of citizens in the armies of the republic would so far exceed that of foreigners as to remove then all ground for apprehension. These considerations tend to shew that it was the design of congress, by the act of March 3d 1815 (reinstating that of 1802), to redress a mischief; and the judiciary should, pro bono publico, give such construction to those acts as will meet the intention of the legislature. Again, as indicating the intention of the legislature, we may look to the uniform construction given to the act of 1802 by that department of the government which is specially charged with the interpretation and execution of all laws relating to the military establishment; the department of war. From 1815 to this time, without interruption, the war department has interpreted the 11th section of the act of 1802 to exclude aliens from enlistment. It will suffice to refer to the general regulations for the army, published in 1841, where it is laid down at p. 121, in article 687, that the persons who may be enlisted are to be "citizens of the United States, native or naturalized." What other meaning can be given to the act of 1802? It cannot mean that the recruiting officer may enlist men possessing none of the qualifications therein prescribed, or possessing only some of them. It must be considered as prescribing a rule to be strictly observed by the recruiting officer; he is to enlist only those who shall possess at least the qualifications, each and every one thereof, marked out in the act. Does the district attorney suppose the interpretation to be, that for recruiting men possessing all those qualifications the recruiting officer shall receive the 2 dollars premium, but in the event of their not having those qualifications he shall only forfeit the premium, the enlistment all the while remaining valid? Such an interpretation supposes that congress, in framing the peace establishment, was looking rather to the pitiful interests of the recruiting officer than to the weal of the republic; and it leaves the whole policy of enlistments in the army, instead of being guarded by legislative provisions, to the naked discretion of the recruiting officers of the army. But the ground work of such a construction is overturned by the fact that the provision of the law of 1802, allowing a premium for enlisting recruits, is repealed by the 5th section of the act of congress passed March 2, 1833, (Sess. Acts 1832-3, p. 72,) and the commissioned officers charged with the recruiting service are still to enlist citizens of the United States.

With respect to the argument that a qualified citizenship was meant by the act of 1802, it is sufficient to observe that the term citizen there used must be taken in its common acceptation, to mean one born in this country, or one not born therein who has become a citizen by complying with the naturalization laws of the U. States. The cases referred to (Catlett v. The Pacific Insurance Company, Case v. Clarke, and Cooper's lessee v. Galbraith) have no reference to aliens or to the military service, and present no grounds for an argument from analogy.

II. It is not necessary that terms of positive prohibition be employed to render a statute prohibitory in its operation. In Cohen v. Hoff, 2 Tredway's Rep. 661, Nott, J., lays it down, that "affirmative words in a statute sometimes imply a negative of what is not affirmed, as strongly as if expressed." And this happens in two cases: first, when a new rule is introduced; Hobart's Rep. 298; 1 Kent's Com. 467, 627 note d.; 6 Bac. Abr. Gwill. edi.* p. 377. Secondly, when a statute directs a thing to be done in a particular way, it includes in itself a negative; viz. that it shall not be done otherwise. See authorities just quoted; also Plowden 206 b.; Vin. Abr. vol. 19, p. 511, 12, title Statute. Now the present law of enlistment did at the time of its reenactment prescribe a new rule, by abolishing the rule which prevailed under the laws of 1811, 1812, 1813 and 1814, and introducing another in its stead: and the act of 1802 directing enlistments to be made in a particular way, viz. of able-bodied citizens &c. implies that they are not to be made otherwise; that is, by specifically including citizens, it excludes aliens, upon the well known maxim inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

III. For the nonobservance of the qualifications enumerated in the act of 1802, a penalty is imposed of the value of the clothing received from the government by the recruit; say, some 30 or 40 dollars for each offence. There is no reason for considering this penalty as applicable exclusively to the enlistment of minors. If congress had so intended, they would have used the words "contrary to the true intent and meaning of this proviso;" or their language would have been—"And if any officer shall enlist any person under 21 years of age without the consent of his parent &c. he shall forfeit and pay the amount of clothing which may have been received by such recruit." But the words of the act affixing the penalty are general—"contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act."

Even if there were no penalty imposed by statute, it is imposed by another authority. It is clearly within the constitutional prerogative of the president, as commander in chief of the army and navy, to ordain general regulations for the government of the army, not forbidden by the constitution or the laws. And the first section of the act organizing the war department constitutes the secretary of war the organ of the president, *for performing such duties and acts connected with the land forces, as may consist with the constitution. The general regulations of the army, then, when they have received the sanction of the president, have the force and obligation of law. The 687th article of the regulations published in 1841 (like those which have been in operation for many years) designates "able-bodied citizens of the U. States, native or naturalized," as those who may be enlisted. After thus designating citizens for enlistment, this code of regulations goes on, with the most guarded circumspection, to prevent the enlistment of any contrary to law or regulation. Boards of inspection are organized from time to time, for the express purpose of enquiring whether any have been enlisted contrary to law or regulation; and if any be found to have been so enlisted, they are rejected, and the recruiting officer who may have enlisted them is mulcted in the amount of clothing which the discharged recruit may have received, to be deducted out of his pay. See articles 687, 713-719, 741. If it be said that the words of the 687th regulation are, "able-bodied citizens may be enlisted," the answer is that may, there, obviously means must; for that is its meaning whenever a positive duty is imposed, and not a mere discretionary power given. Minor and others v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 1 Peters 64. Moreover, by the general order prefixed to the regulations, the officers of the army are commanded strictly to observe every article thereof; and any "change, alteration or departure therefrom" is expressly forbidden.

IV. Whatever is forbidden by penalty in a statute is unlawful and void. Bartlett v. Vinor, Carth. 252; 1 Kent's Com. 467; Chitty on Contracts (4th American from 2d London ed.) 538; Hallett v. Novion, 14 Johns. 273; Mitchell v. Smith, 4 Dall. 269; 1 Binn. 118; Seidenbender v. Charles's adm'rs, 4 Serg. & Rawle 151-160; Wheeler v. Russell, 17 Mass. R. 259-281. The 629 *distinction between offences mala in se and mala prohibita has been overruled. Ex parte Daniels, 14 Ves. 191; Appendix to 15 Peters p. 33. A breach of the statute law in either case is equally unlawful, and equally a breach of duty; and no agreement founded on the contemplation of either class of offences will be enforced at law or in equity. 1 Kent's Com. 467, 8; Pennington &c. v. Townsend, 7 Wend. 276; Law v. Hodson, 11 East 300; Bank v. Owens, 2 Peters 527-538; 1 Tuck. Com. (ed. 1831) book 2, p. 223; 2 Id. book 3, p. 130, 481. This court has itself solemnly adjudicated the principle that a thing prohibited by the imposition of a penalty in a statute is equally forbidden and equally unlawful with one expressly and absolutely prohibited; Wilson v. Spencer &c., 1 Rand. 76; M'Guire v. Ashby, 1 Rand. 101. Applying to the present case the principles ascertained by the authorities which have been cited, the conclusion is that the enlistment of Cottingham (who was not a citizen), being prohibited under a penalty prescribed both by statute and regulation, is altogether illegal and void.

V. The enlistment of Cottingham is void on another ground. As a contract it wants an indispensable ingredient of every valid agreement,—mutuality. The government might have put an end to it at its will; it might have discharged Cottingham at any moment for being an alien, whether he were willing or not. It is almost the daily practice to dismiss the enlisted soldier for want of the prescribed qualifications. If the government may do this, may not the soldier, for like reasons, claim his discharge? The contract, not being obligatory on the one, cannot bind the other.

BALDWIN, J. The error in the argument of the appellee's counsel consists in treating the enlistment in question merely as a contract, and as subject exclusively to the principles affecting the validity
630 of contracts. A *contract it undoubtedly is in a certain sense, inasmuch as it is an engagement between the parties, for a service to be rendered by one of them, in consideration of a compensation to be yielded therefor by the other. But it wants one of the usual requisites of contracts, a reciprocal obligation in regard to the subject matter. On the one hand, the recruit is bound to serve during the full term of his enlistment; but on the other, the government is not bound to continue him in service for a single day, but may dismiss him at the very first moment, or at any subsequent period, whether with or without cause for so doing. It has moreover a feature not to be found in most contracts; namely, a power in one of the parties to compel specific performance from the other by the exercise of physical force. If the soldier desert, he may be recaptured and coerced to the discharge of his duty by corporal restraint and punishment. These important traits of the engagement result not so much from the specific terms of the compact, as from the relation in which it places the parties towards each other; a relation of authority and control on the one side, and of obedience and submission on the other. It resembles in some respects the relation of master and servant, of the strictest kind between individuals; to wit, the condition of apprenticeship, or other indented servitude. And having regard to the circumstance that the government is one of the parties, it bears perhaps a still closer resemblance to the relation arising out of an appointment to a post or place under the civil administration; though, from the nature of the service, involving a sterner and more despotic supremacy. In fact, the enlistment is an appointment by the government of an individual to the lowest grade of military service; differing only from the commission to an officer, by the inferior rank, emolument and duties, and the incapacity to retire by voluntary 631 resignation. It is commonly founded in compact, *but not necessarily so; for the government, as the administrative sovereign of the country, has an unquestionable right, in certain emergencies, to call the inhabitants capable of bearing arms into its military service, and, by some equitable rule, to select from the whole number those best adapted to the purpose; and this without regard to their consent.

Now it cannot be doubted that the government, like an individual, in regard to appointments to its service, may prescribe the requisite qualifications, and insist upon or waive them in its discretion; and that the person appointed or selected has no right to relieve himself from his engagement, by objecting his own want of qualification. And so it is equally clear, as the act may be done through the instrumentality of an agent, that if he should transcend or neglect the instructions of his principal in regard to qualification, the latter is not obliged to repudiate the transaction, but may sanction and confirm it without the concurrence of the other party to the engagement.

Let us now enquire how far these principles are applicable to the case before us. And this must depend upon the legislation of congress on the subject. The question may be considered as arising on the construction of the act of congress of the 16th of March 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States; for though there has been subsequent legislation on the subject, it has no material bearing upon the present case. The provisions of the 11th and 12th sections of that act are as follows:

"§ 11. That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in the recruiting service, to keep up by voluntary enlistment the corps as aforesaid, shall be entitled to receive for every effective, ablebodied citizen of the United States who shall be duly enlisted by him for the term of five years, and mustered, of at least five feet six inches high, and between the ages of eighteen 632 *and thirty-five years, the sum of two dollars: provided nevertheless that this regulation, so far as respects the height and age of the recruit, shall not extend to musicians, or to those soldiers who may reenlist into the service: and provided also that no person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent of his parent, guardian or master first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing which the person so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emoluments of such officer.

"§ 12. That there shall be allowed and paid to each effective, ablebodied citizen, recruited as aforesaid to serve for the term of five years, a bounty of twelve dollars; but the payment of six dollars of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered and have joined the corps in which he is to serve." Story's Laws U. S. p. 832.

These provisions, it will be seen, had a fourfold object: 1. To keep up the peace establishment of the army by voluntary enlistments. 2. To encourage recruiting, by a premium to the recruiting officer, and a bounty to the recruit. 3. To procure for the government recruits best adapted to the service, and protect it against inadequate selections. 4. To protect minors from their own improvident engagements. The protection to the government was afforded by the legislative instructions to the recruiting officer, and punishment for disobedience. The protection to the minor was extended in like manner, and still more effectually, by requiring the consent of his parent, guardian or master. No protection was furnished or contemplated for the adult recruit. None whatever was requisite 633 or proper. *His want of qualification is best known to himself, and his entering the service is a fraud upon both the government and its agent, if the defect be unknown to the latter; and if known, then it is an act of collusion with him to deceive and injure the principal. His conduct, instead of entitling him to protection, ought to subject him to punishment; and accordingly in the british recruiting service, by statute 10 Geo. 4, ch. 6, § 34; 7 Bac. Abr. by Dodd (London edi. of 1832) p. 379, title Soldiers, letter A. he is justly exposed to very severe penalties.

It will be seen that the qualifications prescribed by this act of congress, for the regulation of the recruiting officer, are, 1. That the recruit shall be effective and ablebodied; 2. That he shall be a citizen of the United States; 3. That he shall be at least five feet six inches high; 4. That he shall be between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years. These requisites were obviously designed for the benefit of the government, and in order to obtain recruits best fitted for the service. They are all placed on the same footing, without discrimination; all based upon the idea of qualification alone, all embraced in the same mandate, and all enforced by the same penalty. It is impossible to distinguish between the want of citizenship and the want of any other qualification; and if a recruit be entitled to his discharge because he is an alien, he would be equally entitled to it because only five feet five inches and eleven twelfths in height,* or thirty-five years and one day old. There is no better rule of interpretation than this, that "no statute shall be construed in such manner as to be inconvenient or against reason."

If a recruit were to claim exoneration from the service, on the ground that at the time of his enlistment he was under size, or under age, or infirm in body, would it 634 not be a sufficient *answer that the government, in its discretion, waived the objection, because he had since attained the requisite height or age, or had recovered, or would probably recover, from his disease; or because he possessed qualities which would more than compensate for his alleged deficiencies? And so if the plea be that of alienage, is it not enough to say that, though constrained to the admission that the native or naturalized citizen must be supposed to possess greater valour, higher intelligence and more approved fidelity than a mere stranger, yet there may be exceptions to the general rule; and that in the particular case the petitioner is a gallant and disciplined soldier, whose oath of fidelity when he took the bounty, and his long residence and connexions and interest in the country, furnish sufficient time, for the express purpose of enquiring whether any have been enlisted contrary to law or regulation; and if any be found to have been so enlisted, they are rejected, and the recruiting officer who may have enlisted them is mulcted in the amount of clothing which the discharged recruit may have received, to be deducted out of his pay. See articles 687, 713-719, 741. If it be said that the words of the 687th regulation are, "able-bodied citizens may be enlisted," the answer is that may, there, obviously means must; for that is its meaning whenever a positive duty is imposed, and not a mere discretionary power given. Minor and others v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 1 Peters 64. On the one hand, the recruit is bound to serve during the full term of his enlistment; but on the other, the government is not bound to continue him in service for a single day, but may dismiss him at the very first moment, or at any subsequent period, whether with or without cause for so doing. It has moreover a feature not to be found in most contracts; namely, a power in one of the parties to compel specific performance from the other by the exercise of physical force. If the soldier desert, he may be recaptured and coerced to the discharge of his duty by corporal restraint and punishment. These important traits of the engagement result not so much from the specific terms of the compact, as from the relation in which it places the parties towards each other; a relation of authority and control on the one side, and of obedience and submission on the other. It resembles in some respects the relation of master and servant, of the strictest kind between individuals; to wit, the condition of apprenticeship, or other indented servitude. And having regard to the circumstance that the government is one of the parties, it bears perhaps a still closer resemblance to the relation arising out of an appointment to a post or place under the civil administration; though, from the nature of the service, involving a sterner and more despotic supremacy. In fact, the enlistment is an appointment by the government of an individual to the lowest grade of military service; differing only from the commission to an officer, by the inferior rank, emolument and duties, and the incapacity to retire by voluntary 631 resignation. It is commonly founded in compact, *but not necessarily so; for the government, as the administrative sovereign of the country, has an unquestionable right, in certain emergencies, to call the inhabitants capable of bearing arms into its military service, and, by some equitable rule, to select from the whole number those best adapted to the purpose; and this without regard to their consent.

Now it cannot be doubted that the government, like an individual, in regard to appointments to its service, may prescribe the requisite qualifications, and insist upon or waive them in its discretion; and that the person appointed or selected has no right to relieve himself from his engagement, by objecting his own want of qualification. And so it is equally clear, as the act may be done through the instrumentality of an agent, that if he should transcend or neglect the instructions of his principal in regard to qualification, the latter is not obliged to repudiate the transaction, but may sanction and confirm it without the concurrence of the other party to the engagement.

Let us now enquire how far these principles are applicable to the case before us. And this must depend upon the legislation of congress on the subject. The question may be considered as arising on the construction of the act of congress of the 16th of March 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States; for though there has been subsequent legislation on the subject, it has no material bearing upon the present case. The provisions of the 11th and 12th sections of that act are as follows:

"§ 11. That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in the recruiting service, to keep up by voluntary enlistment the corps as aforesaid, shall be entitled to receive for every effective, able-bodied citizen of the United States who shall be duly enlisted by him for the term of five years, and mustered, of at least five feet six inches high, and between the ages of eighteen 632 and thirty-five years, the sum of two dollars: provided nevertheless that this regulation, so far as respects the height and age of the recruit, shall not extend to musicians, or to those soldiers who may reenlist into the service: and provided also that no person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent of his parent, guardian or master first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing which the person so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emoluments of such officer.

"§ 12. That there shall be allowed and paid to each effective, able-bodied citizen, recruited as aforesaid to serve for the term of five years, a bounty of twelve dollars; but the payment of six dollars of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered and have joined the corps in which he is to serve." Story's Laws U. S. p. 832.

These provisions, it will be seen, had a fourfold object: 1. To keep up the peace establishment of the army by voluntary enlistments. 2. To encourage recruiting, by a premium to the recruiting officer, and a bounty to the recruit. 3. To procure for the government recruits best adapted to the service, and protect it against inadequate selections. 4. To protect minors from their own improvident engagements. The protection to the government was afforded by the legislative instructions to the recruiting officer, and punishment for disobedience. The protection to the minor was extended in like manner, and still more effectually, by requiring the consent of his parent,

633 or proper. *His want of qualification is best known to himself, and his entering the service is a fraud upon both the government and its agent, if the defect be unknown to the latter; and if known, then it is an act of collusion with him to deceive and injure the principal. His conduct, instead of entitling him to protection, ought to subject him to punishment; and accordingly in the british recruiting service, by statute 10 Geo. 4, ch. 6, § 34; 7 Bac. Abr. by Dodd (London edi. of 1832) p. 379, title Soldiers, letter A. he is justly exposed to very severe penalties.

It will be seen that the qualifications prescribed by this act of congress, for the regulation of the recruiting officer, are, 1. That the recruit shall be effective and able-bodied; 2. That he shall be a citizen of the United States; 3. That he shall be at least five feet six inches high; 4. That he shall be between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years. These requisites were obviously designed for the benefit of the government, and in order to obtain recruits best fitted for the service. They are all placed on the same footing, without discrimination; all based upon the idea of qualification alone, all embraced in the same mandate, and all enforced by the same penalty. It is impossible to distinguish between the want of citizenship and the want of any other qualification; and if a recruit be entitled to his discharge because he is an alien, he would be equally entitled to it because only five feet five inches and eleven twelfths in height,* or thirty-five years and one day old. There is no better rule of interpretation than this, that "no statute shall be construed in such manner as to be inconvenient or against reason." If a recruit were to claim exoneration from the service, on the ground that at the time of his enlistment he was under size, or 634 under age, or infirm in body, would it not be a sufficient *answer that the government, in its discretion, waived the objection, because he had since attained the requisite height or age, or had recovered, or would probably recover, from his disease; or because he possessed qualities which would more than compensate for his alleged deficiencies? And so if the plea be that of alienage, is it not enough to say that, though constrained to the admission that the native or naturalized citizen must be supposed to possess greater valour, higher intelligence and more approved fidelity than a mere stranger, yet there may be exceptions to the general rule; and that in the particular case the petitioner is a gallant and disciplined soldier, whose oath of fidelity when he took the bounty, and his long residence and connexions and interest in the country, furnish sufficient security for the faithful discharge of his duties?

The law, in no part of it, is founded upon a supposed disability of the recruit to bind himself by his compact of enlistment. No such disability is recognized by the act even in regard to minors, but a mere protection granted to the immaturity of intellect, by requiring the consent of the parent, guardian or master. Without that qualified exemption, boys of any age would be subject to enlistment in the army, as they are in the navy, not only without but against the consent of their natural or legal protectors; for the national sovereignty, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, may overrule the municipal laws of the states in relation to the incapacity of infants. United States v. Bainbridge, 1 Mason's Rep. 71. An alien has no right, founded upon any principle either of municipal or international law, to claim exemption from the consequences of his own voluntary engagement, whether for military or any other service. No one supposes that he labours under a disability in this respect; for though, by such a stipulation, he may by possibility involve himself in difficulties in regard to his allegiance to his native sovereign, *that is a matter for his own consideration, and cannot affect the validity of his new obligation. If any authority were necessary for so self-evident a proposition, it would be found not only in the practice of employing foreign mercenaries, which has prevailed amongst civilized nations in all ages, but in the doctrine as laid down by the most approved writers. Vattel, book 1, ch. 19, § 213; 1 Black. Comm. 370.

The rules by which the courts refuse to enforce contracts that are contrary to law have no application to a case like this; for the contract of enlistment, if to be so called, is not obligatory upon the government, under any circumstances, and cannot, as has been shewn, be the less obligatory upon the recruit because he does not possess the requisite qualifications. The act of congress does not in that event declare the enlistment to be void, or exclude the recruit from the service, but merely subjects the recruiting officer to punishment for his disregard of the legislative instructions. That the legal prohibition amounts to nothing more than this, is obvious from the consideration that the penalty is founded exclusively upon the actual misconduct of the officer; for though its letter is broad, its spirit surely would not reach beyond the case of wilful disobedience or culpable negligence; and such is the practical interpretation given to it by the war department. Army Regulations of 1841, p. 126, 127. Now it would be a new principle to establish, that the misconduct of a public officer in the performance of an official act shall avoid the transaction, against the consent of the party aggrieved, and for the sole benefit of another party in no wise prejudiced: and it would be still more strange, if the act prohibited to the officer has been procured without his connivance or default, by the fraud of the party complaining.

In what has been said, I have regarded the law of congress as designed to regulate the recruiting service *with a view to the qualifications of recruits, and not by such weighty considerations as a fear for the public safety, or a jealousy of executive power. If in the legislative mind the republic would be endangered by the foreign nativity or the debility of enlisted soldiers, a policy so grave would have been marked by decisive enactments, and not exhausted in petty penalties upon a subaltern officer. It is moreover remarkable, in reference to unnaturalized inhabitants, that, by a fluctuating legislation, the policy of employing them has varied, not according to the hazard but the utility of their military services; for the authority to enlist them has been given to the recruiting officer in times of greatest peril, and withheld in those of greatest security. Thus by the acts of 1802, 1808, and 1815, he is directed to enlist able-bodied citizens; but by the acts of 1811, 1812, 1813, and 1814, the direction is to enlist able-bodied men. 2 Story's Laws U. S. p. 832, 1089, 1510, 1205, 1285, 1433. And in another branch of the public defence of not less importance, and deeper solicitude to the nation, aliens are habitually and lawfully employed on that perilous field of her glory where the treacherous mercenary may find fit allies in the treacherous winds and waves. The act of congress of the 3d of March 1813, "for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," 2 Story's Laws U. S. p. 1302, throws light upon the present subject in two points of view; for in the first place it expressly declares, that after the termination of the then existing war with Great Britain, the employment of aliens on board all such vessels shall be unlawful, and adopts the most decisive and vigorous measures, both precautionary and vindictory, to prevent it; and then provides that the provisions of the act shall have no operation with respect to the subjects of any foreign nation which shall not, by treaty or special convention with the government of the United States, *have prohibited the employment of native citizens of the United States on board of her public or private vessels. This act thus indicates, on the one hand, that where a policy of utter and unqualified exclusion from the service exists, it is not left by congress to a vague, indirect and doubtful implication; and on the other, that such a policy is never dictated by a puerile jealousy or a petty apprehension of danger.

A case like the present may, I think, be safely left to executive discretion in the discharge of the constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; inasmuch as the exercise of that discretion in the one way or the other can be no encroachment upon the legislative power; for as the war department may dismiss a recruit without cause shewn, so it is no good cause for his dismissal that he has practised an imposition upon the government in regard to his qualification. This construction of the statute is, I think, in the true spirit of the law; while the opposite would open the door widely to the vilest frauds upon the public service. It is proper however to say, in justice to the petitioner, that the record of this case furnishes no evidence of his having practised a fraud upon the recruiting officer.

I have considered the case as standing upon the footing of an original enlistment; inasmuch as it does not appear from the record, that the petitioner's reenlistment was into the company or regiment to which he belonged at or about that time. If such were the fact, there could not be even a plausible objection on his part to the validity of his engagement; because the acts of congress of the 2d of March 1833 and the 5th of July 1838 give a bounty to "every ablebodied noncommissioned officer, musician or private soldier, who may reenlist into his company or regiment within two months before or one month after the expiration of his term of service;" thus dispensing with all other qualifications.

638 *Sess. Acts of 1832-3, p. 72, § 3, and of 1837-8, p. 105, § 29. Whether the irregularity of reenlisting into a different company or regiment would affect the question of qualification, I deem it unnecessary to consider: my impression is that it would not. However that may be, these acts serve to confirm the conviction, that in the legislation of congress on this subject, citizenship has never been regarded in any other light than as a mere qualification.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and the appellee remanded to the service.

The other judges concurring, the judgment of the circuit court was accordingly reversed, and judgment entered declaring that the defendant was lawfully detained in custody, and remanding him into the service of the United States according to the terms of his enlistment.

Note by the reporter.—The supreme court of New York made a similar decision at May term 1848. The decision, so far, has only been made known through the newspapers. It will no doubt be found hereafter in the regular reports of the decisions at that term.

(Absent BROOKE and ALLEN, J.)

Slaves—Suit to Protect Future Right to Freedom.—A testatrix domiciled in the district of Columbia bequeaths a negro to a legatee, to serve him 27 years, and then be free. The legatee sells the negro for that period, and takes from the purchaser a bond conditioned that he will not sell the negro for a longer time. The negro is brought into Virginia by the purchaser, with the purpose of carrying him through this state to a city or state farther south. On a bill in the name of the negro, an injunction is awarded by a judge in Virginia, to prevent his being carried out of the commonwealth until farther order. The purchaser, by his answer, denies that he has attempted to sell the negro for a longer period than the 27 years, and denies that he has designed, or does design, to do any act to prevent him from enjoying his liberty at the end of that time. The evidence in support of the bill only shews that the purchaser was engaged in the business of purchasing and selling slaves. HELD, as it does not appear by the evidence that the contemplated removal of the negro beyond the limits of this commonwealth was with intent to defeat his right to freedom when the same should accrue, or upon any claim to hold or sell him as a slave beyond that period, the injunction must be dissolved, and the negro restored to the purchaser's possession.

On the 19th of November 1839, a bill was presented to the judge of the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, in the name of Manuel sometimes called Manuel Dodson, setting forth, that he was late the slave and property of Elizabeth Magruder of Washington county in the district of Columbia, who, by her will bearing date the 7th of March 1827, and proved and recorded on the 13th of July 1827 in the orphans court of said county, bequeathed as follows: "I will and bequeath to my niece Elizabeth Hamilton my negro boy

640 Manuel Dodson, to serve for 27 years, and my negro woman *Mary Dodson, to serve for 15 years, and at the expiration of the term of service of each, the said negroes shall be free. It is my understanding that the term of service of all the slaves above named shall commence at the period of my death. It is my desire that George Watterston shall be, and I do hereby constitute and appoint him, the executor of this my last will and testament." That, shortly after the death of the testatrix, he passed into the possession of dr. Charles Hamilton, the husband of said Elizabeth Hamilton, and remained in his possession till on or about the 18th of October 1839, when he was placed in the jail of Washington city by said Hamilton, for the purpose of selling him. That Hamilton admitted at the time, that he had the right to retain him in servitude only for about 14 years, being the remainder of the term of 27 years in said will mentioned, and had previously assured him, at his request, that he should be sold to some person residing in the city of Washington. That on the 14th inst. (November 1839) the complainant was removed from the said jail to the jail of one Thomas Williams, a trader in slaves; and Williams stated, in reply to the complainant's enquiries as to his destination, that he (Williams) intended to remove him to his farm in Virginia, a short distance down the Potomac. That after Williams had handcuffed him and taken him on board the steamboat, he asked Williams whether he was not free, and Williams answered that the will had been done away by act of congress, and that he had bought him for life. That Williams proceeded to convey him to the town of Fredericksburg, and thence to the city of Richmond, where he is now confined in the private jail of one Bacon Tait. That Williams has avowed his intention of transporting him to Charleston, S. C., or to some other foreign parts unknown to him; by which he will be deprived of every opportunity of estab-

641 be doomed to slavery for the rest *of his life. The bill made Williams and Tait defendants, and prayed that they be enjoined from selling, transporting or conveying the complainant without the jurisdiction of the court, till the matters of complaint set forth in the bill can be heard; that the complainant be allowed to sue in forma pauperis; that counsel be assigned him, and that he be allowed the protection and aid of the court to enable him to assert his right to freedom, and be placed in the hands of the sheriff of Henrico till the final order of the court.

The bill was verified by the affidavit of the complainant, and by an extract from the will of Elizabeth Magruder, made by an attorney at law in Washington; and it was accompanied by the certificate of counsel practising in the circuit court of Henrico and Richmond, that in his opinion the complainant had just cause to apply to a court of equity for protection and relief.

Judge Nicholas awarded an injunction agreeably to the prayer of the bill, and ordered that unless the defendants, or one of them, should enter into bond with sufficient security in the penalty of 1500 dollars, to have the negro forthcoming to answer the decree of the court, the officer to whose hands the process might come should take possession of him, and safely keep him until the further order of the court.

The process was served the 19th of November 1839, by the sheriff of Henrico, on Tait, who refusing to give the bond required by the order, the sheriff took possession of the negro and committed him to jail.

On the first of January 1840, when a term commenced, the court made an order directing the sheriff of Henrico to hire out the plaintiff for the year, and thereafter from year to year until the further order of the court, taking from the hirer bond with good security for the payment of the hire, and for the return of the plaintiff well clothed at the expiration of the term

642 for *which he might be hired, unless he should be lost without the default of the hirer.

As to the defendant Tait, the bill was taken for confessed. At August rules 1840, Williams appeared and filed his answer. He exhibited with his answer a copy of the will of Elizabeth Magruder, containing the clauses mentioned in the bill; and a bill of sale dated the 24th of October 1839, from C. B. Hamilton, purporting that Hamilton, in consideration of the sum of 262 dollars 50 cents, sold to Williams "a negro man by name Manuel Dobson, to serve as a slave until the 19th of June 1854, and then to be set free at the cost and proper charges of him the said Thomas Williams." He also exhibited a copy of a bond executed on the same day by him to Hamilton, in the penalty of 500 dollars, with a condition that if Williams shall not sell or keep the said negro man for a longer period than that after mentioned, viz. after the 19th of June 1854, then the obligation is to be void. And the answer, after referring to these exhibits, proceeded as follows: "This respondent denies that he has attempted to sell the slave for a longer period than that for which he holds and has a right to sell him, as already shewn; and this respondent also denies that he has heretofore designed, or does now design, to sell the said slave as a slave for life, or to do any act to deprive him of the means of enjoying his liberty when entitled to it. And this respondent insists that this court, as he is advised, has no lawful right or authority to restrain him in the exercise of his right to carry his slave to any part of the United States, or to sell him as a slave for the term before indicated."

Depositions were taken on behalf of the plaintiff, to prove that Williams was engaged in the business of purchasing and selling slaves; and one of the witnesses deposed that when Williams was in Richmond in the fall of 1839, he told him he was on his way to New Orleans.

643. *On the 11th of August 1840, a motion by Williams to dissolve the injunction was rejected.

The cause was regularly set for hearing, but did not come on until after the passage of the act of March 13, 1841, providing an additional judge to exercise the chancery jurisdiction that belonged to the circuit superior court of Henrico and Richmond. Sess. Acts 1840-41, p. 65, ch. 48.

On the 30th of April 1841, the cause came on to be heard before judge Robinson, who was appointed under the aforesaid act. It appearing that no formal order had been theretofore made allowing the plaintiff to sue in forma pauperis or assigning him counsel, (though such permission was reasonably to be inferred from the fact that the bill had been entertained, and from the former orders entered in the cause) the court thereupon assigned Herbert A. Claiborne senior and Herbert A. Claiborne junior counsel for the plaintiff, to conduct the suit on his behalf, and decreed that the defendant Williams should not be permitted to take the plaintiff into his possession, until he the said defendant should have given bond to the commonwealth of Virginia, with good security, in the penalty of 1500 dollars, with condition to be void if he should have the said plaintiff forthcoming, and produce him to the court, or to the sheriff of the county of Henrico, on the 19th of June 1854; the said bond and security to be approved by the clerk of the court. The decree provided that the plaintiff was first to give security, by bond with good surety, approved in like manner, conditioned that he the said plaintiff should continue faithfully in the service of the said Thomas Williams, or of any person to whom the said Williams might sell him in this state or in the district of Columbia, until the said 19th of June 1854. And upon the said bonds being given and approved as aforesaid, and filed in the clerk's office, the said plaintiff was to be delivered 644 up to the defendant on demand. *The court further decreed that the sheriff of Henrico continue to hire out the plaintiff until the conditions aforesaid should be complied with, and that the said sheriff apply the proceeds of hire which might accrue, to the discharge of such jail fees as might have been incurred by the plaintiff while in confinement in the jail of the county of Henrico; that in the next place the sheriff, out of the same fund, pay and satisfy all the costs and charges which might have been incurred by the plaintiff in the prosecution of this suit; and that he pay the balance, if any, to the defendant Williams, when he should have complied with the said requisitions. And the cause was retained for further proceedings, with liberty to either party to apply from time to time for such other or further orders as they might be advised were necessary or proper.

From this decree an appeal was allowed, on the petition of the defendant Williams.

Lyons for appellant. The appellee is now, and will be until 1854, as much the slave of the appellant as if he were a slave for life. Being a slave, he can have no right to sue his master in the courts of Virginia.

The circuit court has not only taken jurisdiction of the suit, but, without the least evidence to sustain the allegation that the appellant intended to sell the appellee for a longer period than 1854, it has required the appellant to give bond and security for the production of the appellee before the court on the 19th of June 1854. The record shews that a bond for protecting the appellee's future right of freedom was entered into in Maryland; and according to the bill, the appellant was passing through the state of Virginia with the appellee, on his way to Charleston in South Carolina. Now if the jurisdiction of our tribunals was not ousted by the action in Maryland, neither would the jurisdiction of the courts of North and South Carolina, or of the courts 645 *of any state through which the appellant might pass with the appellee in his possession, be taken away by the action of the circuit court here; in each and every state a similar bond might be required. Who is to sue upon such bond, and take the benefit of it in case of forfeiture? Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173, and Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72, shew that no contract between master and slave, however clear and positive, and even though performed by the slave, can be a ground of action against the master. The bond here, it is true, is to be taken to the commonwealth. But if the slave cannot sue upon a contract with his master, neither can he be the relator; and there is no other person who can have any interest in the matter. Besides, if, after the expiration of the period of servitude, the appellee should be alive and capable of suing, these facts would prove that the appellant had not deprived him of his right to freedom. Again, the bond of the appellant will bind him absolutely to produce the appellee to the circuit court on the 19th of June 1854. The act of God (as the death of the slave) or the act of the enemy (as deportation) might save the penalty of the bond: but suppose the appellee should run away or be stolen from the appellant within the period of servitude, without the consent or knowledge of the appellant, and the fact should not be capable of being proved (which might well happen); or that the appellee should be seized and sold under execution for a debt of the appellant, and removed out of his reach by the purchaser; would not the bond be forfeited by the appellant's failure to produce the appellee? And upon such forfeiture, to whom is the penalty to enure? Can the commonwealth of Virginia take the benefit of it?

The order of the circuit court further directs, that on the appellant's failure to give the bond required, the appellee shall be hired out, and the hire (or so much as 646 may be necessary) applied to pay the expenses of *this proceeding by the slave against the master. The decree could not be sustained, though there were no other objection to it but this.

H. A. Claiborne jr. for the appellee, referred to the cases cited in 2 Rob. Pract. 227, as to the right of a remainderman of personal property to require security from the tenant for life, for the preservation of the property, and its production when the period of enjoyment should arrive; and to the opinion of chancellor Taylor in Mortimer v. Moffatt & wife, 4 Hen. & Munf. 503. He also cited and relied upon the recent case of Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Leigh 616.

He called the attention of the court to the fact, that the order of the circuit court required the appellee to give bond and security, conditioned for his continuing faithfully to serve the appellant, until the expiration of his period of servitude. And he said, that as to hardship in the requisition of bond and security, it was obviously much greater on the appellee, a friendless slave, than on the appellant.

Lyons in reply. The power of the court to protect the rights of the remainderman is exercised by analogy to its jurisdiction in cases of waste of real estate. Such rights in personalty are always capable of being measured by a pecuniary equivalent, and are therefore sufficiently protected by personal security for the forthcoming of the property; which security, in case of failure to have the specific property forthcoming at the period designated, enures to indemnify the remainderman by affording him an equivalent in damages. Further, if a chattel be removed from the jurisdiction, it is thereby placed beyond the reach and power of the remainderman; there is a separation between him and his property, and he is consequently exposed to the danger of losing it. A title to freedom in 647 futuro is *analogous in none of these respects to a remainder in property. Its value cannot be measured by a pecuniary equivalent: if it could be so measured, still the equivalent would in no shape enure to the benefit of the injured party: and though removed from the state, the party will be capable, as soon as his right to freedom accrues, of asserting and protecting it as well in one part of the United States as in another; the property and the proprietor being in such case one and indivisible.

Adverting to the case of Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Leigh 616, he pointed out the difference between the terms of the will in that case, and the terms of the will in this; and also remarked that there the suit was brought, not by the infants themselves, who were slaves in præ-senti, but by their mother, who was a free woman.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the resolution of the court:

The court, without deciding what relief (if any) the appellee would be entitled to upon the case made by his bill, if sustained by sufficient proofs, is of opinion, that it does not appear from the evidence in the cause, that the contemplated removal by the appellant of the appellee beyond the limits of the commonwealth, was with intent to defeat the appellee's right to freedom when the same shall accrue, or upon any claim to hold or sell him as a slave beyond that period: The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dissolve the injunction, restore the appellee to the possession of the appellant or his agent, and, after disposing of the subject of hires, with the proper deductions for costs and charges, to dismiss the bill.

The deed was only executed by the grantor, and upon his acknowledgment was admitted to record. Two of the trustees expressly declined to act. On the 26th of November 1827, another deed was made by the same grantor to the two other trustees, conveying all the slaves mentioned in the deed of August 1827, as well as some others, and also the crop of tobacco, to secure to a party money advanced by him to pay off executions which had been levied upon the slave property mentioned in the first deed, one of which executions was for a debt due to a client, of greater amount than the value of the tobacco crop. The proceeds of the property conveyed by this deed are applied according to its provisions. It does not appear that the deed of August 1827 was made on previous consultation with, or received the subsequent ratification of, the creditors or trustees named therein, or that any claim was asserted under it until October 1832; when a bill is filed by a party not named in that deed, and, for aught that appears, not known until then as one embraced by the description of client creditor, asking a decree against the cestui que trust in the deed of November 1827 for the value of the tobacco crop. HELD that the plaintiff has no title to the relief sought.—Per STANFORD, J. The deed of August 1827, being, when the deed of November 1827 was made, without the sanction of assent or ratification, could not in that predicament be any shield of the property against the levy of executions of creditors, nor any effectual impediment to the bona fide conveyance of the property by the grantor for valuable consideration.

Alimony†—Party to Suit—Husband.—A suit for alimony being brought by a wife against her husband, who has deserted her and left the commonwealth, and a sum of money being obtained for her by her attorney at law by a compromise of that suit, HELD that on a bill in equity, 649 in the name *of the feme by her next friend, against the attorney for the money so obtained by him, a decree may be rendered for the same, although the husband be no party to the suit.

ence to the principal case, said: "In that case there were two deeds of trust, the first not appearing to have been made with the knowledge of, or to have been ratified by, any creditor or trustee named therein; and under which no claim was asserted until the execution of the second deed, and the application of the proceeds thereunder; and then the claim was asserted by a creditor not named in the deed, or known to be a creditor. It was held that such creditor was not entitled to relief against the cestui que trust in the last deed. The refusal of relief under such circumstances does not decide that a deed made without consultation with creditors, is for that reason fraudulent. Before any right or claim under the first deed was known or asserted, the property had been conveyed, and the proceeds applied to a fair creditor, against whom, under the circumstances, there was no just cause of reclamation."

Costs*—Liability of Feme and Next Friend for.—In a suit brought in the name of a feme by her next friend, a decree in her favour being reversed, and the bill ordered to be dismissed as to the appellant, he will recover his costs, both in the appellate court and the court below, as well against the next friend as against the feme.

Same—Successive Liability for Costs.—Case in which a bill against two defendants being dismissed as to one, the costs decreed to be paid to him by the plaintiff, were decreed to be paid to the plaintiff by the other defendant.

On the 25th of August 1827, a deed was made purporting to be between Daniel A. Wilson of the first part, George Booker, William M. Thornton, William F. Randolph and Samuel C. Anderson of the second part, and John V. Wilcox, William R. Johnson, John W. Nash, John Hughes and Allen Wilson of the third part, whereby, after reciting that the said Daniel A. Wilson was indebted to Wilcox by bond and to Johnson by bond, that Nash, Hughes and Allen Wilson stood bound as sureties for him in another bond, and that Allen Wilson was his endorser on a note, it was witnessed that the said Daniel A. Wilson conveyed unto Booker, Thornton, Randolph and Anderson, the tract of land in Cumberland on which he then resided, and sundry slaves and other personal property. Then came the following clause: "also my growing crop of tobacco and corn, subject to the deduction of the overseer's part, and subject to such disposition as the said Booker, Thornton, Randolph and Anderson may find it necessary to make of the said crop for the payment of any money due from me to the clients for whom I may have collected money, which moneys is to be first paid out of my part of said growing crop." The habendum was to Booker, Thornton, Randolph and Anderson, of the "land and premises with its appurtenances, rents, profits, growing crops (with the reservations aforesaid) and future crops, together with the aforesaid slaves with the 650 future increase of the *females of the same, and all other personal property hereby conveyed." And the conveyance was declared to be upon trust that Booker, Thornton, Randolph and Anderson should permit the said Daniel A. Wilson to remain in possession of the property, applying the crops of each year to the payment of the debts secured or intended to be secured by the deed, "except so much as may be necessary for the support of the family and support of the plantation and payment of overseer, until the creditors and securities aforesaid, or some one of them, shall require;" and then upon trust that they, or any one or more of them, should advertise the land and premises, crop on hand at the time, slaves with their increase, stock with its increase, and other personal property, and sell the same for cash, and out of the proceeds arising from the sale, first pay the expenses of executing the trust, next pay the debts mentioned in the recital of the deed, in a certain prescribed order, and then pay the balance to the said Daniel A. Wilson. This deed was executed only by Daniel A. Wilson. On the 27th of August 1827, it was acknowledged by him in the court of Cumberland county, and admitted to record.

In October 1827, sundry executions against Daniel A. Wilson were delivered to the sheriff of Cumberland county; to wit, a fi. fa. in favour of P. T. Southall, a fi. fa. in favour of Thornton & Carrington, a venditioni exponas in favour of Miller & Andrew, and a fi. fa. in favour of Langhorne & Scruggs. And there seem to have been others in favour of George Booker and of Cather. The greater part, if not the whole of the slave property mentioned in the deed of August 1827, was levied upon under these executions. William B. Hobson, the deputy sheriff of Cumberland, deposed (in the suit herein after mentioned) that he levied the executions, and considered the property subject to them as amply property levied on *was not sold, in consequence of an arrangement entered into between dr. John Spencer and Daniel A. Wilson, whereby Spencer assumed the payment of them all himself. Several of the executions were returned with endorsements by the creditors, shewing that they were satisfied; and some of the endorsements stated that they were satisfied by Spencer's executing his bonds to the execution creditors.

On the 26th of November 1827, a deed was made between Daniel A. Wilson of the first part, William M. Thornton and Samuel C. Anderson of the second part, and dr. John Spencer of the third part, whereby, after reciting that Wilson was indebted to Spencer in the sum of 4203 dollars 9 cents, due on demand, by bond of that date, Wilson conveyed to Thornton and Anderson sundry slaves (being all those mentioned in the deed of August 1827, as well as some others) "and also the crop of tobacco which the said Wilson now has on hand, being the crop of the present year," upon trust that Thornton and Anderson, when required by Spencer, should sell the slaves, or so many as would, with the then proceeds of the crop of tobacco, be sufficient to pay the costs of carrying the deed into effect and to discharge the debt and interest, upon such a credit as would make the proceeds payable on the 25th of December 1828. This deed was executed by Wilson and Spencer, and on the day of its date was acknowledged by Wilson in the court of Cumberland county and admitted to record.

On the 25th of October 1823, Nancy Ford, by James Muse her next friend, commenced a suit in chancery in the circuit court of Cumberland, against the parties to this deed. The bill set forth, that in the year — she employed Daniel A. Wilson, as an attorney at law, to prosecute a suit in her behalf in the county court of Cumberland, against her husband Hezekiah Ford of the state of Alabama, for alimony. That such proceedings were adopted by Wilson, that he obtained 652 for her (by compromise, *as she is informed) the sum of 1000 dollars, the whole of which he, as her attorney, received. That, of the 1000 dollars, he accounted to her only for 250 dollars, leaving the balance of 750 dollars still due. That the matter thus remained until some time in the year 1827, when Wilson, finding himself ruinously involved, and desiring to secure to his clients all money he had collected for them as an attorney and had not paid over to them, made the deed of the 25th of August 1827, whereby he conveyed his then growing crop of tobacco and corn, deducting the overseer's part, in trust for the express and exclusive purpose of paying to clients any money which he had collected for them and had not paid over to them. That the complainant is informed and believes, and therefore charges, that her own debt of 750 dollars was the only one standing in that condition, and not otherwise secured; and consequently the crops aforesaid, with the reservation aforesaid, were in fact and in truth conveyed by the deed aforesaid for her exclusive advantage and benefit. That Booker and Randolph expressly declined to act as trustees in the execution of the deed; and before Thornton and Anderson were required to execute it, Wilson, combining and confederating with Spencer to injure and defraud the complainant and to deprive her of the security aforesaid, made the deed of the 26th of November 1827, whereby he conveyed to the said Thornton and Anderson a large amount of other property, together with the crop of tobacco aforesaid, for the payment of a large debt due Spencer from Wilson. That the crops of corn and tobacco were matured, and the complainant does not know what became of the corn; but she charges that by arrangement between Wilson and Spencer, without the knowledge of the complainant or of Thornton and Anderson, the crop of tobacco was shipped to Richmond, and the proceeds, amounting to about 600 dollars, were received by 653 Spencer under colour of *his deed, and applied by him in satisfaction of his debt, in violation of the complainant's rights. The bill prayed that Spencer might be compelled to pay over to the complainant the sum of 600 dollars, with interest, in part satisfaction of her debt, and that Wilson might be required to pay her the balance.

The answer of Spencer stated, that in 1827 Wilson applied to him and others hereinafter named, to aid him in procuring from Archer Taylor of Richmond an advancement of money upon the faith of his (Wilson's) then crop of tobacco, in order to discharge executions, then in the hands of the sheriff of Cumberland, in favour of George Booker and Miller & Andrew against Wilson. That the respondent and William M. Thornton, Allen Wilson and John W.

Wilson, (the persons alluded to above,) consented to aid the said Daniel A. Wilson, and did procure from the said Taylor an advancement of 700 dollars upon the faith of the said crop of tobacco. That afterwards the respondent consented to become liable for the whole of the executions then in the hands of the sheriff of Cumberland against Wilson, upon condition that the money to be received from Taylor should be applied as aforesaid, and that Wilson should give respondent a deed of trust on the property on which the executions had been levied, and include in the deed a debt of 600 dollars due to the respondent from Wilson, and that the property so conveyed should be sold on a credit till the 25th of December 1828. That the respondent did not receive the sum of 700 dollars advanced by Taylor, but the same came to the hands of Thornton, and was by him paid to Booker and Miller & Andrew, in discharge of their executions.* That the only reason why the crop of tobacco was included in the deed of trust was, that it was alleged to be worth more than the 700 dollars, 654 *and it was intended the balance should be appropriated, as directed by the deed, in discharge of the debt therein specified. That Taylor received from the crop of tobacco, after deducting expenses, only the sum of 558 dollars 20 cents, which was applied to the credit of the 700 dollars advanced by him. That the debt due to Cather and paid by respondent, amounting to 1339 dollars 5 cents, was money which Wilson in his character of attorney had received for Cather, as respondent has heard and believes; and that the sum of about 60 dollars, part of the debt due to respondent, was also of that character. The respondent further states that the whole of the transactions between Wilson and him were without any notice of the complainant's claim. He requires from the complainant full proof of her debt, and that it belongs to the class described in the deed of the 25th of August 1827 under the general denomination of clients' debts. If it shall be found to belong to that class, he states that he has heard, and therefore charges, that Wilson, by agreement with the plaintiff, was to have a third or a fourth of whatever he received. He states that the whole of the property conveyed by the deed of November 1827 has been disposed of, and leaves due and unpaid a large balance of his debt, to wit, 900 dollars or thereabouts; and that the avails of the crop of tobacco were disposed of long before he had any notice of the plaintiff's claim. He objects to the claim of the complainant, that there is no evidence accompanying the deed of the 25th of August 1827, that she accepted it, and consented to abide by its stipulations. And he insists that the said deed created no lien whatever upon the tobacco in favour of that class of claims described in said deed as clients' debts.

*The sum of 4208 dollars 9 cents appeared to include the amount of the executions of Booker and Miller & Andrew, as well as the others, and also the 600 dollars.—Note in Original Edition.

As to all the defendants except Spencer, the bill was taken for confessed.

655 *Wilson, whose deposition was taken by leave of court, proved that he commenced suit for mrs. Ford, and made a compromise under which he received 1000 dollars, which was subject to an abatement of one fourth for his interest, according to the understanding when he was employed. He stated that he considered the amount thus due from him, to be due to her as a client, and intended to provide for its payment in that clause of the deed of August 1827, in which he mentioned his crop of tobacco as at the disposition of the trustees for the payment of any money due from him to clients. The debt to Cather as surviving partner was, he said, also a debt originally due to Lynch & Cather as clients. He was unable to say what was the number of barrels of corn made from the crop growing on the plantation in August 1827, nor how much was consumed upon the plantation, nor to whom it was sold.

An order was made directing the defendants Thornton and Anderson to render before a commissioner an account of the funds that might have come to their hands under the deed of November 1827.

The record contained an account in these words: "Dr. John Spencer in account with William M. Thornton and Samuel C. Anderson, trustees for Daniel A. Wilson. 1828, Dec'r 25. To cash paid dr. John Spencer, on account of Daniel A. Wilson's bond secured in the deed of trust dated 26th November 1827, by the sale of the property contained in the said deed, with the exception of the crop of tobacco, $2957." Accompanying this account was a report of the commissioner, stating that he had been furnished with this item as the amount of money paid Spencer by the trustees in the deed of November 1827, from the proceeds of all the property therein contained, "except the crop of tobacco, which the said Spencer sold, and received the money arising therefrom himself."

656 *On the 16th of November 1835, the cause was heard. The entry was, that it came on to be heard on the bill, answer of the defendant Spencer, the exhibits filed, and depositions of witnesses, (not mentioning the report of the commissioner). And the decree was, that Spencer pay to the plaintiff 500 dollars, with interest from the 25th of August 1827 till paid, and her costs of suit.

From this decree, on the petition of Spencer, an appeal was allowed.

G. N. Johnson for appellant. I. The plaintiff, a married woman, could not maintain this suit; at least not without making her husband a party. The husband is a necessary party in every case in which the wife sues, whether at law or in equity. 2 Roper on Property 268, 9; 1 Fonb. Eq. 100, note p.; Bingham on Infancy and Coverture 262; Bogget v. Frier &c., 11 East 301. Nor does the absence of the husband from the commonwealth make any difference. Commonwealth v. Cullins, 1 Mass. Rep. 116. He may still be made a party.

II. There is no proof whatever to charge the appellant with the proceeds of the tobacco. The report of the commissioner is no proof, because what is said by the commissioner on that subject was not required by the order of reference, and because the case was not heard upon the report.

III. The appellant had no notice of the plaintiff's claim, and therefore could not be charged with her equity.

IV. The trustees may have had a discretion to apply the growing crop to pay the plaintiff or other clients. But if they had such discretion, it was not exercised: and then the crop was subject to the debts specified, or to the power of Wilson; and in either predicament the plaintiff had no right. Wilson might at least be dealt with in respect to the crop for the purpose of satisfying the debt due from him to his client Cather.

657 *V. If any decree could have been made in favour of the plaintiff, it could only have been for a ratable proportion of the net proceeds of the tobacco, regarding her and Cather as incumbrances upon the subject.

VI. No decree could have been made in favour of the plaintiff, until the trustees under the deed of August 1827 had been called upon to account for the corn crop; nor until a report of all liens in favour of clients had been made.

Taylor for appellee. I. If there can be any case in which the husband need not be a party to a suit brought by the wife for her separate property, this must be deemed such a case; for here the subject of the suit had been previously recovered from the husband. There is no conceivable object to be attained by making him a party. The husband too is not within the commonwealth. Story's Eq. Pl. p. 64, ch. 3, § 63.

II. The court must intend that the cause was heard in the court below on the report. The account was deemed necessary, and was directed; and it must be intended that as an account was required, and there is a report in the record, that report was acted on by the court when the final decree was rendered.

III. The deed of August 1827 subjected the growing crops of tobacco and corn to client creditors: it is good as a security for such creditors, though they be not specially named.

IV. Spencer, in withdrawing the property from the sheriff, and providing payment of the executions, took a fund proved to be sufficient to pay the executions without the tobacco, and he must abide the consequences of the subsequent inadequacy of the property.

V. The appellant, having received the proceeds of the tobacco, ought to account to the appellee for the whole amount thereof. But for his intervention, the execution of Cather would have been satisfied without *the tobacco; and he has no equity, therefore, in respect to Cather's claim, which entitles him to a ratable share of the proceeds of the tobacco.

VI. Nothing seems to be known of the corn crop by any of the parties, and the case should be disposed of as though it had not existed. It is manifest that an order directing an account of it would prove abortive.

G. N. Johnson in reply. The husband cannot be dispensed with as a party by suggesting and shewing that he has no interest. That cannot be properly shewn in a case in which he is no party and is not heard. Bingh. on Infancy and Coverture 260. Notwithstanding what appears in this case, there might be other facts which, coupled with what appears, might shew the husband to be entitled to the money due from Wilson.

Of the act of the commissioner in making the report, no notice appears to have been given to Spencer.

The claim is under the deed of August 1827, and yet neither the trustees nor the cestuis que trust in that deed are made parties, nor any account of the trust claimed. The only notice chargeable to Spencer is notice of that deed; but this involves no notice of the claim of the appellee.

The power reserved to Wilson by that deed over the property and crops necessarily gave him the administration of the crops.

There is no proof that the property levied on was sufficient to pay the execution debts. We have nothing but the conjecture of the deputy sheriff, and this is rebutted by the actual sales. If there was such proof, Spencer is in nowise responsible for the loss.

If the appellee be entitled to any decree, it is against Wilson only.

STANARD, J. Many objections have been urged against the decree. The greater part of them considered *in themselves, though well founded, would, while they require the reversal of the decree, make it proper to remand the case for further proceedings. If there be an objection reaching the title of the appellee to any relief against the appellant, it will be unnecessary to consider any order.

It does not appear that the deed of August 1827 was made on previous consultation with, or received the subsequent ratification of, any of the creditors or trustees named therein, or that any claim was asserted under it from its date until the claim asserted by this suit in October 1832, by a party not named in the deed, and, for aught that appears, not known until then as one embraced by the description of client creditor. In November 1827, when the deed was made conveying the crop of tobacco, among other property, to Thornton and Anderson in trust for the benefit of the appellant, the deed of August was without the sanction of such previous assent or subsequent ratification; and in that predicament it could be no shield of the property against the levy of executions of the creditors named therein, or other creditors, nor any effectual impediment to the bona fide conveyance by the grantor for valuable consideration.* In this view, the title under the deed of November 1827, which was such a conveyance, was paramount the claim asserted for the first time in 1832, under the hitherto dormant and inoperative conveyance of August 1827. But again, assume *that the deed of August 1827 was assented to by the trustees Thornton and Anderson: they, having the legal title, have by the deed of November 1827 dedicated this crop of tobacco to the payment of Spencer's claim, without any notice to Spencer at least, and probably without any knowledge on their part, or the existence of the claim of the appellee; and the appellee, even if Thornton and Anderson could be made chargeable with this misapplication, could have no equity to pursue the fund into the hands of Spencer, who in law and equity is entitled to retain what he has fairly obtained. And furthermore, as he held the claim of a client creditor to a larger amount than the fund, if the deed of August had been fully accepted and acted under by the trustees, and the said trustees, under the discretion given by the reservation in that deed, had (though the deed of November had not been made) applied the fund to Cather's claim, in ignorance of the existence of that of the appellee, no effectual reclamation could have been made of the fund from the hands of Cather.

In every view of this case, my opinion is that the appellee has no title to relief against the appellant.

She is entitled, however, to relief against the defendant Wilson, who is confessedly indebted to her in the sum of 500 dollars, with interest from the 25th of August 1827; and the court of equity was the proper forum for the recovery of that claim.

The other judges concurred with judge Stanard, in entering a decree in the following terms:

That the decree of the circuit court be reversed, and that the appellee and James

Muse her next friend do pay unto the appellant his costs expended in the prosecution of his appeal. And this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court ought to have rendered, it is further decreed and ordered that the bill of the appellee be dismissed as to the appel-

661 lant, and that *the appellee and James Muse her next friend do pay unto the said appellant his costs by him about his defence in the said circuit court expended. And it is further decreed and ordered that the said Daniel A. Wilson do pay unto the appellee 500 dollars, with interest thereon from the 25th of August 1827 till paid, and also her costs by her expended in the prosecution of her suit in the said circuit court, including in those costs, the costs of the said circuit court above decreed to be paid by her to the appellant.

Mutual Assurance Society—Insurable Property.*—According to the original plan of the mutual assurance society, as developed by the acts of 1794 and 1795, none but an unincumbered fee simple estate was insurable; the insurance of mortgaged property was not thereby contemplated.

Same—Same—Mortgaged Property—Case at Bar.—In 1795, declarations were made for assurance in the mutual assurance society. In 1798, the party who declared for assurance died. And in 1821, a bill was filed by the society against his widow and heir, to subject the property insured to sale for the payment of certain quotas, which had been required in 1805 and in 1809, and succeeding years down to 1820, inclusive. It appearing that at the time of the insurance the property was under mortgage, and the lapse of time being also relied on, decreed that the bill be dismissed.

By an act of the general assembly of Virginia passed the 22d of December 1794, an assurance was established by the name of "The Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings of the state of Virginia;"

662 which act was explained by another act passed *the 23d of December 1795.

These two acts will be found in the session acts of 1794, p. 17, ch. 26, and in the session acts of 1795, p. 40, ch. 41.

On the 30th of April 1796, John Ingram, residing at Norfolk borough, declared for assurance in the said society certain property in that borough, consisting of six buildings, by three separate deeds or declarations numbered 93, 94 and 95.

The fifth section of the act of 1794 provided for "certain premiums to be paid by the persons who shall have their property insured, at the time of such insurance, which shall be deposited and kept as a fund for the purpose of making immediate reparation to such persons as may sustain losses or damages by fire;" and the sixth section was as follows:

"If the funds should not be sufficient, a repartition among the whole of the persons insured shall be made, and each shall pay, on demand of the cashier, his, her or their share, according to the sum insured and the rate of hazard at which the building stands, agreeable to the rate of the premiums, for which purpose it is hereby declared that the subscribers, as soon as they shall insure their property in the assurance society aforesaid, do mutually for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, engage their property insured (but none other) as security, and subject the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of such quotas."

About the year 1798, John Ingram died, leaving a widow Sarah Ingram and three sons, of whom two died intestate and without issue, and the other, Thomas R. Ingram, survived them.

In January 1821, a bill was filed in the superior court of chancery for the Williamsburg district, by the mutual assurance society against Sarah and Thomas R. Ingram, claiming the amount of certain quotas or repartitions required and called for on and succeeding years to the year 1820, inclusive, with interest on the respective quotas from the time they became due; and praying a decree therefor against the defendants, and that if necessary the buildings, together with the land on which they stand, be sold to satisfy the demands of the complainants.

663 the property insured as aforesaid, *in the year 1805, and in the year 1809

The answers of the defendants stated, that when the insurance was effected, the property was under a mortgage from John Ingram to one White for 250 pounds, which still continues: that the complainants had notice of this mortgage, and by reason thereof did not hold themselves liable to indemnify Ingram in the event of a fire, until after they discovered that the property was more than sufficient to pay the money for which it was pledged, and to discharge the quotas also; in evidence of which the following preamble and resolutions were adduced:

"At a meeting of the standing committee of the mutual assurance society against fire on buildings of the state of Virginia, held 23d May 1820, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas it appears from the records of this society, that John Ingram did, on the 30th day of April in the year 1796, enter for assurance in this society certain buildings valued at 5760 dollars, situated in the borough of Norfolk, as will more fully appear by reference to his declarations filed and recorded in this office, numbered 93, 94 and 95: And whereas it is represented to this board that the said buildings, with the ground on which they stood, was mortgaged at and before the date of the said declarations, to wit, on the 4th day of December 1794, to — White for the sum of 250 pounds: And it appearing to the satisfaction of this board that a very small part of the property thus mortgaged would at all times have been sufficient to discharge the said lien: Resolved that the insurance aforesaid, *by the said John

Ingram effected under the said declarations numbered 93, 94 and 95, shall be placed in all respects on the same footing as if the said John Ingram had possessed, at the time of declaring the property for assurance, a complete unincumbered fee simple therein."

The defendants also relied upon the lapse of time.

It was referred to a commissioner to ascertain whether the mortgage embraced the insured property; and the fact was established by his report, and the depositions and exhibits filed.

The cause between transferred to the circuit court for James City county and the city of Williamsburg, that court, on the 1st of January 1835, made a decree for the sale of the property insured, to satisfy the demand of the plaintiffs.

From which decree, on the petition of Sarah Ingram and Thomas R. Ingram, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by Harrison and the attorney general for the appellants, and C. Johnson for the appellees.

BALDWIN, J. I think it clear, according to the original scheme of the mutual assurance society against fire on buildings, none but an unincumbered fee simple estate was insurable. This is obvious from the nature and extent of the indemnity contemplated, and the means by which it was to be furnished. It was intended that the society should be perpetual, that the security against losses should be permanent, and that its resources should be supplied, not from accruing profits, but from a perennial income, to be yielded by a capital to be raised by the contributions of its members. The plan of mutual assurance was simple, and founded upon the idea of equality amongst the members in the principles of indemnity, contribution and authority. *The premiums and quotas were to be apportioned according to the value of the property, to be ascertained by an appraisement, not of partial interests but of the entire and unlimited estate; and that appraisement furnished the measure of compensation to the insured in case of loss. The owner of property declaring for insurance bound not only himself, but the property itself, not merely during his individual ownership, but in the hands of his heirs, executors and assigns, and subjected the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of the quotas. And provision was made, in case of the declarant's selling, or otherwise transferring the property, for constituting the purchaser or mortgagee a member in his stead; and he was required to apprise the purchaser or mortgagee of the assurance, and endorse to him the policy thereof.

The original scheme might, it is true, have authorized the insurance of partial or limited interests; but that would have required special provisions adapted to such a purpose. None such are to be found in the original acts of incorporation, nor in the original constitution, rules and regulations of the society; and a general declaration for insurance, such as is made by the absolute fee simple proprietor, must have been wholly inappropriate and abortive; for it would have furnished no criteria for graduating the premiums and quotas, nor for fixing the degree or rate of indemnity, nor for apportioning and distributing the compensation amongst successive or partial owners, or securing it to a substantial instead of a nominal owner, nor any authority to one to bind another by his declaration. Moreover, in the case of property subject to incumbrance, the effect of a general declaration, if operative, might and often would have been, to defeat the lien of the society, by means of the paramount title of the incumbrancer. I cannot doubt, therefore, that the original plan of the institution, as developed by the acts of 1794 and 666 *1795, did not contemplate the insurance of mortgaged property. The first authority for insurance by persons having limited interests is to be found in the act of 27th January 1803, Sess. Acts of 1802-3, p. 7, ch. 5, by which the society was enabled to insure buildings held by tenants for life, widows in right of their dower, and guardians, or trustees for orphans; and the declarations of such persons were made obligatory upon the fee simple ownership, but with a provision giving to a tenant for life, in case of loss, only the interest upon the compensation during his estate, and at his death giving the principal money to those entitled in remainder or reversion. The next legislative enactment on this subject we find in the act of January 29th 1805, Sess. Acts of 1804-5, p. 23, ch. 24, by the 10th section of which the society was authorized to form rules and regulations for fixing the quantum of interest to be insured.

It was, I presume, under the authority of these two last mentioned acts, that the society adopted the provisions in regard to partial and limited interest, to be found in sections 4-12 of the ninth article of "the constitution, rules and regulations of the mutual assurance society against fire on buildings of the state of Virginia, as revised and adopted subsequent to the 16th of February 1809, and in force on the 15th of May 1819." The 7th and 8th sections are as follows:

"Sect. 7. Any mortgagees, trustees, or creditors for whose benefit buildings may be conveyed in trust, subscribing their declarations as such, may insure such buildings, and such insurance shall be effectual after payment of the premium, and continue to be so until the first day of April in the following year, but no longer, unless the annual requisition or quotas shall then be paid at the general office of assurance in the city of Richmond, between the hours of 9 a. m. and of 3 p. m. in which case the assurance aforesaid shall 667 continue to *be good and effectual until sunset of the first day of April then next succeeding; when, for the effectual assurance of such buildings thereafter, the mortgagee, trustee or creditor shall again pay the annual requisition or quota, and failing to do so, shall forfeit all benefit of the assurance until such quota shall be paid with interest; and so of each succeeding year: provided, that such insurance shall continue to be in force only so long as the interest of such mortgagee, trustee or creditor may exist; and in case of accidental burning of the insured premises, that the amount to be paid by this society shall not exceed the sum due to him with interest thereon: provided also, that the sum to be paid for such loss shall not exceed the amount insured, after deducting four fifths of the salvage.

"Sect. 8. Any mortgagor or debtor who may have conveyed buildings, subscribing his or her declaration as such, may make a good and effectual insurance, on the terms and conditions which are required of a mortgagee, trustee, or creditor for whose benefit buildings may have been conveyed in trust: provided, that in case of accidental loss by fire, the sum to be paid to such mortgagor or debtor shall only be the balance after deducting the amount due to the mortgagee or creditor with interest; and the amount so due to such mortgagee, trustee or creditor (if not greater than the amount insured) after deducting salvage, shall be paid to him or her, on producing proper evidence of his or her claim on the buildings so insured and consumed by fire."

These provisions, it is manifest, are wholly inapplicable to an attempted assurance in 1796, the period of the declarations in question; and they only serve to illustrate how utterly impracticable it has ever been to effect an insurance of mortgaged property, under a general declaration as the absolute fee simple owner. According to the principles of insurance law, a 668 material *misrepresentation, whether by fraud, or which is only the effect of accident, negligence, inadvertence or mistake, is fatal to the contract. 1 Marsh. on Ins. 347. There was no moment of time between the 30th of April 1796 and the 23d of May 1820, at which, if the buildings had been destroyed by fire, the society would have been bound to render to the declarant Ingram, or his representatives or assigns, a single dollar of compensation. And the only question is whether the contract, thus null and void as against the society, can be enforced against the other party. If it can, it is not upon the principles of the general law of insurance; according to which, if through mistake, misinformation, or any other innocent cause, an insurance be made without any interest whatsoever in the thing insured, or to a much larger amount than its real value, in the one case the insurer shall return the whole premium, in the other he shall return upon all above the true value. For the premium paid by the insured, and the risk which the insurer takes upon himself, are considerations each for the other; they are correlatives, whose mutual operation constitutes the essence of the contract of insurance. The insurer shall not be exposed to the risk without receiving the premium; nor shall he retain the premium, which was the price of the risk, if in fact he ruins no risk at all, though it be by the neglect, or even the fault of the party insuring, that the risk be not run. 2 Marsh. on Ins. 548, 549; Stevenson v. Snow, 3 Burr. 1240. And in several cases, even where the policy was declared void for fraud committed by the insured, he obtained a return of the premium; but it is now settled that in all cases of actual fraud on the part of the insured, the underwriter shall retain the premium. 2 Marsh. on Ins. 559-63.

In the present case, there is no evidence or even imputation of fraud in regard to the conduct of the declarant; and there is the same reason for ascribing his at-669 tempt *at insurance to misapprehension, as existed in the case of The Mutual Ass. Co. v. Mahon, 5 Call 517, in which it was held that a leasehold interest was not insurable, and the society therefore not liable upon the policy, but that the declarant was entitled to a return of the premium. I can perceive nothing in the peculiar structure of this corporation to take the case out of the influence of the general principles above mentioned. It is true that the members of the association are the assurers as well as the assured; but the membership, as I apprehend, is created by the insurance, and if there be no insurance there is no membership.

I express no opinion upon the question whether an action could be maintained by a declarant against the society to recover back quotas he has paid upon a void insurance. That question does not arise here. In the present case, the society is endeavouring to enforce payment of the quotas which accrued prior to its having incurred any hazard of loss, and after the lapse of many years from the time of the inception of its rights as now asserted, without any effort, so far as appears from the record, to prosecute them to a recovery. The premium actually paid is an ample compensation for any expense or disappointment incurred by the society, and there is no consideration of justice to move the judicial tribunals, especially a court of conscience, to an active interposition in behalf of such a pretension. It is true that the members of the society are bound by its constitution, rules and regulations, so far as made conformably to law; and that by the 7th section of the 10th article of the revised constitution, rules and regulations, it is declared that "any insurance made by any person who shall, in the declaration of assurance, have misrepresented, or failed to represent truly, the capacity in which he acted when he subscribed such declaration, or his claim on or interest in the buildings offered for insurance, shall be ineffectual; the policy, 670 if any shall *have been issued, shall be void, and the premiums or quotas paid or due thereon shall be forfeited."

But this regulation is evidently merely prospective, and has no application to declarations for insurance previously made; and it is therefore unnecessary to consider what would be its effect and authority, if intended to be retrospective.

The resolution of the standing committee of the society, of the 23d of May 1820, by which they declared that the insurance in question should be placed in all respects on the same footing as if Ingram had possessed, at the time of declaring the property for assurance, a complete unincumbered fee simple therein, having been made without the concurrence of the representatives of the declarant, can give the society no rights which it did not previously possess, and rather indicates an attempt to give vitality to an act which the society had previously regarded as invalid.

My opinion is, that the decree of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

The other judges concurring, decree reversed and bill dismissed with costs.

Abrahams v. The Commonwealth.*

June, 1842.

Slaves—Suffered by Master to Go at Large—Warrant.—
No warrant is necessary for apprehending a slave going at large or hiring himself out contrary to law.

Same—Same.—A slave is committed to the jail of a corporation "until the next court of hustings to be held for the same," by warrant from a justice of peace of the corporation, which recites that the slaves has been apprehended therein and brought before the justice by J. T. informer, for hav-

676 ing been permitted by S. A. his *master to go at large and hire himself out contrary to the act of assembly in such case provided, and that it appears to the justice that such slave comes within the purview of said act: HELD,

1. Same—Same—Jurisdiction—Hustings Court.—The court of hustings has jurisdiction to proceed against the master, according to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 81.

2. Same—Same—Same—Same—Notice of Proceeding.—It is no objection to the proceeding before the court, that the master had no notice of the proceeding before the justice.

3. Same—Same—Same—Same—Presentment, etc.—In the proceeding before the court, no presentment, indictment or information against the master is necessary.

Same—Same—Qui Tam Prosecution.—Warrant committing to jail a slave apprehended for going at large and hiring himself out contrary to law, recites that he was apprehended and brought before the justice "by J. T. informer;" order of court directing master to be summoned states that the slave is "charged on the information of J. T.;" judgment imposing fine on master directs two thirds thereof to be paid "to J. T. the informer, who caused the fact to be established:" HELD, it sufficiently appears hereby, that the prosecution was qui tam, for the benefit as well of the informer as the commonwealth.

Same—Same—Summons.—Several slaves of one master, apprehended in a corporation for going at large and hiring themselves out contrary to law, are committed to jail until the next corporation court, by separate warrants from a justice of the peace; the court awards a summons against the master, which is issued and duly served, requiring him to shew cause why he should not be fined as the law directs, for permitting his slaves D. A. &c. (naming them all) to go at large and hire themselves out in the city, contrary to law; the master appears and makes defence, and in respect to each slave a separate trial is had, and a separate fine imposed: in appellate court, the master objects that there was only one summons, and the corporation court had no authority to divide the trial: HELD, there is nothing in the objection.

Same—Same—Trial by Jury—Appellate Court—Quære.

—Whether a master, charged, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 81, with having permitted his slave to go at large and hire himself out contrary to law, is entitled to demand that the fact shall be tried by a jury? But whether he has such right or not, yet if he appear in court and make defence without demanding a trial by jury, and a judgment be thereupon rendered against him, he cannot object in the appellate court that such trial was not awarded.

Same—Same—Judgment—Costs, Jail Fees, Fine.—

Judgment in county or corporation court, against a master for permitting his slave to go at large and hire himself out contrary to law, is properly rendered for the costs of the prosecution, including jail fees as well as for the fine.

Fine—Affirmance of Judgment for—Damages—Statute.

677 —The statute allowing damages on affirmance (Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 32, Suppl. to R. C. p. 149,) does not apply to the affirmance *of a judgment imposing an amercement or fine: the amercement or fine not being a debt or damages, within the meaning of that act. But though the judgment of affirmance in such case award damages according to law for retarding the execution, yet as no specific damages are thereby adjudged, and the law gives none, the error is merely formal, and the appellate court will disregard it.

By six several warrants under the hand and seal of William Lambert mayor of the city of Richmond, dated the 8th of November 1841, and directed to the keeper of the jail of said city, the said jailor was required to receive into his custody, and safely keep until the next court of hustings to be held for the said city, or until thence discharged by due course of law, six slaves, described as belonging to Simon Abrahams of said city, namely Delphy Anderson, Randol Kinney, Hannah Cox, Nancy Hicks, Gabriel Jones and Tom Bow. Each of the warrants recited that the slave therein mentioned had been apprehended in said city, and that day brought before the said Lambert, mayor of said city and a justice of the peace in and for the same, by James M. Taylor informer, for having been permitted by the said Simon Abrahams to go at large and hire himself (or herself) out, contrary to the act of the general assembly in such case made and provided; and that it appeared to him the said mayor, that such slave came within the purview of said act.

At a court of hustings held for the said city on the 10th of November 1841, the slaves were brought into court in the custody of the sergeant, "charged," (the record states) "upon the information of James M. Taylor, with being permitted by Simon Abrahams their master to go at large and hire themselves out contrary to law:" whereupon it was ordered that Abrahams be summoned to appear before the court on the following saturday (the 13th of the month) to shew cause why he should not be fined as the law directs, "for the said offence."

678 *A writ of summons was accordingly issued by the clerk, requiring Abrahams to shew cause "why he should not be fined as the law directs, for permitting his slaves Delphy Anderson," &c. (naming them all) "to go at large and hire themselves out contrary to law, in this city."

This writ being served upon Abrahams, he appeared at the return day thereof, and moved the court to discharge the summons, alleging the following grounds of his motion: 1. It nowhere appears by whom the slaves were arrested. 2. There is no warrant from a justice of the peace or other officer, authorizing or directing the apprehension of the slaves. 3. It does not appear from any proceedings had before any magistrate, where the slaves were going at large or hiring themselves out. 4. It is not charged in any of the proceedings had before the justice, that the slaves were going at large or hiring themselves out in the city of Richmond. 5. It does not appear that the slaves have ever been apprehended and carried before a magistrate of the city of Richmond, or any other magistrate. 6. If the slaves were ever apprehended and carried before a magistrate, the defendant had no notice that the magistrate would at any time proceed to the investigation of the supposed violation of the law, for which the trial is now sought to be had in the court of hustings. 7. The court of hustings cannot act on any case arising under the 81st section of the statute concerning slaves, free negroes and mulattoes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, p. 442,* until the same shall

*This section enacts, that "If any person shall permit his or her slave, or any slave hired by him or her, to go at large or hire himself or herself out, it shall be lawful for any person, and it shall moreover be the duty of every sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner and constable of a county, and sergeant, coroner and constable of a corporation, to apprehend and carry such slave before a magistrate of the county or corporation where apprehended; and if it shall appear to the magistrate that such slave hath been permitted to go at large or hire himself or herself out, 679 have *been acted on by a magistrate.

8. It does not appear from proceedings had before any magistrate of the city of Richmond, or from the records of this court, that the defendant is legally charged with violating the said 81st section, or any other act passed by the virginian legislature.

9. It does not appear upon the records of this court, that the defendant is charged with any offence, or the violation of any of the laws now in force in this commonwealth.

The court decided, that it appeared satisfactorily to them, from the warrants of commitment, and the summons with the return thereon, that the cases were regularly and properly before them, and therefore refused to discharge the said summons.

680 To which opinion the *defendant excepted, setting forth in his bill of exceptions the warrants of commitment, the summons and return, and the grounds of his motion as stated above.

Sundry witnesses being then heard and examined, the court gave judgment against Abrahams, for permitting the slave Tom Bow to go at large and hire himself out in the city contrary to law, for a fine of 20 dollars and the costs of the proceeding, including jail fees; directing that one third of the fine should be paid to the commonwealth for the benefit of the literary fund, and two thirds to Taylor the informer, who caused the fact to be established; and discharging the said slave out of custody.

he shall forthwith impose on the owner of such slave, or the person permitting him or her to go at large or hire himself or herself out, a fine not less than ten dollars nor more than twenty dollars; or may, in his discretion, order the slave to the jail of the county or corporation, there to be safely kept until the next court; when, if it shall appear to the court that such slave hath been permitted to go at large or hire himself or herself out, contrary to law, it shall be lawful for the said court, in their discretion, and they are hereby required, either to impose on the owner of such slave, or the person permitting him or her to go at large or hire himself or herself out as aforesaid, a fine not less than twenty dollars nor more than fifty dollars, or order the sheriff or other officer of their county or corporation to sell every such slave for ready money, at the next court held for the said county or corporation, notice being given at the courthouse door at least twenty days before such sale: one third of the amount of such sale shall go to the commonwealth for the use of the literary fund, and the residue shall be paid by the sheriff or other officer, after deducting six per centum on the whole amount for his trouble, and the jailor's fees, to the person who shall inform thereof and cause the fact to be established; and when there shall be no informer, the same shall go to the commonwealth for the use of the literary fund. And in every case of a fine imposed under this section, the slave shall be held in custody and liable therefor, and may be sold by order of the magistrate or court imposing the same, and in satisfaction thereof and all incidental charges, unless the same be paid within ten days after such fine is imposed; upon payment whereof, the said slave shall be discharged."—Note in Original Edition.

The proceeding was dismissed as to Gabriel Jones, another of the said slaves; and was continued as to the four others until the next term.

At the next term of the court, held in December 1841, the cases of the four remaining slaves were disposed of. On the 15th of December, the court adjudged that Abrahams had permitted his slave Randol Kinney to go at large and hire himself out contrary to law, and that he be fined therefor 35 dollars, and pay the costs of the proceeding, including jail fees; the fine to be disposed of as directed in the former case: and it was ordered that unless the fine and costs were paid within ten days, the slave Randol Kinney should be sold by the sergeant, as the law directs, in satisfaction of the judgment.

On the 17th of December, the court dismissed the proceeding as to the slave Delphy Anderson, and gave judgment against Taylor, the informer, for the costs, including jail fees. Taylor subsequently moved the court to set aside this judgment, and his motion being overruled, he filed a bill of exceptions, which was made a part of the record.

In the case of the slaves Hannah Cox and Nancy Hicks, judgments were rendered similar in all respects to that in the case of the slave Tom Bow. The judgment 681 *in the case of Hannah Cox was rendered on the 17th of December; that in the case of Nancy Hicks, on the 18th.

Writs of error to the judgments in the cases of Tom Bow, Randol Kinney, Hannah Cox and Nancy Hicks were awarded by a judge of the general court, on a petition of Abrahams, wherein he assigned the following objections to the proceedings and judgments: 1. Although two thirds of the several fines were awarded to James M. Taylor, yet the prosecution was in the name of the commonwealth against the petitioner, and not in the name of the said Taylor as well for himself as the commonwealth. 2. Judgment should have been rendered for the petitioner, for the costs incurred by him in the case of his slave Gabriel, who was discharged. 3. The proceeding before the court of hustings was by one summons only, and the court had no authority to divide the trial as they did. 4. The court of hustings had no jurisdiction of the case, it not appearing to have been sent to that court by any magistrate of the city of Richmond. 5. It does not appear, from the record of the hustings court, or the judgment of a magistrate of the said city, that any such magistrate had ever examined into the charge against the petitioner, or had in any manner notified the said court that the slaves, or any of them, had ever been apprehended and carried before him, or that it appeared to him they had been permitted to go at large and hire themselves out. 6. If any such proceedings were ever had before a magistrate of the city, the petitioner had no notice of them. 7. It does not appear, from the record of the court of hustings or any proceedings before a justice of the peace of said city, that the petitioner was charged with permitting his slaves to go at large or hire themselves out in the said city. 8. The court permitted Taylor, who was no party on the record, to appear and make a motion in the cause, and to file his bill of exceptions, 682 *thus increasing the petitioner's expense in obtaining a copy of the record.

The circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond (to which, on the common law side, the writs of error were made returnable) affirmed the judgments of the hustings court, with damages according to law for retarding the execution, and costs.

Abrahams thereupon petitioned this court for writs of error to the judgments of the circuit court, assigning the errors alleged before the court of hustings, and in his petition for writs of error to the judgments of that court; and, as an additional error, the award of damages against him by the circuit court.

J. M. Gregory, for the petitioner.

The opinion of the majority of the court was delivered by FRY, J. Many errors are alleged in the proceedings in this case.

1. It is said, that the prosecution was in the name of the commonwealth, and not in the name of Taylor, as well for himself as for the commonwealth.

It cannot be said that the prosecution here is in the name of the commonwealth only. The warrants of commitment must of course run in her name. But they recite that the slaves were charged on the information of Taylor; the order awarding the summons states that the slaves were brought in, charged upon the information of James M. Taylor; and in the record of the hearing and judgment, he is said to be the informer, who caused the fact to be established. This sufficiently shews the style and character of the prosecution.

But the objection supposes that a presentment, information or indictment, in due form, is necessary. The act, however, evidently shews that this was not con-
683 templated *or required. The whole proceeding may begin and end before the justice; or be carried on before monthly courts, having no authority to entertain such pleas. The slaves may be brought before a justice, without warrant; and if the master were present and fully heard, there might be nothing beyond the record of the judgment itself, if it sufficiently shewed the occasion and the grounds of it.

2. It is said, the slaves could not be apprehended without warrant, founded upon information on oath. But the arrest of the slaves did not touch the liberty of the master. As to him, it was similar to the service of process by attachment to compel an appearance; or to a proceeding in rem,—the taking up of estrays, &c. Besides, it may be regarded as an arrest for a continuing offence, and analogous to an arrest flagrante delicto.

3. It was said that the master had no notice of the proceeding before the justice. But the justice did not decide finally. The proceeding before him was only inceptive. He did no more than commit the slaves until the next court, with a view to a proper trial. The master then had a full hearing: and if it was irregular for the justice to commit the slaves, in the first instance, without a summons to and hearing of the master, it could not affect the subsequent proceedings of the court, otherwise regular; whatever personal consequences might attach to the magistrate.

4. It was said also, that the hustings court had no jurisdiction, because it did not appear that the case had been sent to it by any magistrate. But the act does not require the case to be sent, formally, to the court. It only authorizes the magistrate, in his discretion, to commit the slave to the jail, there to be safely kept until the next court; which is precisely what was done by the mayor in these cases, as is seen by the warrants, which the defendant has made part of the record, if they were not so without the aid of the bill of exceptions.

684 *5. It is said that the court erred in not giving Abrahams his costs, on the dismissal of the case as to the slave Gabriel.

It is a sufficient answer to say that this judgment cannot be drawn in question before us. There has been no writ of error awarded to it, nor any action had thereon by the circuit court.

6. The fifth objection, as stated in the record, we think answered by an inspection of the warrants, and the reason fourthly above assigned.

7. It is said, there was but one summons, and the hustings court had no authority to divide the trial as they did.

In reply it may be said, that the informations were separate; that so were the warrants of commitment until the next court; that the summons was but notice to the party to appear, stating the matter of all the informations or charges; and that the defendant did appear, and had a full hearing upon the merits, on each charge; the court hearing each separately, and giving separate judgments. The summons is not like an information or indictment, nor do the usual objections against duplicity in pleading apply to it. If it performs the office of giving the party notice of the charges against him, and appoints him a day to be heard, especially if it brings him into court to be heard, upon the merits,—it has fulfilled all the objects of a notice, and objections to its form must be regarded as unimportant; more particularly so, if made for the first time in an appellate court.

Again, if the defendant Abrahams had appeared at the next court after the commitment of the slaves, without any summons, and the court had proceeded to hear the witnesses and give judgments in the manner set out in the record, we suppose that the defendant could not afterwards object that there had been no summons; and if so, a summons merely informal or double could hardly be considered as worse than none at all.

685 *8. It is objected that the court gave judgment for costs. But the statute itself authorizes this, in saying that the slave may be sold for the fine and all incidental charges. Costs are certainly charges incidental to the prosecution.

In all convictions for misdemeanors, with us, judgment is uniformly given that the commonwealth recover her costs; and even in cases of felony, though no formal judgment is given for them, yet the statute provides that the prisoner shall pay them, if his estate is able to do so. Tate's Dig. 2d edi. p. 269, § 44; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 31, p. 608.

9. It is alleged that the circuit court erred in giving costs and damages, on affirming the judgments. As to costs, the objection is answered above; and as to damages, we think that the error is merely formal. The judgments give no specific damages, but damages according to law; and the law giving none in such cases, the judgments have, in that particular, no effect. An amercement or fine is not a debt or damages, within the meaning of the law allowing damages on affirmance; Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 32; Tate's Dig. 2d edi. p. 581, § 140; Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 149.

10. It has been suggested in conference, that the defendant ought to have had a trial by jury. But the act of assembly evidently contemplates a summary proceeding, without pleadings or jury; and if it be said that the legislature could not deprive the party of a trial by jury, because it was a right secured to him by the constitution, it should be shewn that the constitution did secure him such trial in these cases, and that he could not be otherwise tried. Without deciding whether he was entitled to such trial, if he had asked it, in order to ascertain the facts, we are of opinion that there was no error in the court in not ordering a jury suo motu. The defendant's objections, made in the hustings court, were to other matters, and none pointed to this right.

686 *There were some other objections taken; but having considered all that we deem material, we are of opinion to deny the writs of error.

DUNCAN, J. Without entering into a minute examination of the several grounds of error assigned in the petition, there is, in my opinion, a ground not assigned in the petition which ought to become the foundation for a writ of error in this case.

The proceeding is founded upon the 81st section of the statute concerning slaves, free negroes and mulattoes, which subjects to a heavy penalty the party who shall permit any slave owned or hired by him or her, "to go at large, or hire himself or herself out;" the slave to be held as security for the payment of the fine and costs, or, in the discretion of the court, to be sold, and the entire proceeds of the sale, after the payment of the costs, to be divided, one third to go to the commonwealth, and the remaining two thirds to the informer.

In order to understand the nature of the objection which exists, in my opinion, to the proceedings in this cause, it may be well to refer for a moment to the peculiar, and, I may add, extraordinary effect of the statute upon the owner or holder of slaves falling within its operation. In the first place, any person, without an application to the judicial power of the country, may seize a slave and take him before a magistrate. The statute provides for no notice to the owner or hirer of the slave. The magistrate is forthwith to impose a fine, or, in his discretion, order the slave to jail until the next sitting of the court. The court is then authorized to impose a much larger fine than the magistrate could; or it may, in its discretion, order the slave to be sold, and the entire proceeds of sale to be divided in the manner already indicated. The court need not fine the party, but may at once forfeit the slave out and out, 687 and *divide the spoils between the informer and the commonwealth; and that too (if the statute is to be literally construed) without giving the owner any notice, and upon testimony entirely ex parte. It is not my purpose to object to this statute because of its peculiar harshness; sound principles of public policy may have rendered it necessary, and it may be the duty of the courts to enforce it: but it is my purpose to shew that the legislature did not design, by the passage of that statute, to deprive the citizen of his constitutional right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, and to have a trial by jury. I do not mean to contend that the legislature have not a right to do so in cases like the present; that question does not necessarily arise here: but I mean to contend that according to the usual rules laid down for the construction of the statute laws of the land, the legislature did not intend to preclude parties falling within the operation of this particular statute, from having their rights decided according to the forms of proceeding known to the common law, and provided for by the constitution. I have already remarked that the statute contains no provision that the party who is to be subject to its operation shall have notice of any proceeding against him; nor does it provide for any form of trial whatever: and if its literal terms are alone to furnish the rule of proceeding, it will follow that a slave worth 500 dollars may be absolutely taken from the owner, and sold without any right of redemption; and that too without any notice to him, and without a jury of the vicinage to interpose their shield for his protection. I think, with due deference to the opinion of others, and especially of this court, all of whom differ from me on this question, that in a country where the fundamental law declares "that in all capital or criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, and to a 688 speedy *trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage," surprise may well be created by the suggestion that under the form of law a citizen may be convicted of a criminal offence, and absolutely forfeit his property, however valuable, without being confronted with his accusers and the witnesses against him, and without having a trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage. I know that the legislature in its wisdom has provided, that in a presentment to a county court, where the penalty does not exceed 5 dollars, or to the superior court where it does not exceed 20 dollars, these courts respectively may proceed to judgment without a jury: and the same statute carefully provides that the party shall be first served with process. Whether the party would in such case have a right to demand a jury, it is not necessary to decide; but it is very clear that in no case where there is presentment, and where the fine may exceed 20 dollars, can the superior court give judgment without the intervention of a jury, although the defendant does not appear. So under the gaming laws, the fine does not exceed 20 dollars for unlawful gaming, and the court may, on default, render judgment for the fine; but if the defendant appear and plead, he has a right to a trial by jury. Horton's case, 1 Va. Cas. 335. Although the reasoning of the court in that case is not given, it may be inferred that the right to a jury was adjudged to be a constitutional right; because the general law, before noticed, expressly gives to the court, in all cases where the penalty does not exceed 20 dollars, the right to pronounce judgment without a jury. But it may be said that the general court were influenced, in their decision of Horton's case, by the circumstance that upon conviction the party shall be held to give security for his good behaviour. With this, however, the jury have nothing to do: it is an additional punishment fixed by the law, and attaches to the conviction; and if the court be substituted for the jury, and determine the fact of guilt, the law attaches 689 *the additional punishment of giving security, in the same manner as if a jury had determined the fact of guilt. There is nothing, therefore, in that argument; and the general court in Horton's case must have intended, that in criminal cases, although the penalty did not exceed 20 dollars, a party had a right to a trial by jury. And as I have before stated, in all cases where there is a presentment by a grand jury, and the fine may exceed 20 dollars, though it may be but one cent, the courts never give judgment without obtaining the verdict of a jury, although the defendant does not appear and plead. If this is necessary where a grand jury has found a presentment, in order to the protection of the citizen, how much stronger is the necessity where there has been no grand jury, and the proceeding has perhaps been commenced by an irresponsible individual, who chooses to seize upon the property of a citizen without the protection even of a warrant from a justice of the peace; where the fine may be upwards of 20 dollars (in this case one fine was for 35 dollars), and where the property so seized may be actually forfeited and sold without redemption. My argument therefore is, that the legislature did not intend that the court should try a case under this statute without a jury; that in all cases where the fine may exceed 20 dollars, the court are bound, under the existing law, to impanel a jury, whether the defendant be in default or not, unless, by the plain import of the statute, the right to a jury trial is taken away. When the legislature shall pass a law of that kind, there may be some found to question its power to do so. It has not done so in this case; nor can I anticipate the time when it will pass a law that shall in terms subject a citizen to a heavy penalty, like the present law, and say to him that he shall not be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, nor have a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage. And I lay down this 690 proposition, which *seems to me incontrovertible; that where a statute creates an offence, and no mode is pointed out for the prosecution of it, the ancient proceeding by indictment or information is the appropriate mode, and the only mode that can be adopted. As the statute in question does not indicate the mode of prosecution when the case gets into court, an indictment or information is the proper course. At any rate, the party should have been summoned, and a jury impaneled to ascertain the facts and determine the amount of the fine. In the case under consideration the party was summoned, it is true; but by what authority? The statute did not require it. It was, I suppose, because it was a constitutional right; and the same article of the constitution shews that he had an equal right to a trial by jury.

It is said that the defendant did not demand a jury. But where a man indicted for a common misdemeanour does not appear, his cause must nevertheless be tried by a jury, because he may be fined more than 20 dollars, although he may be fined less; and this court would reverse any judgment rendered by an inferior court in such a case without having a jury impaneled, although the fine were but one cent, and the defendant had never appeared or demanded a trial by jury. And why? Because it was a right under the constitution to have his cause so tried. In this case one of the fines was 35 dollars, and the slave is held in custody for the payment of it. I can see no reason for the difference, and I think there is none.

But the defendant in this case did appear; and for aught that appears in the record, he may have claimed all his rights. The pleadings were ore tenus; he defended himself against the prosecution; and even if he had not done so, the amount of the fine being above 20 dollars, he was entitled to a trial by jury.

I think that a writ of error ought to be awarded in this case. Not that I would certainly reverse the judgment:
691 *for, always diffident of my own opinions, I am the more so in this case, because I find all the judges differing from me. Perhaps my mind has been misled by a too jealous regard for the trial by jury.

ARRESTS.

I. IN CIVIL CASES.

Persons Exempt from Arrest.—Judges, attorneys, witnesses, and suitors are exempt from arrest in civil suits during their attendance at court. Com. v. Ronald, 4 Call 97; Richards v. Goodson, 3 Va. Cas. 381.

Length of Time Debtor Can Be Held without Execution.—A debtor, being surrendered to the sheriff by his special bail, after judgment against him in a county court, cannot legally be detained in jail, or within the prison bounds, on a bond given for that purpose, more than twenty days from the time of such surrender, if the creditor, his agent, or attorney, do not, within that time, charge him in execution in writing. Green v. Garrett, 3 Munf. 330.

Effect of Escape of Debtor Arrested upon a Writ of Ca. Sa.—If a debtor in custody under a writ of ca. sa. be permitted to escape, the creditor is entitled to another execution against the debtor as well as to an action against the sheriff for the escape. Windrum v. Parker, 2 Leigh 361.

Effect of Discharge of Debtor Arrested upon a Writ of Ca. Sa.—But if a debtor, arrested on a writ of ca. sa., is discharged by order of the creditor or his agent, no other execution can be had on the judgment or decree. Windrum v. Parker, 2 Leigh 361.

II. IN CRIMINAL CASES.

What Arrests May Be Made without Warrant.—For felonies, or upon reasonable suspicion of felony, and for misdemeanors committed in their presence, constables or police officers may arrest the offender without a warrant and take him before a magistrate to be dealt with according to law. But, in general, in cases of misdemeanor a constable or other peace officer cannot, any more than a private person, justify the arrest of the offender without a warrant, when the offense was not committed in his presence. Muscoe v. Com., 86 Va. 443, 10 S. E. Rep. 534.

So a justice of the peace, or a mayor of a city or town having similar power, may himself apprehend or cause to be apprehended, by word only, any person committing a felony or breach of the peace in his presence; but this power extends no further. In all other cases he must issue his warrant in writing to apprehend the offender. Muscoe v. Com., 86 Va. 443, 10 S. E. Rep. 534.

Not only must there be a warrant in order to justify an arrest for a misdemeanor not committed in the presence of the officer, but, to justify the arrest the officer must have the warrant with him at the time. Muscoe v. Com., 86 Va. 443, 10 S. E. Rep. 534.

Issuance and Execution of Warrant of Arrest.—A warrant, to arrest a person of whom surety for the peace is demanded, being executed neither by a sworn officer, nor the person to whom it was directed by the magistrate, but by an individual selected by the prosecutor, who erased the name of the person appointed by the magistrate, and substituted that of the person selected by himself, is thereby rendered altogether illegal and void as a justification, but may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. Wells v. Jackson, 3 Munf. 458.

Although an escape warrant ought regularly to show on its face that the person who issues it, is a justice of the peace, yet on a habeas corpus sued out by the person arrested on it, if it is proved that he is a justice, the prisoner ought not to be discharged. Jones v. Timberlake, 6 Rand. 678.

Warrant to Arrest Unnamed Persons is Void.—A warrant directing the "associates" of persons named to be arrested, without mentioning the name of such associates, is illegal and void. Wells v. Jackson, 3 Munf. 458.

Policeman Making Arrest May Use Force Necessary to Take the Offender.—A policeman who does not use more force than is necessary to arrest a person who is engaged in riotous and disorderly conduct, and who resists the arrest, is not guilty of an assault and battery. Mesmer v. Com., 26 Gratt. 976.

Question as to Legality of Arrest is One of Fact.—The question as to what constitutes a legal arrest is a mixed question of law and fact, and must therefore be determined by the jury upon the facts of the particular case, under suitable instructions from the court as to the law. The court should explain to the jury what constitutes a legal arrest, and then leave it to them to say whether upon the evidence before them the arrest in question is legal or not. Muscoe v. Com., 86 Va. 448, 10 S. E. Rep. 534.

Killing Officer in Resisting Illegal Arrest.—If one, even an officer, undertakes to arrest another unlawfully, the latter may resist him. He has no protection from the offense, or from the fact that the other is an offender. The true view of the law when the mere fact of an illegal arrest, attempted or consummated, appears, is that if the one suffering it kills the officer or other arresting person, whether with a deadly weapon or with other means, he may rely on the presumption that his mind was beclouded by passion; but if actual malice is affirmatively proved the homicide will be murder. Briggs v. Com., 82 Va. 554; Muscoe v. Com., 86 Va. 448, 10 S. E. Rep. 534. Thus in a case where the circumstances did not justify an arrest by the constable without a warrant, but which gave the accused the right to resist the arrest, it appeared that the deceased told the accused he would arrest him, and against his protest did arrest him. The accused jerked loose, and then retreating a short distance, turned and fired at the back of the deceased, who was unarmed. It was held that the grade of the offense depended on whether the homicide was committed through actual malice, or through sudden passion, which could only be ascertained from the circumstances, and the jury, with all those circumstances before them, having found that the offense was murder, their finding should not be disturbed, as it was neither against, nor without, evidence. Briggs v. Com., 82 Va. 554.

larceny of checks, bank notes, and United States treasury notes.

Same—Examining Court—Warrant Convening Court—Sufficiency of—Sunday.—By warrant dated the 17th, which is thursday, a court for the examination of a prisoner charged with felony is appointed to be held on the 22d, and is held accordingly; the court being thus held on the fifth day after the date of the warrant, and one of the intervening days being sunday: HELD, the warrant and examination are sufficient.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—Warrant directs a court to be summoned for the examination of a prisoner charged with feloniously stealing "sundry checks drawn by sundry individuals upon the Exchange bank at N., and sundry other checks drawn in like manner upon the Farmers bank at N., also treasury notes and other bank notes, the whole of which checks, treasury notes and bank notes amount to 2324 dollars, of the value of 2324 dollars, the property of J. S. M.;" record of examining court states, that prisoner was examined upon a charge of feloniously stealing "divers goods and chattels, the property of J. S. M."—HELD, the warrant and examination are sufficient, and an indictment for the larceny of divers checks, bank notes, and United States treasury notes, the property of J. S. M., is well supported thereby.

By warrant under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace for Elizabeth City county, dated the 17th of March 1842, reciting that William Boyd was that day committed to the jail of the county by warrant from the said justice, for having, on the 16th day of March 1842, feloniously taken, stolen and carried away from the 692 *house of John S. Moody, within the jurisdiction of the county court, "sundry checks drawn by sundry individuals upon the Exchange bank at Norfolk, and sundry other checks drawn in like manner upon the Farmers bank at Norfolk, for sundry other sums of money, also treasury notes and other bank notes, the whole of which checks, treasury notes and bank notes amount to the sum of 2324 dollars and 14 cents, of the value of 2324 dollars and 14 cents, the property of John S. Moody,"—the sheriff was required to summon the justice of the county to hold a court, on the 22d of March 1842, for the examination of the fact with which the said William Boyd stood charged.

A court was accordingly held on the 22d of March, for the examination of the said William Boyd, "charged" (the record states) "with the felonious stealing of divers goods and chattels, the property of John S. Moody." The examining court remanded him to be tried, "for the said supposed fact," before the circuit superior court of the county.

In the circuit superior court, at April term 1842, the grand jury found a bill of indictment against Boyd, for the larceny of divers checks, bank notes, and United States treasury notes, the property of John S. Moody. The indictment contained twenty counts. In several of them, charging the larceny of different checks, the instrument was merely described as a check for the payment of a certain sum, and of the value of that sum. Other counts, in addition to the amount and value of the check, set forth the date and number of it, by whom drawn and in whose favour, the particular bank (Exchange of Farmers bank at Norfolk) on which drawn, and, where made payable to order, the endorsement by the payee. One count charged the larceny of three checks, another of two, and another of two paper bills of credit issued under the authority of the United States, commonly called treasury 693 notes; the court in each of *these cases stating the aggregate amount and value of all the checks or treasury notes therein mentioned, but not the separate amount or value of each, or of any one. The 17th count charged the larceny of a promissory note for the payment, and of the value, of 50 dollars, commonly called a treasury note: to which description the 18th count added, that the note was "made by the United States." The 19th count differed from the 17th, and the 20th from the 18th, only in terming the instrument charged to be stolen a note, instead of a promissory note.

Before pleading, the prisoner produced the record of the examining court, including the warrant for convening the same, and moved the circuit court to quash the indictment for the following reasons: 1. It does not sufficiently appear from the proceedings of the examining court, that the prisoner was examined according to law for the offence specified in the said indictment or any count thereof. 2. The court of the justice was held for the examination of the prisoner for feloniously stealing "divers goods and chattels," the property of John S. Moody; and no such offence is charged in the indictment. 3. There were not five days between the date of the warrant, and the day on which the court of examination was thereby appointed to be held, and was actually held. In connexion with this ground of the motion to quash the indictment, it was proved to the circuit court that the 17th of March 1842, the date of the warrant, was thursday, and consequently that a sunday intervened between that day and the day of holding the court of examination. 4. For other reasons apparent on the face of the indictment and the proceedings of the examining court.

The circuit court overruled the motion to quash the indictment, and the prisoner excepted, setting forth in his bill of exceptions the warrant for convening the court of examination, the proceedings of 694 that court, and *the grounds of his motion as above detailed. He then moved to quash the 17th, 18th, 19th and 20th counts of the indictment; which motion was also overruled. Whereupon he pleaded not guilty, and a jury being impanelled for the trial, found him "guilty of the charges preferred against him in the indictment," and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be two years. The circuit court rendered judgment accordingly. And now he applied by petition to this court for a writ of error to the judgment.

R. H. Armistead, for the petitioner, relied upon the second and third grounds above assigned for quashing the indictment. He adverted to the terms of the act 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 1, p. 598, providing that the day to be appointed in the warrant, for holding the court of examination, shall be "not less than five nor more than ten days after the date thereof;" and suggested that the court, in Thompson v. Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 135, must have overlooked the language of the enactment.

On the question whether an intervening sunday is to be reckoned in the computation of the five days, he referred to the cases cited in Tate's Dig., 2d edi., p. 250, note 4.

June, 1842.

Criminal Law—Witnesses—Accomplice—Right to Pardon—Though a particeps criminis, called as a witness for the commonwealth on the trial of his accomplice, voluntarily give evidence, and fully, candidly and impartially disclose all the circumstances attending the transaction, as well those which involve his own guilt as those which involve the guilt of others, he will yet have no right to a pardon for his own guilt, and therefore no right to demand a continuance of his cause until he can have an opportunity to apply to the executive for such pardon.

Case adjourned from the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond.

William B. Dabney, late the first teller of the bank of Virginia, was indicted in the said circuit court, upon the statute of February 24, 1820 (Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 223, § 2, p. 278), for felony in embezzling and fraudulently converting to his own use 4000 dollars of the money and bank notes of the bank, placed under his care and management by virtue of his office aforesaid. Having been admitted to bail, he appeared in court at May term 1842 in discharge of his recognizance; and the attorney for the commonwealth desiring to put him on trial on the said indictment, he moved *the court to postpone the trial, in order that he might have an opportunity, at the proper time, to trivance, for the making or printing any such note &c. or any such current coin, or if any person or persons shall, without lawful authority as aforesaid and without lawful excuse, knowingly have in his, her or their custody any such plate or instrument, every person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid, and being thereof convicted according to law, shall be adjudged a felon, and, if a free person, shall be punished by confinement in the public jail and penitentiary for not less than five nor more than twenty years."—Note in Original Edition.

†Criminal Law—Witnesses—Approvers.—In Oliver v. Com., 77 Va. 592, the court said: "The English doctrines relating to the admission of approvers seem never to have become incorporated into the laws of this state, and the ancient practice in England, which was confined to capital cases, has been long disused. 4 Bl. apply to the executive for a pardon, being advised that such application could not properly be made to the executive until certain indictments depending in the same court against Benjamin W. Green were finally disposed of. The record sent to the general court contained the following statement of the grounds upon which this motion was made.

While the prisoner acted as first teller of the bank of Virginia, during the years 1838, 1839, and 1840, a defalcation to a large amount, between 500,000 and 600,000 dollars, had taken place in his department of the bank, and the prisoner apprehending prosecution for the default had left his situation in the bank on the — day of April 1840, and fled from the commonwealth to places beyond the limits of the United States, leaving his wife and children at their residence in Richmond. Having borne a high character for integrity during his whole life, and having seen a publication in the Richmond Whig, written a few days after his flight, and purporting to have been made by his friends and connexions, inviting him to return, to surrender himself to the law, and to make a full disclosure of all the circumstances attending the default, and approving that advice, he resolved to follow it, and thereupon wrote to John H. Pleasants the editor of the Whig, from Lewiston in the state of New York, a letter dated the 27th of April 1840, indicating that intention. About the same time a letter was written to the prisoner by John Brockenbrough the president of the bank of Virginia, urging his return, recommending a full and fair disclosure of all the transactions connected with the default, and suggesting that such a course would lead to favour towards him. This letter, accompanied by one from John Wight to the prisoner, strongly advising the same course, was despatched by a special messenger, R. C. Williamson, 698 and delivered to the prisoner at Lewiston in New York. Whereupon the prisoner immediately and voluntarily returned with Williamson to Richmond, went before the officers of the bank, voluntarily explained to them the transactions connected with the default, and surrendered himself to the officers of the law. He was thereupon arrested, and gave bail to appear before the mayor of the city of Richmond, to undergo his examination on the — day of May. He accordingly appeared, but the examination was postponed from time to time, and his recognizances renewed, until the 17th of June 1840, when he underwent his examination before the mayor, and was committed for trial before the magistrates of the city at a called court to be held on the 22d of June, for his examination, first, on the charge of embezzling and fraudulently converting to his own use, while teller of the bank, the money and bank notes belonging to the bank and entrusted to his keeping; secondly, for permitting Benjamin W. Green fraudulently to embezzle and convert to his use the money and bank notes of the bank; and thirdly, for stealing the money and bank notes of the bank. The prisoner was accordingly brought before the called court, and that court, having heard the evidence, remanded him for trial before the circuit court upon the first two charges, and a nolle prosequi was entered by the attorney for the commonwealth, by the advice of the court, as to the third charge, that is, the charge of larceny.

Before the prisoner returned to Richmond as aforesaid, an examination of the first teller's vault and drawers at the bank had ascertained the amount of the deficiency of the money of the bank entrusted to the prisoner, and that checks of B. W. Green and others, to an amount nearly equal to the amount of said deficiency, were found in the said vault

699 and drawers; and the said *Benjamin

W. Green had been arrested upon a charge of felony, as the party who had fraudulently and feloniously obtained and converted to his own use the greater part of the money and notes aforesaid, and was under trial for these charges before an examining court for the city of Richmond, during the period that Dabney's examination was postponed from time to time as aforesaid before the mayor. Upon this examination of Green, Dabney was called upon as a witness to give evidence on the part of the commonwealth. Before he was sworn, he was informed by the court, at the request of the attorney for the commonwealth, that he was not bound to give any evidence in that case that would criminate himself, and that if he did give evidence, he must do so without any expectation of favour or that he would thereupon acquire any right to pardon. The prisoner thereupon declared he had been advised by his counsel, that though he was not bound to give evidence in the cause, yet if he did give it, he should tell the whole truth; and he was willing to give evidence and to tell the whole truth, whether it involved his own guilt or the guilt of others. He was thereupon sworn as a witness to give evidence on behalf of the commonwealth, and gave evidence in detail as to all the circumstances which had come to his knowledge touching the default aforesaid, from the period when an overdraft of Green & Merrill had been made known to him about the — day of October 1838, till the said Dabney finally left the bank on the — day of April 1840. Among other things, he gave evidence in much detail of a great variety of occasions on which he had permitted B. W. Green to withdraw from the bank, upon checks which were not good, and which both he (Dabney) and Green knew were not good, first smaller and afterwards much larger sums of money, till Green's overdraft amounted to the whole sum deficient, except about 4900 dollars. That

Green's first overdrafts were made 700 *without Dabney's knowledge, and were afterwards concealed by him under the supposition that they had arisen from the mistake of an absent officer, and would be explained when he returned to the bank. That Green's earlier overdrafts made with Dabney's knowledge were made under a promise by Green, and an expectation by Dabney, that they would be soon returned: that all Green's overdrafts made with Dabney's knowledge were made under strong assurances that they should be repaid; and towards the latter part of the overdrawing, he repeatedly assured Dabney that the repayment should be secured by a lien on property, and made some progress in preparing the securities. Dabney testified that in relation to these overdrafts permitted by him to Green, he had no interest whatever, no part of them being intended from him or for his use: that he never received from Green any consideration whatsoever for the indulgence: that it is true he received from him some small presents, but never regarded them as given in consideration of services rendered: and that when he had been ruined by the long course of indulgence in favour of Green, and found himself obliged to leave the bank, he informed Green that he had nothing to pay a debt which he owed to his two sisters, of about 1000 dollars each, and that Green promised him he would transfer to each of his sisters ten shares of the stock of the Dover coal mining company, which he afterwards did accordingly, though they have since surrendered it, after they knew the source from which it came. As to the sum of 4000 dollars mentioned in this indictment, Dabney testified, that holding certain valid securities which he had obtained from the sale of his farm, on which he expected to raise money enough to serve his immediate demands, but having been disappointed in the efforts which he had made for that purpose, and being afraid to remain longer in Richmond lest his 701 default should be discovered before he left *it, he took out of his department of the bank, of the money entrusted to his care, about the sum of 4000 dollars in bank notes and specie, and left at the same time in the place of it the valid securities aforesaid, to a greater amount than the money so taken, duly endorsed by him, with the intent that the bank should take possession of them, collect them, and indemnify itself for the money so taken. (These securities have been since actually collected, and the money received, by the bank.) The money so taken by Dabney was intended to be applied to his own use. And as to the sum of 900 dollars, the residue of the sum of 4900 dollars referred to in the preceding part of this statement, Dabney testified that it arose from a check drawn by the mother bank at Richmond on the branch bank at Lynchburg, by mistake for 1000 dollars, when it should have been drawn for 100 dollars.

When Dabney was remanded for trial before the circuit court, the called court refused him bail. But upon a writ of habeas corpus returnable to the general court, and upon proof of the facts herein before stated, that court admitted him to bail.* He has since been on bail from time to time until the present time, and has uniformly appeared in discharge of his recognizance. He has been indicted upon six indictments in this court, viz. that which has this day been called for trial, and five others; to all of which he is now willing to admit upon the record the facts such as he has testified to them, and he does so admit them.

Benjamin W. Green was also indicted upon 23 indictments, for imputed offences in obtaining the money aforesaid, which he had been permitted by Dabney to draw out of the bank. On one of them he was tried at the last fall term of this court, upon which trial Dabney was called on behalf of the commonwealth to give evidence, and 702 after a charge in relation to his testimony *similar to that given by the called court on his examination as a witness there, did give evidence substantially similar to that which was given by him before the examining court. Upon that trial Green was acquitted, and he was afterwards admitted to bail by the general court.† All the rest of the indictments against Green yet remain undisposed of.

The prisoner proposes to shew to this court, that his evidence before Green's called court, where he was examined and cross-examined for about a fortnight, was full, impartial, and perfectly satisfactory both to the court and to the attorney for the commonwealth prosecuting there: and when it shall be proper for him to present his case before the executive, he will ask this court, and the attorney for the commonwealth here, to certify their opinions of the fulness, the fairness, the integrity and the impartiality of his testimony here.

Whereupon the arguments of counsel on behalf of the prisoner and of the commonwealth having been heard, and the court being of opinion that the questions of law upon which this motion turns are novel and difficult, doth, with the consent of the prisoner, adjourn this case to the general court, and ask their opinion upon the following questions:

1. If a particeps criminis, on the trial of one of the parties to the crime, called as a witness on the part of the commonwealth, voluntarily give evidence, and fully, candidly and impartially disclose all the circumstances attending the transaction, as well those which involve his own guilt as those which involve the guilt of others, will he have an equitable title, or any title, to pardon for his own guilt, and will he have a right to demand from this court a continuance of his cause until he can have a fair opportunity to apply to the executive for that pardon?

*2. Is the english law, such as it is expounded by the twelve judges of England in the case of The king v. Rudd (reported in Cowper p. 332, and Leach's C. L. p. 115), law in Virginia?

3. When an accomplice is examined as a witness on behalf of the commonwealth against a particeps criminis, and in the course of a full and fair narrative of his evidence, and as an appropriate explanation thereof, he discloses a felony committed by himself in which the prisoner has not participated, such for example as may be the embezzling of 4000 dollars here charged upon Dabney, in which he does not allege that Green had any participation, has the witness so disclosing a felony any equitable claim to pardon under the law of England, or the law of this state? or any claim to have his trial postponed in order that he may apply for a pardon?

4. What judgment should be rendered on the motion now submitted? Ought the case to be continued until after the other indictments against Green are disposed of, or until the attorney prosecuting for the commonwealth shall dismiss Dabney as a witness, or until the prisoner shall have an opportunity to apply to the executive for a pardon prior to the trial of Green upon the other indictments? or ought the motion to be overruled?

The cause was argued here by the attorney general for the commonwealth, and Johnson, Scott and Stanard for the accused.

LEIGH, J. The counsel for Dabney in this court have contended that according to Rudd's case, 1 Leach's Cro. Ca. 115, an accomplice, who has been received by the court to give evidence against his associates, and who has fully and fairly given testimony against them, has a right to the recommendation of the court to the mercy of the executive, and a right to the pardon of the executive.

*In the case above referred to, lord Mansfield uses this language—"There is, besides, a practice which does not give a legal right; and that is, where an accomplice, having made a full and fair confession of the whole truth, is in consequence thereof admitted as a witness for the crown, and his evidence is afterwards made use of to convict the other offenders. If in that case he acts fairly and openly and discovers the whole truth, though he is not entitled of right to a pardon, yet the usage, the lenity and the practice of the court is to stop the prosecution against him, he having an equitable title to the recommendation of the court to the king's mercy." By this opinion the right to the pardon is denied to be a legal right, and is said to be a mere equitable one. It would seem then, that even in England this right to the recommendation of the court can hardly be said to be a right secured by the common law, but is a mere favour which the crown had determined to extend to accomplices. And we are the more inclined to consider this the correct view of the question, as this doctrine of the right of an accomplice to the recommendation of the court is to be found in none of the older writers on the common law. If this be the correct opinion, then this right of an accomplice never was introduced into the laws of this state.

But if it were established that this right of an accomplice was a part of the common law, we should still be of opinion that it never was a part of the law of this state: for no accomplice can, according to the constitution of our courts, be so received to give evidence as to entitle him to this right of pardon. According to the authorities, he must make a full confession of the whole truth. And according to the same authorities, neither the committing justice nor the prosecutor, nor even the attorney general, can so receive him; the power to receive him being given to the court alone.

In England the accused is always examined by the committing magistrate, who reduces this examination to writing, together with the testimony of the witnesses. In this examination an accomplice may make a full and fair confession of the whole truth, before a person authorized to receive it. But in this state the accused is never examined, and we do not see in what manner this previous confession of the whole truth is to be made. The committing magistrate and the prosecutor are unauthorized by any law to take it; nor has the court any such authority. But admitting that the court has the right, where and in what manner is the confession to be made? Is the judge to go to the jail, or to send for the accomplice to his private room, and receive his confession in secret? This would be contrary to our practice, which has always been to administer justice openly and in public. Or is the accomplice to be brought into court to make his full confession openly and publicly? This would be unjust to him: for the court may not receive him as a witness, and his confession in open court, perhaps in the presence of those who may afterwards be called upon to try him, might greatly prejudice his case. It would therefore seem that no mode is provided by our laws, in which the full confession, required of an accomplice by the practice of the courts in England before he will be permitted to give evidence against his associates, can be made. But if this difficulty were removed, no mode is pointed out by our laws, for procuring the testimony to enable the court to determine whether the accomplice ought or ought not to be received as a witness. According to the authorities cited, the admission in England of an accomplice to give evidence puts it in his power to entitle himself to a pardon. The permission, then, to give testimony is in effect the grant of the pardon. And surely the court ought to have all the evidence in the case, as well in respect to the accomplice as his associates, to enable it to decide whether it would be proper, in the particular case, to exercise the power of pardoning: otherwise it would often happen that the most guilty would secure his pardon, simply by giving evidence against others who had been led into guilt by the witness himself. It is probable that in England all the evidence is before the court, which may thus have the means of ascertaining the propriety of receiving the accomplice as a witness. But in this state, according to our present mode of proceeding, the evidence never is and never can be before the court. Therefore, if the right of an accomplice to a pardon were fully established in England, we should yet deny that the same right existed here.

We think, too, that the legislature, by enacting that "approvers shall never be admitted in any case whatsoever," (1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 59, p. 614,) has manifested its disapprobation of holding out impunity to an accomplice, as an inducement to him to become a witness against his associates. Indeed, some of the judges are of opinion that this law prohibits the offering of any such indemnity to an accomplice. But others of them think that the conditional right to pardon now contended for would not have been taken away by that law, if such right had existed at the time of the enactment. A majority of the court, however, are of opinion that the act in question evinces the legislative disapprobation of the principle now contended for in behalf of the accomplice. What was the objection to permitting an accomplice to become an approver? Certainly, that thereby he might be tempted to screen himself by giving false testimony against others. The right to pardon now insisted on holds out the same sort of temptation, though in a less objectionable manner. And as the legislature has manifested its disapprobation of holding out such a temptation in case the witness appeared in the character of an approver, we think it may fairly be inferred that it would equally disapprove of *holding out a temptation of a like kind where the witness appeared in the character of an accomplice. We think, too, that the act which prohibits the using against any person facts stated by him in his examination as a witness against another, furnishes some evidence, though perhaps not very strong evidence, that the legislature did not, at the passage of that act, regard the right, now contended for in behalf of the accomplice, as existing under our law. And we are of opinion that our law acknowledges no such right.

We are the better satisfied with this opinion, from the fact that the right has been established by no decision in our courts; and also from the fact that it has, as we firmly believe, never before been asserted or even heard of in our courts. Indeed, we regard Byrd's case, 2 Va. Cas. 490, as a pretty strong authority against the supposed right. We willingly admit that the point directly decided in that case was, that an accomplice is a competent witness. But the opinion declares also, that the accomplice is not exonerated from punishment; that he is not entitled to a pardon in case he succeed in convicting a fellow prisoner, nor is he subjected to punishment in consequence of his failure; that in both cases his acquittal or conviction will depend upon the evidence adduced on his own trial. We cannot believe that this broad denial of an exoneration from punishment, and of the right to pardon, would have been thus unconditionally stated, if the court had not been satisfied that the right now asserted had no existence; especially as Rudd's case appears to have been before the court. It is the daily practice to receive accomplices as witnesses; in many instances they have been put upon their trial after giving evidence against their associates, and in some instances they have been convicted: yet in no one instance have counsel claimed, or the court extended to the witness, the right now asserted. How is this to be accounted for? Not from *ignorance in the profession, (for Rudd's case has been for a long time generally known,) but from the universal opinion of the bench and bar that no such right existed. And we cannot readily admit that the whole profession has been, for such a length of time, in error in respect to a question which so frequently required their consideration.

It is said, that policy requires that this right should be secured to accomplices. We doubt this. We readily admit that accomplices would more frequently consent to give testimony against their associates, if by doing so they would secure a pardon for themselves. But even now, when the right claimed for them is denied, they are not very often believed by juries; and we think that if the right claimed were admitted, they would rarely be credited at all.

We have not considered, and we mean to express no opinion whatever on the general power of the courts of this commonwealth to recommend persons accused to the mercy of the executive. All we mean to say is, that an accomplice has no right to demand such a recommendation, merely because he has given evidence on the part of the commonwealth, fully, candidly and impartially.

DUNCAN, J. The majority of the court not resting its decision on the same precise grounds on which some of the judges are inclined to place it, I shall very briefly assign the grounds of my opinion.

The point on which all the questions adjourned in this case turn, is, whether an accomplice, who gives testimony against his associates fairly and openly, has a right to demand from the court in which he is tried for the same offence, a recommendation to the executive for a pardon; and whether the doctrine of the english courts upon this subject, as expounded in Rudd's case, is in force in this state.

709 *Rudd's case was decided in 1775, and it was there for the first time distinctly adjudged, that an accomplice giving testimony fully and fairly against his associates in crime has an equitable right to a pardon, and that the court will recommend him to mercy, and will stay the proceedings against him to enable him to apply for a pardon. The doctrine, as settled in Rudd's case, undoubtedly sprang out of the ancient law of approvement, and was merely a modification thereof. That law, as it anciently existed, had, long before the decision of Rudd's case, become obsolete. Sir Matthew Hale, a century before, had stated (2 Hale's P. C. 226), that "the admitting of approvers had long been disused." But in his time accomplices were admitted as witnesses, and it became a part of the policy of that country, in order to aid in discovery and punishment of crimes, to encourage accomplices to give evidence against their fellows, by holding out to them the promise of a pardon if they made full and fair disclosures; and the english courts, in furtherance of this policy, so moulded the common law doctrine of approvement, as to get rid of some of the objectionable features of the law as anciently practised and understood, and at the same time to carry out the public policy. Such seems to me to have been the foundation of the decision in Rudd's case.

Thus the law stood in England, and of course in the colonies, until the revolution. Soon thereafter, in 1789, the legislature of Virginia, with a knowledge that the ancient law of approvement had been obsolete for more than a century, and with a knowledge of its modification by the english courts in Rudd's case, passed a statute declaring that "approvers shall never be admitted in any case whatsoever." Now, as the ancient law of approvers, as technically understood, had long been obsolete, there was no necessity for the legislature

710 to repeal it; but as Rudd's case had been but recently *decided, modifying the law of approvement, it is clear to my mind that the legislature had a sepecial view to that modification of it by the english courts; and this seems to me to be the more probable, from the fact that the reason assigned by sir Matthew Hale for the law of approvement as anciently practised having become obsolete, applied with almost equal strength to the modification of the rule as settled in Rudd's case. The reason assigned by him is, that "more mischief hath come to good men by these kinds of approvements, by false accusation of desperate villains, than benefit to the public by the discovery and convicting of real offenders." The only difference between the ancient law of approvement and its modern modification is, that in the former the approver must confess his crime, and if he fails to effect a conviction of his confederate, he is to be punished, but if there is a conviction, then he is entitled to a pardon unconditionally. The modern doctrine does not require that the accomplice shall confess his guilt, or that his associate shall be convicted; but if he gives his testimony fully and fairly, the court is pledged to recommend, and the executive to grant, a pardon. Can there be any material difference in the degree of evil that would be likely to arise "to good men by false accusations of desperate villains?" In either case, the price held out to the accomplice for his evidence is a pardon for his own crime: in either case, he is an approver. So, I infer, the legislature supposed. And such was undoubtedly the interpretation by the courts of the country, of the statute passed in 1789, abrogating approvements; as is proved by the opinion of the elder judge Tucker, contained in a note to 4 Tucker's Blackstone p. 331. This able jurist states expressly, that the virginian statute repealing the law of approvement was understood to exclude the adoption of the principle settled by the english courts in Rudd's case; although he seems to regret that accomplices 711 *in this county were not placed upon the footing of accomplices in England.

And I think it may be fairly inferred that the suggestion of judge Tucker, in his note referred to, gave rise to the passage of the subsequent statute of 1811, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 131, § 6, p. 517, in which the legislature (for the purpose, no doubt, of holding out to accomplices an inducement to give evidence against their associates) provided that the testimony of a witness should not be used as evidence in any trial against himself. If the law of approvement, as modified in Rudd's case, were in force, then it became unnecessary to hold out to accomplices any such inducements as were held out by the statute of 1811; for the principle of Rudd's case placed them in a better situation; they became entitled to a pardon under the implied faith of the government, whilst under the statute they might be tried and convicted without any claim to pardon. And we find that the general court, in Byrd's case, decided in 1826, expressly say (although in this respect the opinion was obiter) that the accomplice who gives evidence against his associates is not entitled to a pardon. In New York, it is true, it has been decided in Whipple's case, 9 Cowen 707, that the law of England as settled in Rudd's case was the law of that state: and under different circumstances that decision ought to have great weight here. But in New York there was no statute such as that passed in Virginia in 1789, abrogating approvements, nor any such as that passed in 1811. The reason assigned by the court of New York in Whipple's case, while it was in strict conformity with the principles of the common law of approvements as modified by the english courts in Rudd's case, is wholly inapplicable to this state.

I am of opinion, therefore, that although the judge who shall try the prisoner in this case may recommend him to the executive for a pardon, it is not his official duty to do so; that it is only an act of favour, 712 which *the judge, the jury, or any person may extend. I am of opinion, also, that the court ought not to continue the prisoner's case, merely to enable him to apply for a pardon.

DOUGLASS and NICHOLAS, J., dissented from both the foregoing opinions, and from the judgment of the court, which was as follows—

This court is of opinion, and doth decide, First, That if a particeps criminis, on the trial of one of the parties to the crime, called as a witness on the part of the commonwealth, voluntarily give evidence, and fully, candidly and impartially disclose all the circumstances attending the transaction, as well those which involve his own guilt as those which involve the guilt of others, he will yet have no right, which a court of law will recognize, to a pardon for his own guilt, and therefore he will have no right to demand from the court a continuance of his cause, until he can have an opportunity to apply to the executive for such pardon.

Secondly, That the court ought in this case to overrule the motion.

PARDONS.

- I. What Pardoning Power Includes.
- II. Conditional Pardons.
- III. Effect of Pardon.
- IV. The Doctrine of Approvers.
- V. Plea of Pardon.

I. WHAT PARDONING POWER INCLUDES.

Nature and Effect of Power.—By the constitution of Virginia, the governor is empowered to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction, except when the prosecution has been carried on by the house of delegates, and to remit fines and penalties in such cases and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law. He is also empowered to remove political disabilities consequent upon conviction for offences, and to commute capital punishment. Va. Const., art. 4, sec. 5; Edwards v. Com., 78 Va. 89.

So in West Virginia, power to reprieve is vested in the governor by the constitution, in all cases of felony, where the necessity therefor exists. He is sole judge of such necessity, and his conclusions are not reviewable by the courts, but are binding on the other departments of the government. State v. Hawk, 47 W. Va. 484, 34 S. E. Rep. 918. See art. 7, sec. 11, W. Va. Const.

Governor May Pardon before Prisoner is Sentenced.—Though the Virginia constitution provides that the governor shall have power to pardon only after conviction, it has been held that the governor has authority to pardon a person convicted of a felony by the verdict of a jury, before sentence is passed upon him by the court. Blair v. Com., 35 Gratt. 850.

Governor Has No Power to Commute Except in Capital Case.—In Virginia the governor can only commute the punishment in capital cases. But in a case, other than a capital case, in which the warrant of the governor spoke as commuting the punishment, it was held that, as it substituted a less for a greater punishment, and was intended to be done, and was done, with the consent of the prisoner, it would be considered a pardon, and not a commutation of the punishment. Lee v. Murphy, 22 Gratt. 789.

Where Person is Fined and Imprisoned the Fine Cannot Be Remitted.—Where a person is convicted of a misdeemeanor and a fine is imposed upon him, and the court sentences him to be imprisoned until the fine is paid, the governor has no authority to remit the fine, though he may remit the imprisonment. Wilkerson v. Allan, 23 Gratt. 10.

Pardon Granted by Legislature.—In Com. v. Caton, 4 Call 5, the supreme court held void a resolution adopted by the state senate, but not concurred in by the lower house, whereby a pardon was sought to be granted to certain parties convicted of treason.

II. CONDITIONAL PARDONS.

The governor has authority under the constitution to grant a conditional pardon to a prisoner convicted of a felony. But the condition annexed to the pardon must not be impossible, immoral or illegal; but it may, with the consent of the prisoner, be any punishment recognized by statute, or by the common law as enforced in this state. Lee v. Murphy, 22 Gratt. 789. See also, Com. v. Fowler, 4 Call 85; Ball v. Com., 8 Leigh 730.

III. EFFECT OF PARDON.

Relieves of Punishment and Consequences of Conviction.—The governor's pardon relieves the offender not only of the punishment annexed to the offense whereof he was convicted, but of all penalties and consequences, including the additional punishment imposable, not by reason of the sentence for the second offense alone, but in consequence of that sentence and the sentence in the former case. There is, however, this limitation to the rule: it does not remove political disabilities growing out of his conviction and sentence, nor does it restore an office forfeited, or rights become vested in others by reason of the conviction and sentence. Edwards v. Com., 78 Va. 39. See Puryear v. Com., 83 Va. 51, 1 S. E. Rep. 512.

Distinction between Pardon and Acquittal.—The distinction between a pardon and an acquittal is that a pardon discharges from punishment only, while an acquittal discharges from guilt. Ball v. Com., 8 Leigh 726.

Does Not Release Prisoner from Liability for Costs.—Where, previous to obtaining a pardon, a prisoner is liable for the costs incurred in prosecution, the mere grant of the pardon by the governor does not release him from liability for these costs. Anglea v. Com., 10 Gratt. 696.

For Participating in Rebellion.—A pardon granted by the federal government to rebels, restores the parties to the rights and privileges held or derived from it only. Hence the fact that an attorney, who participated in the rebellion, has been pardoned by the federal government, does not entitle him to be admitted to practice his profession in the state courts without complying with the terms of the act in relation thereto. Ex parte Hunter, 2 W. Va. 122.

Where one person has a right of action against another for trespass committed during the rebellion, and the latter is pardoned by the federal government for participating in the rebellion, this does not bar the former's right of action. Hedges v. Price, 2 W. Va. 192.

So where a party is sued for false arrest and imprisonment, committed by him during the war, and while he was in the service of a so-called confederate state, a pardon granted to him by the president of the United States, granting amnesty for all offenses committed by him, arising from participation in the rebellion, is not proper or competent evidence. Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 138; Caperton v. Bowyer, 4 W. Va. 176.

IV. THE DOCTRINE OF APPROVERS.

The English doctrine relating to the admission of approvers seems never to have been incorporated into the law of this state. And though a particeps criminis, called as a witness for the commonwealth on the trial of his accomplice, voluntarily gives evidence, and fully, candidly and impartially discloses all the circumstances attending the transaction, as well those which involve his own guilt as those which involve the guilt of others, he will yet have no right to a pardon for his own guilt. Com. v. Dabney, 1 Rob. 696; Oliver v. Com., 77 Va. 590.

V. PLEA OF PARDON.

The plea of pardon may be made after conviction in response to the question whether the accused has anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced. Blair v. Com., 25 Gratt. 850.

713 Phalen v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1842.

Lotteries—Privilege of Conducting—Constitutional Law†—Obligation of Contracts.—On the 30th of January 1829, a statute is passed appointing commissioners to superintend the raising by way of lottery the sum of 30,000 dollars, to be paid to the president and directors of a turnpike company for the improvement and repair of their road, and authorizing the commissioners to contract with some proper person for managing and conducting the lottery. The turnpike company, relying on the benefit of the statute, contract debts for the erection and completion of their road, expecting and intending to raise money for the payment thereof by a lottery; such debts being contracted prior to the 25th of February 1834, on which day a statute is passed enacting that it shall not be lawful to draw any lottery within the commonwealth, or to sell any ticket in a lottery to be drawn therein, after the 1st of January 1837, but providing that nothing in the statute contained shall interfere with contracts already made for the drawing of lotteries to extend beyond the 1st of January 1837, or with contracts to be thereafter made, under existing laws, for the drawing of lotteries not to extend beyond the 1st of January 1840. On the 11th of March 1834, a statute is passed appointing two persons commissioners, in place of two of the commissioners appointed by the act of January 1829 (who had resigned), to carry into effect the last mentioned act. No contract for the drawing of the lottery is made by the commissioners until the 19th of December 1839, when they make a contract for that purpose with J. P. who, after the 1st of January 1840, sells a ticket in the lottery, which is proposed to be drawn within the commonwealth. On presentment against J. P. for selling the ticket, HELD, 1. The act of February 1834 did not impair the obligation of any contract, expressly or impliedly made by the commonwealth with the turnpike company, nor contravene any right of private property vested in the company. 2. The act of March 1834 appointing new commissioners, had not the effect of exempting the lottery authorized by the act of January 1829, from the operation of the act of February 1834.

*For monographic note on Lotteries, see end of case.

†See monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

A presentment was made in the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, at October term 1840, against James Phalen, charging that he, since the 1st of January 1837, to wit, on the 1st of June 1840, at the city aforesaid, 714 unlawfully did sell and *cause to be sold one certain lottery ticket in a certain lottery to be drawn in this commonwealth, to wit, in a lottery called Alexandria and Fauquier turnpike lottery, and then and there advertised to be drawn at ———, the said lottery not being a lottery authorized to be drawn by any contract made with this commonwealth prior to the 25th day of February 1834, or by any contract made since in pursuance of any law of this commonwealth passed prior to the said 25th of February 1834, the drawing of which lottery was not to extend by virtue of said last mentioned contract beyond the 1st day of January 1840; contrary to the act of assembly in such case made. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and the jury impaneled for the trial returned special verdict, in which the following facts were found.

In November 1828, the president and directors of the Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike road presented a petition to the legislature, calling their attention to the importance of that road to the public, and to the fact that the state had an interest in it; stating that the directors and a few of the stockholders, upon their own responsibility, had raised money by which the road was then in excellent condition, except about three miles, which required much repair; and for that object, and the repayment of the money borrowed, praying the passage of a law authorizing a lottery to raise the sum of 30,000 dollars.

In consequence of this petition, a law was passed on the 30th of January 1829, (Acts of 1828-9, ch. 101, p. 99,) by the first section whereof it was enacted "that Hugh Smith, Jacob Morgan, John Loyd, William Dean and Jacob Douglass be and they are hereby appointed commissioners, whose duty it shall be to superintend the raising, by way of lottery or lotteries, the sum of thirty thousand dollars, for the purpose of improving the Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike road." The 2d section enacted "that the said commissioners, 715 or a majority *of them, shall be and they are hereby authorized to contract and agree with some fit and proper person or persons for managing and conducting the said lottery or lotteries." And the 4th section enacted "that the sum hereby authorized to be raised by the said lottery or lotteries, so soon as the whole or any part thereof shall be received by the said commissioners, shall be paid over to the president and directors of the said Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike road company, and by them appropriated in the improvement and repair of the said road."

By an act passed the 25th of February 1834, (Acts of 1833-4, ch. 69, p. 81,) it was enacted, "That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to draw or cause to be drawn any lottery or lotteries, or any scheme or schemes in any lottery, within this commonwealth, after the first day of January eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, or to sell or cause to be sold any lottery ticket, or part of any lottery ticket, in any lottery to be drawn therein. And if any person or persons shall, after that day, set up or draw, or cause to be set up or drawn, at any place within the limits of this commonwealth, any lottery whatsoever, every person concerned directly or indirectly as a manager or conductor of such lottery shall be liable to a fine, at the discretion of a jury, of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars for each offence; and every person who shall be concerned directly or indirectly in setting up or drawing any lottery in any other character than as a manager or conductor thereof, shall be liable to a fine of not less than twenty dollars nor more than one hundred dollars for each offence, at the discretion of a jury. And if any person shall, after the period aforesaid, sell any lottery ticket or any part or share thereof, either in person or by proxy, or shall act as agent, attorney or proxy in making sale of any lottery ticket, or any part or share thereof, in any such lottery, he shall forfeit

716 and *pay for every such offence the sum of twenty dollars. And the several penalties in this act provided shall be recovered by action of debt, presentment, indictment or information in any court of record having jurisdiction of the offence, one half to the informer or person who may sue for the same, and the other half to the commonwealth. Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to or interfere with contracts already made for the drawing of any lottery or lotteries, the drawing whereof, by the provisions of such contract, shall extend to a period beyond the said first day of January eighteen hundred and thirty-seven: And provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to or interfere with any contract which may hereafter be made under and by virtue of any existing law authorizing the same, for the drawing of any lottery the drawing whereof shall not extend beyond the first day of January eighteen hundred and forty."

By an act passed the 11th of March 1834, (Acts of 1833-4, ch. 137, p. 171,) it was enacted (§ 1), "that William L. Hodgson and Bernard Hooe be and they are hereby appointed commissioners, instead of Hugh Smith and John Loyd, resigned, to carry into effect the act passed on the thirtieth day of January eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, 'to authorize the raising by way of lottery a sum of money for improving the Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike road.'" And (§ 2), "That whenever any vacancy or vacancies shall hereafter occur in the commissioners appointed for the purpose aforesaid, by death, resignation, or refusal to act, the same shall be filled by the executive of this commonwealth."

company, relying upon the benefit and advantages of the act of January 1829, did, prior to the 25th of February 1834, enter into contracts and incur debts for the erection and completion of their road, expecting and intending to *raise by a lottery, for the payment thereof, the money authorized by the said act of 1829. And the commissioners of the said company did, under the acts of 1829 and March 1834, for the purposes specified in the act of 1829, enter into a contract with the said James Phalen and a certain Francis Morris on the 19th of December 1839, whereby, after reciting the provisions of the said act of 1829, it was witnessed that the said commissioners, parties of the first part, in consideration of the sums of money thereafter agreed to be paid to them by the said Phalen and Morris, parties of the second part, did appoint the said parties of the second part the sole and exclusive managers and conductors of the lotteries aforesaid, and did covenant and agree that such appointment should not be revoked by them or any of them, and that the sole and exclusive right of drawing the said lottery or lotteries, so far as the parties of the first part were by the law aforesaid authorized to contract for the same, should be and remain vested in the parties of the second part, until the payments thereafter stipulated to be made by them should amount to the sum of 30,000 dollars authorized to be made by the said act; to be used and exercised by the parties of the second part, by drawing so many lotteries as they might think proper, under such scheme or schemes as they might devise. And the parties of the second part agreed to take on themselves the management of the lottery and lotteries aforesaid, and to pay to the parties of the first part, as the consideration of the said contract or agency, the sum of 1500 dollars per annum, to be computed from the 2d of December 1839, and in that proportion for any part of a year. It was further agreed, That if, during the then session of the general assembly, an act should be procured exempting the lottery and lotteries authorized by the act of 1829 from the operation of the act of February 25, 1834, the parties of the second part would pay to the *parties of the first part an additional compensation at the rate of 1000 dollars per annum, the payment of the said additional sum to date from the passage of such act. That whereas the constitutionality of the act of February 25, 1834 had been doubted, the parties of the second part, in case no act should be passed during the then session of the general assembly, exempting the lotteries authorized by the act of 1829 from the operation of the act of 1834, would, at their own proper expense, use all ways and means which might be expedient and necessary, to have settled and determined the constitutionality of the last mentioned act, and would, by appeal, or in such other way as should be legal and necessary, obtain on that point the sentence, judgment or decree of the highest legal tribunals of the state of Virginia and of the United States, to which the question could be taken. That if, before a final decision of the said question should be obtained, and after the end of the then session of the general assembly, an act of that assembly should be procured suspending the operation of the act of February 1834 in regard to the lottery and lotteries aforesaid, the parties of the second part would, in lieu of the payments before provided, pay to the parties of the first part, during the period of such suspension, the sum of 2000 dollars per annum, and at that rate for any portion of a year, to date from the passage of such act; till which time, the payments before agreed on were to be made. That the payments aforesaid, and all rights and powers of the parties of the second part to continue to act under the contract, or to draw any lottery or lotteries under the same, should cease as soon as, from the payments to be made under the foregoing provisions, the parties of the first part should have received the said sum of 30,000 dollars. That if, by any legal proceedings, the parties of the second part should be prevented from drawing the lottery or lotteries aforesaid, then the payments before stipulated to be made by them should cease and determine during the time they should be so prevented, and their liability to make any such payments should only recommence on the decision of the highest judicial tribunal to which the question could be taken, that the act of February 1834 is unconstitutional, or on the removal of such legal impediments.

The defendant James Phalen was, at the time of the presentment against him, one of the managers of the said lottery authorized by the aforesaid acts of January 1829 and March 1834; and under the said acts, and by virtue of the said contract, acting for the said James Phalen and Francis Morris, he sold the ticket in the presentment mentioned, at the city of Richmond and within the jurisdiction of this court. The said lottery was to be drawn in the commonwealth of Virginia.

If, upon the foregoing state of facts, the law should be for the commonwealth, then the jury found the defendant guilty; but if the law should be for the defendant, then they found him not guilty.

The matters of law arising upon the special verdict being argued, the circuit court held that the law was for the commonwealth, and rendered judgment that the defendant forfeit and pay to the commonwealth 20 dollars, and that he pay the costs of the prosecution. A writ of error to the judgment was awarded by this court, upon a petition of the defendant alleging that the same was erroneous for the reasons following: 1. Because the act of February 1834 does not profess to repeal, and does not repeal, the act of January 1829 which conferred the right to draw the lottery, and therefore the petitioner had lawful authority to sell the lottery ticket in the presentment mentioned. 2. Because the 720 *act of March 1834 is to be regarded as reenacting the law of January 1829, and being posterior in date to the law of February 1834, if there be any inconsistency between the two laws, the posterior must prevail. 3. Because the right to draw the lottery, conferred by the act of January 1829, was a valuable franchise and vested right, which it was not competent to the legislature to revoke; therefore if the act of February 1834 is to be regarded as revoking the right, it is unconstitutional and void, and whether it be so regarded or not, the petitioner ought to have been acquitted.

*The petition to the legislature, the several acts of assembly, and the contract for drawing the lottery, mentioned in this report, were fully set forth in hæc verba in the special verdict.—Note in Original Edition.

The cause was argued here by Lyons, Stanard and Robinson for the plaintiff in error, and Scott and Brooke for the commonwealth.

SUMMERS, J., delivered the opinion of the majority of the court.—This cause has been fully and ably discussed, and under other circumstances the judges would have adverted more fully to the reasonings and illustrations which have been submitted to them, and to the authorities to which their consideration has been directed. The time necessarily occupied in a careful examination of the leading principles relied on, has, however, left them but a limited space for embodying their decision, with some of the prominent considerations by which they have been governed; and they therefore content themselves with shortly announcing the conclusions at which they have arrived after a very careful examination of the whole case.

The Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike company, even with the aid of the government subscription to their capital, found their road incomplete, and their resources inadequate to the repayment of money borrowed and expended in the construction of the work; and in the winter of 1828-9 applied to the general assembly for permission to raise 30,000 dollars by a lottery.

721 *This application resulted in the act of the 30th January 1829, authorizing certain commissioners therein named to contract with fit and proper persons for managing and conducting the lottery or lotteries, and for raising thereby the sum of money before mentioned, to be applied to the improvement and repair of the road.

The expediency and moral propriety of raising money for public purposes by means of lotteries, at all times questionable, seems to have attracted legislative consideration in 1834, and to have resulted in a change of the course of our public policy in relation to lotteries, giving rise to the act of the 25th of February 1834. By this act, the drawing of lotteries and the selling of lottery tickets within the state, after the 1st of January 1837, are prohibited under heavy penalties; with a proviso in favour of lotteries for the drawing of which contracts had been previously made, leaving all such lotteries and the drawings thereof to be governed by the preexisting laws; and a second proviso, declaring that nothing contained in the act should be construed to extend to or interfere with any contract subsequently made for the drawing of any previously authorized lottery, if the drawing thereof should not extend beyond the first of January 1840. The lottery authorized on behalf of the Fauquier and Alexandria turnpike company, falling within the terms of the latter proviso, might, according to the provisions of the act, be contracted for and drawn in one or more lotteries or classes, until the sum of 30,000 dollars was raised by the commissioners for the improvement and repair of the road; provided these operations did not extend beyond the 1st of January 1840.

From the resignation of two of the commissioners, no measures were taken for the execution of the act of the 30th January 1829, until the 11th of March 1834, fourteen days after the passage of the prohibitory 722 act; when the same legislature, by an act of that date, appointed *commissioners in place of those who had resigned, and authorized the executive to fill any vacancies that might subsequently occur.

It is earnestly and ingeniously contended that the provisions of the act of March 1834 are repugnant to those contained in the act of the 25th of the previous month, in this, that the appointment of the new commissioners, and the power given to the executive to fill subsequent vacancies in their number, are equivalent to the reenactment of the act of 1829 with the new provisions incorporated therein; which, forming a grant of the lottery right without limitation of time as to the exercise of it, are repugnant to and operate a repeal of the provisions in the act of February 1834, limiting the exercise of the right to the first of January 1840.

The constructive repeal of statutes is in all cases to be avoided, where the legislative intendment may be otherwise satisfied, and the supposed repugnancy reconciled by a construction giving effect to both. These two statutes, enacted by the same lawgivers within two weeks of each other, present a case which strikingly imposes this duty upon the court. We think the duty performed by regarding the last statute as reviving, under the limitation as to time prescribed by the former, the original statute of 1829; thus giving to the turnpike company the full benefit of their lottery privilege for nearly six years, and forbidding its exercise beyond that period. This restriction of the right in point of time is, we think, no more than an application of the ordinary legislative power of limiting the exercise of even vested and ascertained rights, where the public weal or the safety of society may require it. If this construction reconciling the provisions of those acts were doubtful, we should find a strong motive for its adoption, in the necessity of recognizing in the legislature the power to correct improvident and sometimes injurious enactments, where they may not have 723 ripened into contracts, *or resulted in the investment of rights which cannot be invaded without perfidy or bad faith.

The contemporaneous and subsequent acts regulating the licensing of the venders of lottery tickets, and imposing taxes upon them, cannot, as contended, operate a repeal of the act of February 1834, as the sale of tickets in lotteries the drawing of which had been contracted for before that date, and of tickets in foreign lotteries, was and yet is authorized by law, and the sale of other descriptions of lottery tickets only became unlawful after the 1st of January 1840; leaving to the keepers of lottery offices a field of operation to which the license and tax laws applied. And the increased rates of taxation on such licenses, instead of furnishing any implication of the legislative intent to abandon the policy of the restraining act of February 1834, evince an increased solicitude to repress this immoral and sometimes ruinous pursuit of gain, by the requisition of heavier contributions to the treasury from the lottery offices.

The judgment of the circuit court is, however, impugned on a graver ground. It is contended that the act of the 30th of January 1829 conferred on the turnpike company a franchise under which expenditures of money were made, and formed an implied contract between the government and the company, that the latter should enjoy, unimpaired, all the rights and advantages enuring to them under the act, until they should realize under its provisions the sum of 30,000 dollars: that the act of February 1834, limiting and restraining the exercise of the rights of the company to the 1st of January 1840, impairs the obligation of this contract, and is therefore void: and that the franchise with which the company was thus invested, entered into and became a part of the property of the corporation, of which, under the constitution of Virginia, they could not be deprived without just compensation. This argument submits 724 *to this court the solemn duty of comparing the provisions of the act of February 1834 with the paramount law, and of pronouncing whether those provisions are void or valid. This important judicial function, which results from the structure of our government, is, happily for the country, not often called into action; but when demanded by the occasion, it will be exercised with firmness, and the question considered with the care and deliberation called for by its importance.

In deciding this case, it becomes necessary to consider the nature and quality of the franchise, if it be one, which is granted to the turnpike company by the act of January 1829.

A franchise may consist in personal privilege or exemption, or in rights or privileges connected with personal or real estate; and in the latter aspect it is a species of incorporeal hereditament. The one under consideration may be properly characterized as a liberty or license to effect a particular purpose by prescribed means; which may or may not, at particular periods of its existence, and by reason of the rights and immunities which have sprung from its exercise, give rise to an implied contract or obligation for preserving it, and guarding it from injurious modifications, or become an element of private property, beyond the reach of the power of government, without due compensation. In looking into the inception and qualities of this privilege or license, it is found that the company had borrowed money for the construction and repair of the road, which circumstance formed, among others, an inducement to apply for a lottery; yet the act directs that the funds to be raised thereby shall be appropriated to the improvement and repair of the road. It is stated in the verdict, that the company, relying on the benefit and advantages of the act of January 1829, did, 725 prior to the 25th of February 1834, enter into contracts and incur *debts for the erection and completion of their road, expecting and intending to raise money for the payment thereof by the lottery: but whether these are inconsiderable amounts referred to for the purpose of giving colour, or amounts of sufficient magnitude necessarily to couple the lottery privilege with their security and payment, does not appear. Be this as it may, however, about five years elapsed without any successful attempt to render the lottery effective; and then the only measure was the act appointing two new commissioners, by which the company was again placed in a situation to render its privilege available. Five years more rolled on, when, within eleven days of the time at which the act of February 1834 went into operation, the contract of the 19th of December 1839, between the commissioners and Phalen and Morris, was entered into. Throughout this whole period, the franchise, liberty, license or privilege remained, as on the day of its enactment, a naked authority to contract for and draw a lottery, and, in the opinion of the court, at no time took the form of a contract, either express or implied, or that of private property, over which the legislative power was restrained. As to the power of the general assembly to limit, change or abolish a lottery privilege whenever the preservation and inculcation of sound morals may require it, we do not find it necessary to express any opinion; being satisfied, without reference to the general power, committed to that body, of guarding the public weal, that the act of the 25th February 1834 was not in contravention of any legal right, vested in the turnpike company, and coming within the constitutional provisions on which the argument of the case has placed this question.

Separating the question from the general powers claimed on behalf of the commonwealth to reside in the legislative department of the government, to our minds it is manifest that this dormant right to draw *the lottery, which was revived by the act of March 1834, must be taken as subordinate to and limited by the act of the 25th of the previous month; that those statutes must be taken as in pari materia, and receive the same construction as if embodied in one act; that there is nothing repugnant in the provisions of the one to those of the other, when the first is taken as limiting the time within which the right under the second is to be exercised; and that the well ascertained principles governing the construction of statutes not only authorize but require the interpretation which we have given to these contemporary acts.

There are provisions in the contract of the 19th December 1839, fully contemplating the questions now discussed, and indicating the submission of them to this court as an experiment in reference to the before mentioned statutes; but we have examined those questions without regard to the motives which may have brought this cause here, or which may carry it further; leaving our decision to be reviewed, if that power exists elsewhere.

LOTTERIES.

What Amounts to Lottery.—A guarantee, or written assurance or promise, whereby the warrantor binds himself that he will pay the prize which may be drawn to a certain number in a lottery, when sold by the proprietor of a lottery, or a duly authorized agent of the proprietor, is strictly a lottery ticket, although it is not written in the usual form of lottery tickets; and the sale of such guarantee by such proprietor or his agent, is forbidden by the act of 1825. Com. v. Chubb, 5 Rand. 715.

But taking a chance in a raffle is not the same offence as the purchase of foreign lottery tickets, and is not punishable under the act prohibiting that offence. Com. v. Garland, 5 Rand. 652.

Repeal of Privilege of Conducting Lottery.—The privilege of conducting a lottery is not a contract. Any one, therefore, who accepts a lottery charter does so with the implied understanding that the people in their sovereign capacity, and through their properly constituted agencies, may repeal it at any time when the public good shall require, whether it be paid for or not. Justice v. Com., 81 Va. 209; Dismal Swamp Canal Co. v. Com., 81 Va. 220; Phalen v. Com., 1 Rob. 713.

Applying this rule, it was held that the act of Feb. 25, 1834, for suppressing after a certain period, the drawing of lotteries within the state and the sale of tickets in lotteries to be drawn therein, except as to lotteries already authorized, did not impair the obligation of any contract for any franchise already made. Phalen v. Com., 1 Rob. 713.

Party Indicted Not Entitled to Continuance.—Under sec. 4010, Va. Code, where a person is indicted for conducting a lottery, process may issue immediately, and if the accused appears and pleads to the charge the trial shall proceed without delay.

Hence where the accused appears and pleads to the charge and moves for a continuance it is no error for the trial court to refuse a continuance. Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840.

Self-Crimination by Party Indicted for Conducting a Lottery.—The statute (Code 1873, ch. 196, sec. 20) which provides that a witness giving evidence in a prosecution for unlawful gaming shall never be proceeded against for any offence of unlawful gaming committed by him at the time and place indicated in such prosecution, does not apply to a prosecution for managing and conducting a lottery; and a witness cannot be required to testify in such case if he will thereby criminate himself. Temple v. Com., 75 Va. 892.

Effect of Mistake in Drawing a Lottery.—A mistake in the drawing of a lottery is fatal, and a redrawing must take place. Madison v. Vaughan, 5 Call 562.

Liability of Subscriber to Creditors of Concern Who Conduct the Lottery.—In Cardwell v. Kelly, 95 Va. 572, 28 S. E. Rep. 953, a subscriber to the stock of a corporation, who was allured to make the subscription by the chance of being allotted a lot or lots in a drawing for distribution of lots of unequal value, was held liable for the money due on his subscription to the creditors of the corporation, whose debts were contracted upon the faith of his and other subscriptions. Indictment*—Building Fence across Road.—Indictment on statute of 1834-5, ch. 77, § 20, against owner and tenant of land through which a public road passes, for building a fence across a portion of the road, and continuing the fence so built across said road for three days, HELD sufficient on demurrer.

Same—Same—Evidence.—On trial of such indictment, court refuses an instruction asked by defendant, that the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that the fence was built across the road: HELD, the instruction was properly refused.

Same—Same—Verdict—Judgment.—Verdict on such indictment finds defendant guilty, and assesses his amercement to five dollars; and judgment is rendered for the amercement and costs: HELD, there is no error in such proceeding.

An indictment was found in the county court of Greenbrier against Thomas M'Clintic, charging that he did, on the 22d of November 1839, "build a fence across a portion of the public road in the county aforesaid, leading from &c. being then and there owner and tenant of the lands through which said public road runs, and did then and there continue the said fence so built as aforesaid across said public road, from the said 22d day of November 1839 to the 25th day of November 1839, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made"

*See monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674.

†The statute of March 3, 1835 (Acts of 1834-5, ch. 77, § 20, p. 66, 7), enacts, that if any person shall obstruct a public road by fencing or otherwise, he shall for-

&c. The defendant demurred to the indictment, and the court overruled the demurrer. He then pleaded not guilty. At the trial, he moved the court to instruct the jury, that, under this indictment, they must be satisfied from the evidence,

728 mentioned was built across the public road therein mentioned: which instruction the court refused to give; and he excepted to the refusal. The jury found him guilty, and assessed his amercement to five dollars, and the court rendered judgment against him for the said amercement and the costs of the prosecution. That judgment was affirmed in the circuit court of Greenbrier, upon a writ of error thereto sued out by the defendant: and the general court awarded a writ of error to the judgment of affirmance, upon a petition of the defendant assigning for error, 1. that his demurrer to the indictment was improperly overruled, the charge of building a fence across a portion of the road being insufficient; 2. that the instruction he asked for at the trial was improperly refused; 3. that it was improper for the jury to assess an amercement by their verdict, instead of merely finding how long the fence had been continued across the road, and leaving the court to render judgment for the fine ascertained by law.

BROWN, J. I am of opinion that the indictment in this case is bad, and ought to have been so adjudged on the demurrer thereto: I should therefore be for reversing the judgment of the county court sustaining the indictment, and of the circuit court affirming the same, and for giving a judgment here in favour of the defendant. But a majority of the court being of opinion that the indictment is good, and that the judgment ought not to be reversed on that ground, I can see no error in the refusal of the county court to give the instruction set out in the bill of exceptions, and am therefore for affirming the judgment.

The Commonwealth v. Cook.

December, 1842.

Indictment*—Perjury—Insolvents Swearing to Schedule.—Indictment against an insolvent debtor for perjury in swearing to a schedule which did not discover certain debts owing to him, held bad on demurrer, for not averring that he well knew and remembered that the omitted debts were then justly due and owing to him.

John Cook was indicted in the circuit superior court of Pendleton county, at May term 1841, for perjury in falsely swearing to a schedule delivered in by him under the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 31, p. 536, 7. The indictment charged that the defendant did wilfully, corruptly and falsely swear that the schedule contained to the best of his knowledge and remembrance, a full account of all his estate and such debts as were owing to him, when in truth certain debts owing to him (which were described in the indictment) "were not em-730 braced or included in *the said schedule so subscribed and delivered by the said Cook, and the said Cook then and there well knew and remembered that the said schedule did not contain the said debts." But there was no averment that the defendant knew or remembered that the debts omitted in the schedule were owing to him.

The defendant demurred to the indictment: whereupon, with his consent, the court adjourned to this court the question, What judgment ought to be given upon the demurrer?

A written argument of the case was submitted by R. Gray for the defendant.

SMITH, J., delivered the resolution of the court.—Without deciding, or meaning to express an opinion, upon any other question raised or arising in this cause, we are all of opinion that the indictment is fatally defective in not averring that the defendant, at the time of giving in the schedule and taking the oath, well knew and remembered that the debts charged to be improperly omitted in the said schedule were then justly due and owing to him. The court is therefore of opinion and doth decide, that the demurrer to the indictment ought to be sustained.

dicted at the first term of the circuit court after his examination, the case is continued at that term for the want of time to try it. At the second term, the case is continued on the motion of the prisoner, upon the ground of the absence of a material witness for him. At each of the three succeeding terms, the case is again continued for the want of time to try it. HELD, that upon the expiration of the last of the five terms, the prisoner became entitled, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 28, to be forever discharged of the crime imputed to him.

In the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, at October term 1840, twenty-four indictments were found against Benjamin W. Green, for several felonies, for which he had been duly examined before the court of hustings for the city of Richmond, and, on the 15th of June 1840, remanded by that court for trial in the said circuit court. The indictments were found at the term of the circuit court next following the examination. The prisoner was arraigned at the same term, on one of the indictments; whereupon various motions and points of law were made in the cause, the discussion of which occupied the time of the court till the 12th of November 1840, the last day of the term, when the attorney for the commonwealth and the prisoner stated that they were ready to go to trial; but it being then six o'clock in the evening, the court, for want of time to proceed with the trial, ordered that the cause be continued till the next term.

At April term 1841, all of the said prosecutions were again continued, on the motion of the prisoner, and on his oath that B. W. Mallory was a material witness for him, and was then absent.

At October term 1841, Green was tried upon the indictment on which he had been formerly arraigned. The trial lasted 732 from the 30th of October to the 12th *of November, when the jury returned into court with a verdict of not guilty, and the prisoner was acquitted of the felony charged in that indictment, but continued in custody to answer the other indictments. On the same 12th of November, the last day of that term, an order was entered containing all criminal causes which had not been already tried or continued.

On the last day of the ensuing term, to wit, on the 4th of May 1842, Green appeared in court, in discharge of his recognizance entered into before the general court,* to monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

In McCann v. Com., 14 Gratt. 577, the court said: "Upon the supposition that the law intends a discharge to flow from a continuance beyond the third term, a prisoner, if still held in custody after the expiration of such term, would be illegally detained, and would be discharged upon a habeas corpus. Green's Case, 1 Rob. R. 731."

Right of Bail to Custody of His Principal.—The principal case is cited in Levy v. Arnsthall, 10 Gratt. 645.

*He was bailed by the general court at its Decemanswer the commonwealth of the felonies laid to his charge in the 23 remaining indictments; and for reasons appearing to the court, he was permitted to give bail for his appearance on the 6th of July† ensuing, to answer the said indictments, and thereupon entered into a recognizance accordingly.

On the 20th of July† 1842, Green appeared in discharge of his recognizance last mentioned; and on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, who stated as his opinion that there was not then sufficient time at that term for the trial of said Green upon any one of the indictments against him, it was ordered that the said trials be postponed until the next term.

733 Whereupon *Green entered into a new recognizance to appear accordingly.

On the last day of the following term, to wit, the 12th of November 1842, Green appeared according to the condition of his recognizance entered into on the 20th of July; and the court, being of opinion that there was not then sufficient time at that term to try him upon any one of the indictments, permitted him to give bail for his appearance at the next term: whereupon he entered into a recognizance accordingly, with sureties, one of whom was Dabney M. Miller.

And now Green presented a petition to the general court, stating that he had been arrested and was detained in custody by Miller, one of his bail in the recognizance last aforesaid, under pretence of authority derived therefrom: setting forth the proceedings had against him in the circuit court upon the several indictments aforesaid: insisting, that, as he had not been tried within the time prescribed by the statute, 1 Rev. ber term 1841. See Green v. Commonwealth, 11 Leigh 677.—Note in Original Edition.

†The court held in July 1842 was held in pursuance of an act passed the 26th of March 1842. (Acts of 1841-2, ch. 69, § 2, p. 43.) which enacts, that the judge of the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the twenty-first circuit on the common law side thereof, "at the end of any term of the said court now appointed by law to be holden" for the trial of criminal causes, "when the same may be necessary, may and he is hereby authorized and required to adjourn such court to such day in the recess as to him may seem most convenient; and agreeably to such adjournment, an intermediate term, not exceeding fifteen judicial days, shall be held by the said judge for the trial of all criminal causes which were depending and could lawfully have been tried, but had not been tried, at the term from which such intermediate term had adjourned."—Note in Original Edition.

‡"Every person charged with treason or felony, who shall not be indicted before or at the second term after he shall have been committed, unless the attendance of the witnesses against him appears to have been prevented by himself, shall be discharged from his imprisonment, if he be detained for that cause only; and if he be not tried at or before the third term after his examination before the justices, he shall be forever discharged of the crime, unless was entitled, by virtue of that statute, to be forever discharged of all the crimes imputed to him by the several indictments pending against him in the circuit court; that the said court had therefore no power to require from him, at October term 1842, a recognizance for his further appearance to answer those indictments, and such recognizance could not confer upon the bail therein any legal authority to take or detain him in custody: and praying

734 *a writ of habeas corpus to bring him before the court, to the end that he might be discharged from the custody in which he was illegally held by Miller.

The general court awarded the habeas corpus; to which Miller made return, that he had taken Green into his custody, and now detained him therein, by virtue of his authority as one of Green's bail in the recognizance entered into before the circuit court on the 12th of November 1842, and for no other cause.

The cause was argued here by Taylor and Lyons for the petitioner, and the attorney general for the commonwealth.

LOMAX, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—The court is of opinion that by the terms of the act of assembly, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 28, the prisoner not having been tried at or before the third term after his examination, and this case not falling within the exception stated in the same law, he was entitled to be forever discharged of the crimes with which he stood charged. His right to this discharge, upon the adjournment of the circuit court at its last term, became complete and was consummated. That court, however, upon its adjournment, ceased to have a capacity to pronounce by its order the discharge to which the prisoner was entitled by the law. As the right of the prisoner to his discharge from the crimes imputed to him was given him by law, under the circumstances provided for, as a paramount right controlling and terminating all the proceedings by which he had been held in custody before the end of the term of the circuit court, the majority of this court are of opinion that the prisoner is entitled, upon this proceeding, to be now discharged from the custody of his bail, which ought no longer to be allowed after the law has forever discharged him of *the crimes with which he was charged in the circuit court.

From the foregoing opinion, LOMAX and LEIGH, J., dissented.

Petitioner discharged from the custody of his bail.

Criminal Law—Jurors—Right of Prisoner to Examine on Voir Dire.—A person called as a juror upon a trial for felony and sworn to answer questions such failure proceed from any continuance granted on the motion of the prisoner, or from the inability of the jury to agree on their verdict."—Note in Original Edition.

touching his competency, having deposed that he has formed no opinion nor come to any conclusion on the case, prisoner's counsel is about to interrogate him farther, and asks whether he has not conversed much about the case?—when court arrests the examination, and decides that no farther question shall be put to the juror by prisoner's counsel, and that he is a competent juror: HOLD, such proceeding and decision of the court are erroneous, and judgment against prisoner must be reversed therefor.

Same—Same—Competency—Preconceived Opinions.*—

The doctrine laid down in Oslander's case, 8 Leigh 780, and Armistead's case, 11 Leigh 657, as to the disqualification of jurors by preconceived opinions respecting the case of the accused, reaffirmed.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—A person is not rendered incompetent as a juror in a criminal case, by the formation of a legal opinion upon facts previously presented to his mind, as he would be by formation of previous convictions in respect to the facts themselves.

Same—Murder—Evidence—Proof of Distinct Felony.—

On a trial for murder, evidence that the prisoner, on the same day the deceased was killed, and shortly before the killing, shot a third person, HOLD admissible under the circumstances of the case, notwithstanding the evidence tends to prove a distinct felony committed by the prisoner; such shooting, and the killing of the deceased, appearing to be connected as parts of one entire transaction.

Same—New Trial—Perjury of Jurors on Voir Dire—

Discovery after Verdict.†—After a verdict of conviction for murder in the first degree, prisoner adduces testimony that two of the jurors who tried the case, and who on the voir dire declared that they had not formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, *had in fact, previous to the trial, expressed decided opinions that the prisoner was guilty and ought to be hung; of which circumstances prisoner alleges he had no knowledge until since the verdict was rendered: and on this ground he moves to set aside the verdict. Held, 1. Such enquiry was open, and the evidence admissible, for the purpose of shewing perjury and corruption in the jurors. But, 2. It belonged exclusively to the judge who presided at the trial, to weigh the conflicting credibility of the witnesses adduced by the prisoner and of the jurors, and to decide whether, in justice to the prisoner, and upon all the circumstances of the case, a new trial ought or ought not to be awarded.

Fletcher Heath was indicted, in the circuit superior court for the county for Henrico and city of Richmond, of the wilful murder of Delia Harris. At October term 1842, a jury being impaneled for his trial found him guilty of murder in the first degree, and the court passed sentence of death upon him.

In the course of the proceedings, the court gave opinions upon several points against the prisoner, to which he excepted.

I. Upon the trial of the cause, Richard Malone was called as a juror from among the bystanders, and being sworn to answer questions touching his competency as a juror, deposed, that he has formed no opinion or come to any conclusion upon the case of the prisoner; what he has heard was rumour, and he does not know that he has heard all the circumstances. Whereupon the counsel for the prisoner being about to interrogate the juror farther, for the purpose of shewing farther the state of his information and opinion of the case, and having asked the juror whether he had not conversed much about the case? the court arrested him, and decided, that after the answer above stated by the juror, no farther question should be put to him by the counsel for the prisoner, and that the juror was a competent juror. To which opinion of the court, the prisoner excepted.

737 *II. Several other persons, namely, A. L. Royster, N. Q. Crow, D. A. Fisher and Walker Haxall, being called as jurors upon the trial, and examined on oath touching their competency, were thereupon challenged by the prisoner for cause; but the court in each case overruled the challenge; and the prisoner in each case filed a bill of exceptions. The purport of those exceptions need not be farther stated.

III. Upon the trial of the cause, the attorney for the commonwealth, having introduced evidence that Delia Harris was, some 10 or 15 minutes before 12 o'clock of the night of Friday the 28th of January 1842, killed by several severe blows or wounds inflicted with a large knife or some other sharp instrument, and having offered further evidence for the purpose of identifying the prisoner as the person who inflicted the mortal blows, and for the purpose also of shewing the weapon wherewith they were inflicted, and (inter alia) having produced a leathern scabbard of a bowie knife, which was proved to have been found in the room of the deceased, lying partly under a bureau there, on the evening after her death,— then introduced Bennett Scott as a witness, who testified, That on the night on which the said Delia Harris was killed as aforesaid, before the fact occurred, namely, about 8 o'clock in the evening, he the witness went to the house where the prisoner and one Carter Wells lived, and there he played a game of cards with the prisoner, Wells being absent at the time. That the prisoner shortly left off playing, and went to mending a pair of pantaloons. That during this time, witness asked the prisoner where Wells was? and the prisoner said he had gone to the theatre. That when the prisoner had done mending the pantaloons, he took from the pocket of those he had on, a pistol, which he laid on the corner of the sideboard, and then pulled off the pantaloons he had on, and put on those he had mended, and put the same pistol in the pocket or waistband thereof. That the witness told the prisoner he had best not carry the pistol; and prisoner said, he always carried it. That the prisoner then said to the witness, "Do you know that I would kill two persons this night if I came across them? If I had had a half pint of brandy, I would have done what I intended to do, at Bradley's, and it would have been all over with them." That the prisoner had before been talking of Carter Wells and Delia Harris, and said they had been together at Bradley's that evening; he said that Wells and himself had rode out together that evening, and stopped at Bradley's, where Delia Harris then was. That the prisoner said, he would not mind killing any person; that he had once before shot a woman at a ball in Petersburg, and shot at a man in a bar room. That the witness, on the same evening, before this conversation between himself and the prisoner, had seen Delia Harris and Martha Gilliam going to the theatre, and had mentioned this to the prisoner, which he supposed was the reason the prisoner came to speak of Delia Harris.

And then the attorney for the commonwealth introduced the above named Carter Wells as a witness, who testified, That on the night the said Delia Harris was killed, and before she was killed, namely, about 8 o'clock in the evening, the witness being about to go to the theatre, the prisoner desired him to tell Delia Harris, she must not let him in if he came there the next day; if she did, he would kill her. That the witness did see Delia Harris at the theatre, and told her what the prisoner had said; which she seemed to pay no regard to. That the witness and Delia Harris came from the theatre together, and parted near the witness's house; he went home, and she towards her own house—

And the witness was proceeding, when he was stopped by the prisoner's counsel; who, apprehending that the witness was about to detail the circumstances attending the shooting of himself (the witness) and shortly before the said Delia Harris was killed, objected that, on the trial of this indictment, it was not competent for the commonwealth to offer any evidence for the purpose of proving any other felony or crime committed by the prisoner on another person, at another place, and at another time, though on the same night; much more, evidence of the substantive distinct felony of shooting the witness Wells, for which there was another indictment now pending against the prisoner. The attorney for the commonwealth avowed his purpose to be, to prove that the prisoner shot the said Wells with a pistol very shortly before the said Delia Harris was killed, and at the house where the prisoner and Wells both lived, and to prove all the circumstances attending that shooting, and especially to prove that after the shooting of Wells, the prisoner got a bowie knife in a scabbard, which was the same scabbard found in Delia Harris's room as above mentioned; and that he offered evidence of the shooting of Wells by the prisoner, because that shooting and the killing of Delia Harris were parts of one entire transaction, and the fact of the shooting and the circumstances attending it were parts of the same chain of evidence, indissolubly linked with the other evidence in this case, especially with the bowie knife and the scabbard found and identified as aforesaid, and necessary as well to identify the prisoner as the person who inflicted the mortal blow on the said Delia Harris, as to shew the deliberation and the animus with which the prisoner inflicted the said mortal blow on her. The prisoner's counsel still objected to the admission of any testimony touching the shooting of Wells by the prisoner, without, however, objecting to any evidence about the bowie knife and the scabbard thereof: but the court overruled the objection and declared the evidence admissible; to which opinion the prisoner excepted.

740 *IV. After the verdict had been rendered, the prisoner moved the court to set the same aside and award him a new trial, upon the ground that Martha Gilliam, who had been examined as a witness for the commonwealth, was a mulatto, incompetent by law to testify against a white man; and he introduced evidence to prove that fact. But the court overruled the motion; being of opinion that at this stage of the case, and under the circumstances thereof, (detailed in the record, but unnecessary to be mentioned here) it would be improper to receive an exception to the competency of Martha Gilliam; and not being satisfied upon the evidence, if proper now to be introduced, that the said Martha Gilliam is thereby proved to be a mulatto. To which opinion the prisoner excepted.

V. After the verdict had been rendered, the prisoner moved the court to set the same aside and grant him a new trial, upon the ground that Charles Bates and Daniel P. Howle, two of the jurors who tried the cause, had formed and expressed decided opinions against the prisoner, of which he had no knowledge until since the verdict was rendered. The said jurors, when called as such, were sworn to answer questions touching their competency as jurors, and severally deposed that they had not formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and were accepted by him. And now the prisoner introduced two witnesses, James Williams and William Morris, against whose respectability no imputation was made, whose testimony was as follows, 1. James Williams deposed that he was at the house of the juror Bates before the trial of this cause, and Bates told him that "he had been to the scene of the alleged murder the day after the death of Delia Harris, and there saw her mangled corpse, and if Heath was guilty of the murder he ought to be hung, as ought any other man who would commit such a murder;" and also said

741 that "from the statements which *he had heard at the place" (where he saw the body of Delia Harris) "he believed that Heath" (the prisoner) "was guilty of the murder;" and in the same conversation Bates said that Heath ought to be hung. This conversation occurred on the Sunday after the murder, which was committed Friday night. 2. William Morris deposed, that a day or two before the trial of this cause, he heard the juror Daniel P. Howle say to Benjamin W. Green, near the courthouse, (which said Benjamin W. Green stood indicted in this court for embezzling the money of the bank of Virginia)—"Green, I would take your place for eighteen pence, but as to that fellow Heath, he ought to be hung, and, damn him! if I was on his jury I would hang him:" and the said Howle then left the witness, and came up the steps into the courtroom.

The court overruled the said motion, and refused to grant the prisoner a new trial; and he excepted.

And now, on his petition, the general court awarded a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court.

The cause was argued here by Leigh and Lyons for the plaintiff in error, and the attorney general for the commonwealth.

LOMAX, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—The court deems it unnecessary to express the results of its deliberation upon all the numerous points suggested as errors in this record, the majority of the court being well satisfied that upon one of those errors, without deciding upon the others, a new trial must be awarded. The total interdiction on the part of the circuit court, after the answer which had been given by the juror Richard Malone touching his competency, of all further question to be put by the prisoner's counsel to the said juror, and the peremptory decision, excluding all further enquiry, that the juror was competent, are deemed by a majority of this court to be clearly erroneous.

742 *Whilst the court refrains from expressing an opinion upon the questions as to the competency of the jurors Royster, Fisher and Haxall, it unanimously reaffirms the doctrine laid down in Osiander's case, 3 Leigh 780, and Armistead's case, 11 Leigh 657. The court cannot now attempt to give greater precision to the principles there laid down. The application of the rules which are to be deduced from those principles must be left to the discretion of the judge, according to the varying circumstances of each particular case.

This court, however, does not intend to countenance a deduction which was attempted to be drawn from those cases by the prisoner's counsel, and much insisted on in argument; namely, that the formation of legal opinions upon facts which have previously been presented to the juror's mind, renders him equally as incompetent as the formation of previous convictions upon his mind in respect to the facts of the case. On the contrary, the court thinks that a knowledge of the law, instead of disqualification, would be a recommendation of the fitness of the juror. And although a juror may have taken up some misconception of the law of the case, the instruction of the court can be resorted to for correcting his error, and affording him a standard by which the law may be ascertained; whereas in regard to facts, there is no other standard but the opinions of the juror himself.

In regard to the evidence filed after the verdict, to fix disqualification upon two of the jurors who had rendered that verdict; whilst this court is of opinion that an enquiry was open, and such evidence was admissible, for the purpose of shewing perjury and corruption in those jurors, it is farther of opinion, that it belonged properly to the judge who presided at the trial to decide upon that evidence, and that it was for him exclusively to weigh the conflicting credibility of the witnesses and of the jurors, and to determine whether, in 743 *justice to the prisoner, and upon all the circumstances of the case, a new trial ought or ought not to be awarded. Upon this point, reference may be had to the doctrine stated in Jones's case, 1 Leigh 617.

In regard to the judgment of the court overruling the prisoner's objection to Carter Wells's testimony touching the shooting of Wells by the prisoner; the court is of opinion that the bill of exceptions in this particular is defective, in not proceeding to state what was the evidence which was given by the witness upon the subject. But without resting the judgment of the court upon the defectiveness of the bill of exceptions in this respect, this court is of opinion that the objection which was made is unsustainable, and that the fact of the shooting, as being a part of the circumstances and of the res gestæ, ought not to have been precluded from being given in evidence to the jury, although such evidence might itself have tended to prove a distinct felony committed by the prisoner.

The court deems it unnecessary to express any opinion upon the matters stated in the record as to the evidence which was given by Martha Gilliam; because the same matters are not likely to be presented in any future trial of the case.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded.

*Young v. The Commonwealth.

December, 1842.

Criminal Law—Commitment—Offense Insufficiently Specified.—On trial of indictment against W. Y. for felony in stealing a slave, prisoner is acquitted; whereupon court makes the following order: "It appearing to the court, by the testimony of witnesses this day examined on the trial of W. Y. that he is guilty of a misdemeanour. It is ordered that he be remanded to jail, and continued in the custody of the jailor of this court till the next term to answer an indictment then to be preferred against him." In a bill of exceptions to this order filed by the prisoner, the offence for which he was so remanded is further described as "a misdemeanour under the statute Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 184, § 1, p. 211." On writ of habeas corpus sued out by W. Y. the general court holds the commitment illegal, as not sufficiently specifying the offence, and discharges the prisoner out of custody under the same.

Same—Same—Remand after Discharge from Illegal Commitment.*—A party being acquitted of felony, and thereupon committed by the circuit court to take his trial for a misdemeanour, this court discharges him on habeas corpus, because the order of commitment does not sufficiently specify the offence; but it appearing, from the record of the proceedings in the circuit court, that there is reasonable ground to suspect the party of having committed a violation of the criminal law (other than the specific crime of which he was acquitted) proper to be made the subject of judicial enquiry, this court orders the sheriff to take him again into custody and carry him forthwith before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law.

William Young was indicted in the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, for felony in stealing a negro woman slave named Eliza, the property of Sarah C. Atkinson. Before pleading to the indictment, he moved the court to quash the same; which motion being overruled, he filed a bill of exceptions, shewing as the ground of the motion, that "the prisoner had not been examined for the offence with which he is charged in the indictment, as appears by the warrant

Criminal Law—Commitment—Remand after Discharge from Illegal Commitment.—In Ex parte Marx, 86 Va. 47, 9 S. E. Rep. 475, Marx v. Milstead (Va.), 9 S. E. Rep. 620, the court said: "The petitioner is, therefore, entitled to be discharged from custody under the commitment of the justice; but an order will be entered commanding the officer in whose custody he is, to again take him into custody, and forthwith carry him before the justice by whom he was committed, to be further dealt with according to law. Authority for such procedure, if any thing were needed, may be found in Young's Case, 1 Rob. 803."

summoning the examining court, and the proceedings thereof." He was then tried upon the indictment, and the jury having found him not guilty, the court gave judgment that he be acquitted and discharged of the larceny aforesaid. "Whereupon" (the record proceeds) "on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, and it appearing to the court, by the testimony of witnesses this day examined on the trial of the said William Young, that he is guilty of a misdemeanour, it is ordered that he be remanded to jail, and continued in the custody of the jailor of this court till the next regular term to be holden for the trial of criminal causes, to answer an indictment then to be preferred against him." To this order of the circuit court the prisoner excepted. The statement in the bill of exceptions was, that "the court ordered the prisoner to be remanded to jail to await the session of the next grand jury, then to be presented for a misdemeanour under the statute, Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 184, § 1, p. 243,—being of opinion that, upon the evidence adduced at the trial, he was liable to be presented under that statute."

The trial and acquittal of Young, and his recommitment to prison, took place on the 11th of November 1842. And now he presented a petition to the general court, setting forth the order of the circuit court remanding him to jail, insisting that his imprisonment under that order was illegal, and praying that a writ of habeas corpus might be awarded to bring him before the court, and that he might thereupon be discharged out of custody.

The court awarded the habeas corpus, and at the same time, by subpoena duces tecum, caused the clerk of the circuit court to bring before them the indictment against Young, with the other original papers filed in the cause, *and the order book containing the entries of the proceedings had therein. From those papers and the order book, the foregoing state of the case has been collected. What was the testimony given against Young on his trial in the circuit court, did not in any wise appear. The depositions of the witnesses for the commonwealth upon his examination before the county court of Henrico, were to the following effect:

R. C. Page deposed that Eliza, the slave which the prisoner is accused of taking away, is the property of Mrs. Sarah C. Atkinson; that the said slave disappeared on the thursday before she was taken up and this charge preferred, and the witness next saw her at the mayor's office. She carried away a trunk with clothing belonging to her. The prisoner was apprehended near Fredericksburg.

*Acts of 1828-9, ch. 21, § 1, p. 25. This statute makes it a misdemeanour punishable with imprisonment and fine, to procure or furnish to a slave any pass or other writing, or in any other manner to aid him in escaping from his owner, with intent in so doing to deprive the owner of the use and service of the slave.—Note in Original Edition.

John Moscow deposed that Young the prisoner came to his house on the 17th day of March last, about two o'clock, and asked permission for a lady to remain all night. He said he wanted to go to a public house in the neighbourhood to look for his partner, and accordingly went away. After some time he returned, and said he could not find his partner. He and the woman remained all night. The next morning he went off again, and after some time returned and said that they could not get in the mail train, and that they must return to Richmond. He and the woman left the house of the witness together on that morning, and the next time the witness saw them was in the mayor's office.

Archibald Pae deposed that he saw Young and the girl together near the water station on the Richmond and Fredericksburg rail road, coming towards Richmond. Afterward he saw Young lower down the rail road, lying in a bush. The witness asked him if he was going to Richmond? He replied, no. Near Sinton's turnout the witness saw the girl, who said that she was free, but that she had no pass or free papers. The witness *and some others then returned in pursuit of Young: they found him, and charged him with kidnapping; when Young said he had got into a pretty fix, and that he was a ruined man.

A. S. Lewelling deposed that on the 18th day of March last he saw Young and the girl coming down the rail road. Afterwards, lower down the rail road, he saw Young lying in a bush. Near Sinton's turnout he saw the girl, who said she was free. The witness and others then went in pursuit of Young, and he was taken into custody. Young asked witness what the law was? Witness replied, that if it could be proved he was guilty, he would be sent to the penitentiary. Young then remarked that he had got himself into a fix, that he was a ruined man; and asked witness to let him go, saying he had a wife and child, and that he saw the girl only the day before, who represented herself to be a free indian girl.

Daniel Garrison deposed that he is the conductor of a freight train on the rail road; that near the water station, Young the prisoner asked witness to give him passage for himself and a lady to the Junction, which the witness refused. Young and the girl came from the direction of Moscow's house, the girl about fifteen steps behind Young.

The cause was argued by W. Crump for the petitioner, and the attorney general for the commonwealth.

The judgment of the general court was as follows:

It seems to the court here, that the order made by the circuit superior court, committing the said William Young to the custody of the sheriff, is illegal and improper, because it does not sufficiently specify the offence with which he was charged and for which he was so committed. It is therefore ordered that the said William Young be discharged out of the custody of the sheriff under the said order of commitment.

748 *But it further appearing to this court, from testimony contained in the record of the proceedings against the said William Young in the said circuit court, that there is reasonable ground to suspect him of having committed a violation of the criminal law of this commonwealth, proper to be made the subject of judicial enquiry and proceeding, it is further ordered that the said sheriff do take the said William Young again into his custody, and carry him forthwith before some justice of the peace having jurisdiction of any offence involved in the act for which he was lately tried before the said circuit court (other than the specific crime of which he was acquitted upon that trial), to be dealt with by such justice of the peace according to law.

From so much of the foregoing judgment as directs the said William Young to be taken again into custody by the sheriff of Henrico, and carried before a justice of the peace, judges Lomax, Leigh, Duncan, Fry and Clopton dissent; considering the present case not a proper one for the exercise of the power of this court to make such order.

Jones and Others v. The Commonwealth.*

December, 1842.

Assault and Imprisonment†—Under Color of Warrant.

—Case of an information against a justice of the peace, an informer, and a constable, for assaulting and imprisoning a party, under colour of a warrant of arrest for perjury, issued against him by the justice on the oath of the informer, and executed by the constable; wherein it was held by the general court, upon the evidence, that the information was not sustained as to the justice, but that the informer and constable were properly convicted and fined.

On the 15th of April of 1840, the circuit superior court of Scott county ordered that Samuel E. Jones, Philip

749 *Counts and Archibald Forgay be summoned to appear before the court on the first day of the next term, to shew cause why an information should not be filed against them for assaulting and arresting William Sons on the 9th day of April 1840, and imprisoning him from that day until the 14th of the same month. The summons was ordered on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, "and for reasons appearing to the court upon the trial of the writ of habeas corpus, returned to this court on yesterday, in favour of William Sons against Samuel E. Jones, a constable of this county."

The summons having been issued and duly served upon the defendants, and they not appearing, an information was ordered by the court, and accordingly filed, charging that the said defendants, on the 9th of April 1840, at the county of Scott, "did make a violent assault upon William Sons, and did then and there arrest the body of the said William Sons, and then and there imprison him the said Sons from the said 9th day of April until the 14th day of the same month." A trial being had upon the plea of not guilty put in by the defendants, the jury returned a verdict finding all of them guilty, and assessing upon Jones and Forgay a fine of 16 dollars 66 cents each, and upon Counts a fine of 20 dollars. Whereupon the defendants severally moved the court to set aside the verdict and to grant them a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was not supported by the evidence; which motion the court overruled, and proceeded to enter judgment against the defendants, for the fines severally assessed as aforesaid, and the costs of the prosecution. To the opinion of the court overruling their motion for a new trial, the defendants filed a bill of exceptions; from which it appeared that the proof before the jury was as follows.

I. The attorney for the commonwealth gave in evidence the record of the proceedings had upon the writ of habeas corpus before mentioned; which were the 750 following:—"The writ being awarded and duly served upon Jones, he made return thereto, that he arrested Sons on the 9th of April 1840, and had since detained him in custody, pursuant to a warrant against the said Sons for the crime of perjury, issued by Archibald Forgay a justice of the peace for Scott county, and directed to him the said Jones as constable of the said county; which warrant he annexed to his return, as a part thereof. Whereupon, it appearing to the court that the said warrant had been illegally issued, and that Sons was illegally detained in custody thereon, it was ordered that he be discharged out of the custody of Jones, and that the said Jones pay the costs in that behalf expended.

II. The warrant of arrest aforesaid was given in evidence by the attorney for the commonwealth. It was in the following terms:

"Scott county, to wit: To Samuel E. Jones const. Whereas Philip Counts has this day given information upon oath to me Archibald Forgay, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, that on the 8th day of February last past, in the county aforesaid, a certain William Sons, of said county, willingly and maliciously and corruptly did swear a false oath against him the said Counts; these are therefore, in the name of the commonwealth, to require you to apprehend the said Sons, and to bring him before me or some other justice of the peace of the county aforesaid, to answer the premises, and further to be dealt with according to law. Given under my hand this 7th day of April 1840." (Signed)

"A. Forgay."

III. The said William Sons, being introduced as a witness for the commonwealth, proved the following facts.

The defendant Jones, who is a constable for Scott county, arrested the witness on the 9th of April 1840, by virtue of the warrant aforesaid, and held him in 751 *custody until the 14th of the same month, when he was discharged on a writ of habeas corpus by the order of this court. While the witness was in the custody of Jones, he was taken by said Jones to the house of Philip Counts another of the defendants, where he remained one night; after which he was taken by Jones, accompanied by Counts, before Jonathan Hale a justice of the peace for Scott county, for the purpose of qualifying, and he was there urged by Counts to qualify, to a paper or instrument of writing which Counts had prepared, in relation to a note or due bill on which he (Sons) had been warranted by Counts. The warrant had been returned for trial before the defendant Forgay, and the note or due bill on which it was founded was for 75 cents. On the trial of the warrant, Sons was sworn to testify about the matter, and did testify that he had given to Counts no note or due bill for 75 cents, but had given him one for 50 cents, and that the note had been altered from 50 to 75 cents. Witness was told by Counts, that if he would swear to the truth of the paper to which he wished him to qualify before justice Hale, he should be set at liberty. This paper was to contradict the oath which witness had taken on the trial of the warrant aforesaid. This the witness refused to do; and thereupon he was taken before the defendant Forgay, for examination or trial, as he was told; but he objected to said Forgay's having anything more to do with his case, and accordingly Forgay did not take it up. From Forgay's, witness was taken back to the house of defendant Counts, where he remained all night; and on Monday the 13th of the month, he was brought by Jones and some other persons to the courthouse, where the circuit superior court for the county was in session, and there he remained until the next day, when he was discharged from custody. When the witness was first arrested, he requested Jones 752 to summon several witnesses for him, which was done. Whilst he was *in custody, he was not tied, or in any manner harshly treated, except that on Monday evening, while he was in custody at the courthouse, he started home without the consent of Jones, and was overtaken by Jones, who jerked him a little, and brought him back. Jones and Counts were brothers in law. Forgay lived about 8 miles from Counts, about 5 from justice Hale, and about 4 from justice Robert Spur. This witness (who is quite a youth, and very ignorant) further proved that although Jones and Counts had him in custody from the 9th to the 14th of April, inclusive, and took him before two justices of the peace, yet they never explained to him what they were going to do with him, only that they were going to try him for perjury, and never required from him security for his appearance before any court competent to indict him for perjury, which security, if they had required it, he would have been able to give; nor did they take him before any justice except the said Forgay, for the trial of the warrant on which he was apprehended.

IV. Jonathan Hale, another witness for the commonwealth, proved, that at the time mentioned by the witness Sons, he the said Sons was brought before this witness by the defendant Jones, in company with the defendant Counts, and Jones and Counts endeavoured to induce Sons to make oath before this witness to the truth of the paper or instrument of which Sons speaks in his testimony, and promised to release him on his doing so: but this he refused to do. That Sons, in presence of this witness, requested Jones to summon, as a witness for him, a person who lived about 6 miles distant: but that neither Jones nor Counts proposed to this witness to act in the case in which Sons was arrested.

V. Robert Spur, another witness, proved, that he saw Sons in the custody of Jones on two court days of the term held at Scott courthouse, (as mentioned by Jones in his testimony) and that Sons and his 753 friends frequently *complained to the witness that Jones and Counts would not bring him to trial. This witness further proved that Counts frequently took his cases before the defendant Forgay for trial.

VI. Jesse Roberts, another witness, proved, that he also saw Sons in the custody of Jones at Scott courthouse on Monday and Tuesday, and that he saw no effort made by the constable to have his case disposed of. That it was common for Counts to bring his cases before Forgay for adjudication; and that in a case in which Counts had warranted the witness before Forgay, Forgay had taken some strange, and, as the witness thought, illegal proceedings.

And the foregoing were all the facts proved in the cause.

On the petition of Jones, Counts and Forgay, the general court awarded a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court.

John W. C. Watson for the plaintiffs in error: the attorney general for the commonwealth.

The judgment of the general court was as follows:

"It seems to a majority of the court here, that the judgment of the circuit superior court is erroneous as to the plaintiff in error Archibald Forgay, but that there is no error therein as to the plaintiffs in error Samuel E. Jones and Philip Counts: Therefore it is considered that the said judgment, as to the said Archibald Forgay, be reversed and annulled; that the verdict, as to him, be set aside; and that the cause, as to him, be remanded to the said circuit superior court, for a new trial to be had therein upon the information according to law: and it is further considered that as to the said Samuel E. Jones and Philip Counts, the said judgment be affirmed, and that the commonwealth recover against them her costs about her defence in this court expended."

I. DEFINITION.

False imprisonment is any unlawful physical restraint by one of another's liberty, whether in prison or elsewhere. Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co., 85 W. Va. 588, 14 S. E. Rep. 243, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827.

False imprisonment is a wrong akin to the wrongs of assault and battery, and consists in imposing, by force or threats, an unlawful restraint upon a man's freedom of locomotion. Prima facie, any restraint put by fear or force upon the actions of another is unlawful, and constitutes false imprisonment, unless a showing of justification makes it a true or legal imprisonment. Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co., 85 W. Va. 588, 14 S. E. Rep. 243, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827.

II. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. ARREST ON ILLEGAL WARRANT.—If the defendant has lawfully sued out the process of arrest against the plaintiff, and has caused him to be imprisoned upon it, and the process has been afterwards set aside because illegally issued, it constitutes no defence, but the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the wrong done him, without regard to the motives of the defendant, or the circumstances attending the doing of the wrongful and unlawful act. Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

In one case it was said that the gist of the action for false imprisonment is the illegal detention of the person without lawful process, or the unlawful execution of lawful process. Tavener v. Morehead, 41 W. Va. 116, 23 S. E. Rep. 673.

2. ILLEGAL ARREST ON VALID WARRANT.—A warrant, to arrest a person of whom surety for the peace is demanded, being executed neither by a sworn officer, nor the person to whom it was directed by the magistrate, but by an individual selected by the prosecutor, who erased the name of the person appointed by the magistrate, and substituted that of the person selected by himself, is thereby rendered altogether illegal and void as a justification, but may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. Wells v. Jackson, 3 Munf. 48.

3. ARREST FOR DEBT AFTER PAYMENT.—Trespass for false imprisonment will not lie against a party for suing out an execution, and causing a debtor to be taken in execution, while he was attending the court as a witness, under the protection of a subpoena, although the debt for which the execution had been issued had been previously paid. Moore v. Chapman, 8 H. & M. 260.

4. CONTINUATION OF ILLEGAL DETENTION.—Every continuation of an illegal imprisonment constitutes a new trespass, for which an action for malicious arrest can be maintained. Accordingly, where a rebel in 1861, finding that a loyal man had been wrongfully arrested, joined the gang of independent scouts who were taking him to prison, and encouraged their acts and abused him, he was held to be guilty of false imprisonment. Ruffner v. Williams, 8 W. Va. 245.

5. DETENTION BY CARRIER.—A carrier of passengers is liable for the false imprisonment of a passenger, made or caused to be made by its conductor in charge of the train, during his execution of the carrier's contract to treat properly and convey safely. This liability is not affected by sec. 31, ch. 145, W. Va. Code, which enacts, among other things, that "the conductor of every train of railroad cars shall have all the powers of a conservator of the peace while in charge of the train." Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 588, 14 S. E. Rep. 243. See also, Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 639, 16 S. E. Rep. 935.

6. ARREST BY JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

Generally.—Judicial officers are not answerable for mistakes of law, or errors of judgment, in cases where they have jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and the judgment is one which they are authorized by law to render. Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847.

On Rule for Contempt.—So a rule for contempt, being the judicial act of the court issuing it, cannot be a foundation for an action for false imprisonment, however erroneously issued, but it may be for malicious prosecution, provided the application for the same is without probable cause, actuated by improper and malicious motives, and founded on falsehood or misrepresentation. Tavener v. Morehead, 41 W. Va. 116, 23 S. E. Rep. 673. See monographic note on "Malicious Prosecution."

By Mayor of Town.—Since the mayor of a town has the right to judge whether or not sufficient grounds for an arrest exist; in an action against the mayor for maliciously causing the plaintiff to be arrested and imprisoned for a breach or threatened breach of peace committed in his presence, it is error to submit to the jury the question of the reasonableness of the grounds of the arrest. Johnston v. Moorman, 80 Va. 131.

7. ARREST BY CONFEDERATE AGENTS.—In an action for false imprisonment, the fact that the acts complained of were committed by the defendant under the authority and while in the service of the so-called confederate states is no defence. Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 138; Caperton v. Nickel, 4 W. Va. 173; Caperton v. Bowyer, 4 W. Va. 176; Caperton v. Ballard, 4 W. Va. 420. See also, French v. White, 4 W. Va. 170.

8. WANT OF AUTHORITY IN PARTY MAKING ARREST.

Municipalities.—Unless the power to imprison be plainly given it does not exist; and, when given, there must be a judicial ascertainment of the guilt of the party accused, by a competent tribunal, before it can be exercised. A power conferred on a municipal corporation to adopt ordinances and to enforce compliance with them by prescribed fines, does not confer the power of imprisonment before trial for a violation of the ordinances, nor after trial for failure to pay the fines. Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847.

Unauthorized Officers.—The mere fact that a night watchman in the employ and pay of a railroad company was sworn in as a special policeman by a city mayor at the request of the company, where the mayor was not authorized by law to appoint a special policeman for the company, gave the policeman no authority to make arrests as an officer of the law, and the company is liable in damages for false imprisonment and assault on a passenger, committed by such special policeman in the discharge of his duties as watchman. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 639, 16 S. E. Rep. 985.

III. MALICE AND PROBABLE CAUSE.

Inference of Malice.—In an action for false imprisonment malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause, but it is not a necessary inference. It is always a question for the jury under all the circumstances of the case. Malice is not to be considered in the sense of spite or hatred against the individual but only as denoting that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives. The improper motive, or want of proper motive, inferable from a wrongful act, based upon no reasonable ground, constitutes of itself all the malice deemed essential in law to the maintenance of the action. Forbes v. Hagman, 75 Va. 168; Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847; Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

When Malice Will Be Presumed.—The law presumes that an arrest and imprisonment, made by one engaged in the attempt to subvert the government, in pursuance of that purpose and as a means to its accomplishment, was made with malice; and this presumption cannot be rebutted. French v. White, 4 W. Va. 170.

Probable Cause.—Probable cause for a proceeding under Code 1873, ch. 148, sec. 33, holding a defendant to bail, and arresting and detaining him until the bond required by law has been given, or until he is otherwise legally discharged, is a bona fide belief by the plaintiff, or his agent acting for him, in the existence of the facts essential under the law for such proceeding, founded on such circumstances, within his knowledge at the time the proceeding is taken, as would warrant a man of ordinary caution, prudence and judgment, under the same circumstances, in entertaining such belief. Forbes v. Hagman, 75 Va. 168.

Where the facts and grounds actually exist, or the plaintiff has probable cause to believe that they exist, on which an order for the arrest of the defendant is authorized by sec. 37, ch. 136, W. Va. Code, the plaintiff, who causes an arrest to be made under said statute, cannot be made liable in an action of trespass for such arrest, merely because the affidavit and order of arrest are not regular and in proper legal form. But, as the order of arrest is authorized only in a pending action or suit, if a party makes an affidavit and causes an arrest, without the pendency of an action, the proceedings will be void for want of jurisdiction to issue the order of arrest, and he will be held liable for damages. Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139.

IV. DAMAGES.

1. COMPENSATORY DAMAGES.

General Rule.—The rule, in cases where the malice necessary to sustain the action is such only as results from a groundless act, and there is no actual malice or design to oppress, is to allow compensatory damages; that is, damages to indemnify the plaintiff, including injury to property, loss of time and necessary expenses, counsel fees, and other actual loss: but not to allow vindictive or punitive damages to punish the defendant. Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139; Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

Loss of Time.—Where the false imprisonment complained of was done without malice the plaintiff can only recover compensatory damages. One of the most important elements of recovery in such case is for his loss of time and for the interruption to his business. Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64; Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847; Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 26 S. E. Rep. 875; Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139.

Mental and Physical Suffering.—Another element of damages for which the plaintiff may recover is the bodily or mental suffering sustained by him in consequence of the wrongful act. But, as there is no precise measure of damages for mental or physical pain, where they are elements of damages to be estimated by the jury, the verdict will not be set aside unless the damages are so great as to suggest that the jury have been influenced by passion or prejudice. Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847. See also, Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

Costs Incurred in General.—The plaintiff is also entitled to recover the costs and expenses incurred in defending the original suit or proceeding. Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64; Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847; Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 26 S. E. Rep. 875; Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139.

Counsel Fees.—While the general rule is that counsel fees are not recoverable as damages, yet on a trial for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment, where exemplary damages are recoverable, the fees paid or incurred to counsel for defending the original suit or proceeding may be proved, and, if reasonable and necessarily incurred, may be taken into consideration by the jury in the assessment of damages. Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 26 S. E. Rep. 875; Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64; Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139; Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847.

2. PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where Defendant Was Actuated by Malice.—Where the defendant, in an action for false imprisonment, was actuated by malice, punitive damages may be given to the plaintiff. Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847; Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139.

Detention of Passenger by Carrier.—A carrier of passengers is liable in exemplary damages for the arrest or false imprisonment of a passenger, without reasonable and probable cause, made, or caused to be made, by its conductor in charge of a train during the execution of a contract to carry, although such act on the part of the conductor was entirely unauthorized by the company, and was purely personal to himself. Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 588, 14 S. E. Rep. 243, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827.

Where There Is No Malice Punitive Damages Cannot Be Given.—In a case in which the plaintiff had been kept under an illegal restraint for three days, but in which there was no proof of malice on the part of the defendant, it was held that a verdict for $475 would be set aside as plainly excessive. Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 189; Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847.

V. DECLARATION.

Generally.—In an action for false imprisonment, the declaration need not charge in express terms that the imprisonment was "against the will of the plaintiff." It is sufficient if it appears that the imprisonment was against his will, and was without collusion on his part. And an averment that the plaintiff was charged with an offence, and that the prosecution therefor had been abandoned and fully ended, is all that is required on the subject of charge and acquittal. Bolton v. Vellines, 94 Va. 393, 26 S. E. Rep. 847.

Not Necessary to Aver Malice.—In an action on the case for suing out a capias and imprisoning the plaintiff, in an action of slander in which he was defendant, it is not necessary to aver malice or want of probable cause in suing out the capias. Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

VI. EVIDENCE.

Record of Cases Competent Evidence.—In an action for false imprisonment the whole of the case in which the imprisonment occurred is competent evidence for the plaintiff. Parsons v. Harper, 16 Gratt. 64.

Sufficiency.—Evidence that the defendant, the informer and constable, arrested the plaintiff, who was young and ignorant, and kept him in custody for four days, refusing to bring him to trial, and neglecting to give him an opportunity to furnish security, and that they endeavored to get him sign an acknowledgment of a due bill, is sufficient to warrant a verdict against the defendants. Jones v. Com., 1 Rob. 748.

But evidence that the defendant, a justice of the peace, issued a warrant for the plaintiff's arrest; that the informer and constable kept him in custody for four days, and neglected to bring him to trial, but endeavored to get him to sign an acknowledgment of a due bill; and that the informer often took his cases before the defendant, was insufficient to support a verdict against the defendant. Jones v. Com., 1 Rob. 748.

754 Stroup v. The Commonwealth.*

Larceny—Indictment—Second Offence—Omissions—Arrest of Judgment.*—Indictment against S. S. for second offence of petit larceny alleges former conviction and punishment of S. S. for a like offence, but does not in terms allege that the court in which the first offence was tried had competent authority to try the same; nor that the former conviction remains in force; nor that such conviction appears by the record; nor that S. S. formerly convicted is the same person who is charged with the subsequent offence. Verdict, guilty. HELD, none of the omissions aforesaid in

*See monographic note on "Larceny" appended to Johnson v. Com., 24 Gratt. 555, and monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674. The principal case is cited in Pryor v. Com., 2 Va. Dec. 483.

Same—Same—Same—Verdict.—One count of indictment charges petit larceny in the usual form; another, petit larceny committed after party had been convicted of a like offence: verdict finds prisoner guilty on both counts, and fixes imprisonment at five years: HELD, no objection lies to the verdict.

An indictment against Susanna Stroup for petit larceny, containing two counts, was found in the circuit superior court of Wythe county at September term 1842. In the first count, which was in the usual form, the defendant was charged with the larceny of a heifer, the property of John Catron, of the value of six dollars. In the second count it was alleged, that, in the year 1821, Susanna Stroup was duly examined upon a charge of petit larceny, before a called court of five justices of the peace for Wythe county, having full authority in that behalf; was sent on by the examining court to be further tried in the county court of Wythe; and was accordingly indicted, tried and convicted in the said county court and actually punished, for the said offence. All the proceedings had in the examining court and in the court of trial were set forth with much minuteness of detail. And then the count proceeded to charge, "that after the said Susanna Stroup was convicted and punished for the petit larceny above set forth, in manner and form as before stated, she the said Susanna Stroup, on the 28th day of June 1842, at the county aforesaid and within the jurisdiction of the circuit *superior court aforesaid, with force and arms, one small yearling heifer, red and white spotted, marked &c. of the value of six dollars, of the goods and chattels of one John Catron, then and there being found, feloniously did steal, take and carry away; so the grand jury aforesaid do say that the said Susanna Stroup hath committed the offence of petit larceny the second time, in manner and form aforesaid, contrary to the act of the general assembly" &c. But the count did not in terms allege any of the following matters: 1. That the court in which the first offence was tried had competent power and authority to try the same. 2. That the judgment of former conviction remains in force and unreversed. 3. That the proceedings and conviction for the former offence appear by the record thereof. 4. That Susanna Stroup who was convicted for the former offence is the same person who is charged with the subsequent offence.

A trial being had on the plea of not guilty, the jury found the prisoner guilty on both counts, and ascertained the term of her imprisonment in the penitentiary to be five years. She thereupon moved the court to arrest the judgment, upon the ground that in the indictment the first three of the allegations above noticed were omitted, and also because the verdict found her guilty on both counts of the indictment. The court overruled the motion, and gave judgment that she be imprisoned in the penitentiary for the term ascertained by the jury.

And now she applied by petition to this court for a writ of error, assigning for error the matters before relied upon for arresting the judgment, and also the omission in the indictment of the fourth allegation above mentioned.

Lyons for the petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Writ of error denied.

756 *Overbee v. The Commonwealth.

December, 1842.

Criminal Law—Jurors—Separation—New Trial.*—

Pending a trial for felony and before the testimony is closed, five of the jury having received permission to retire from the courtroom accompanied by the sheriff, another juror thereupon leaves the jury box without the knowledge of the court, passes out of the courthouse through a crowd of persons collected about the door, and remains absent a few minutes, after which he returns into court; having (as he deposes) held no communication whatever with any person during his absence; but not having been, during that period, in charge of the sheriff, or even seen by him. The trial proceeds and the prisoner is convicted. HELD, such separation of the juror from his fellows is sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict.

Alexander H. Overbee was tried and convicted, in the circuit superior court of Lee county, at September term 1842, upon an indictment for forgery, and sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, the term ascertained by the jury. After the verdict was rendered, he moved the court to set it aside and award him a new trial, upon the ground that Samuel V. Hargis, one of the jury which tried the cause, had improperly separated from his fellows pending the trial. This motion being overruled, he filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court, wherein the facts of the case were set forth as follows.

On the trial of the cause, before the testimony was closed, five of the jury obtained leave to retire for a brief space from the courtroom, the court directing a deputy sheriff to accompany them, and neither suffer any person to converse with them, nor converse with them himself on the subject of the trial. When these jurors had got ten or twelve feet from the jury box, Samuel V. Hargis, another juror, set off in apparent hurry after them, and it was supposed he would overtake them before they reached the door. The court did not observe his leaving the jury box.

757 There was at the time a considerable *crowd of persons in the courtroom, about the door, and on the pavement outside, extending to the end of the courthouse. The five jurors were conducted by the deputy sheriff beyond the crowd, and around the end of the courthouse, where they stopped for the purpose for which they had retired (to obey a call of nature), and immediately afterwards were conducted back into court. The clerk thereupon proceeded to call over the panel of the jury, when Hargis, who was tenth on the panel, not having answered to his name, the court forthwith ordered the deputy sheriff to go in pursuit of him, which he did, and about a minute afterwards returned with Hargis into court. The deputy sheriff deposed, that he did not see Hargis at any time during his absence from the jury box, until despatched in pursuit of him by the court; when he met him between the door of the courthouse and the end thereof, alone, and walking briskly towards the door. Hargis himself deposed, that on seeing the other jurors leaving the courthouse, he set off after them, and passed round the end of the courthouse to the back thereof, (for the like purpose with the others;) after which, seeing that his horse, hitched to the fence about 60 yards off, was about to break loose, he walked quickly to him, refastened him, and returned as soon as he could to the courthouse, meeting the deputy sheriff at the door. That as he passed out through the crowd, a drunken man took hold of him, wishing to converse with him, (though not on the subject of the trial,) but deponent shook him off, refusing to converse with him: that no other person made a like attempt, and that no communication of any kind passed between any person and himself, while he was out. That he did not know, or suppose, that he was in charge of the sheriff, or that his conduct was in any degree improper.

On the petition of Overbee, this court awarded a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court.

758 *H. S. and D. R. Kane for the plaintiff in error: the attorney general for the commonwealth.

"The judgment of the general court was as follows:

It seems to the court here, that the separation of the jury impaneled for the trial of this case, as set forth in the bill of exceptions, was sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict, and the circuit court ought accordingly to have set aside the same and granted a new trial: Therefore," judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded to circuit court for a new trial to be had therein upon the indictment.

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

What plea is insufficient.

In debt on a judgment the defendant pleads, that by an agreement in writing between the parties, the judgment was discharged and satisfied by a new contract, for the payment of a sum in cash, which was then paid, and for the payment of the balance by deferred instalments, whereby the said judgment was remitted and released, and accord and satisfaction thereof made. The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and the demurrer was sustained.

6. Where a court refuses to give an instruction asked, and its opinion is excepted to, if the bill of exceptions does not state that evidence was offered tending to prove the case supposed by the instruction, and the court has simply declined to give the instruction, such refusal may perhaps be justified, on the ground that the case was merely hypothetical, and the instruction asked on an abstract question. But if the court not only declines to give the instruction asked, but proceeds to give another in lieu thereof, the inference is a reasonable one, that there was evidence tending to prove the case supposed, and the appellate court will not only enquire whether the law is correctly expounded in the instruction given, but will also enquire whether it is correctly stated in the instruction asked.

7. In a suit by one partner against his copartner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and for a moiety of a tract of land purchased by the defendant in his own name, and paid for out of the partnership funds, the land having been sold under an interlocutory decree, and purchased by the defendant at a sacrifice; and then, after process of scire facias at the instance of the defendant to revive in the name of the plaintiff's administrator and heirs, and after taking an account of the administration, a final decree being rendered against the administrator personally for so much of the money decreed to the defendant as was not satisfied by the sale of the land; and upon an appeal by the administrator, the court being of opinion that the interlocutory decree was for too large an amount, and therefore erroneous: held, 1. That the sale of the land under the interlocutory decree, which had never been confirmed, ought to be set aside on the appeal by the administrator, although the heirs (who were infants) had not joined in the appeal. 2. That the

761 revival of the suit as to the administrator, *if regularly made, could only authorize a decree against him de bonis testatoris, and not a decree against him personally; for, if sought to be charged on the ground that he had wasted or failed to account for, or had in his hands, assets of the testator, he ought to have an opportunity of being heard on that subject, in answer to a bill with proper averments. 3. That upon the filing of such a bill, a sale of the land ought to be suspended, until the result of a settlement of the administration accounts should shew whether that property could not be relieved by the application of the personal assets to any balance in favour of the defendant.

IV. Amendment of decree, and affirmance thereupon.

12. In the court below, there having been a clerical misprision in decreeing jointly against two defendants as administrators of a decedent, when the pleadings indicated that one of them was sole administrator, and the decree for costs having through oversight been entered against him, as well as against certain heirs of the deceased, de bonis propriis, the appellate court amended the decree in these particulars. The appellate court being farther of opinion that what was declared in the decree would, by necessary implication, relieve the heirs from responsibility for certain land, but that it would have been more regular to direct a release of that land, decreed such release accordingly. And the decree, being thus amended, was thereupon affirmed.

Blessing's adm'rs v. Beatty, 287

V. Reversal for defect in declaration.

13. There being a demurrer to a declaration, and an issue in fact, a verdict is found for the plaintiff, and it does not appear that any judgment was given on the demurrer, otherwise than by implication from the fact that final judgment was given for the plaintiff after the verdict. The court of appeals is of opinion that the demurrer ought to have been sustained: held, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, that it may proceed to judgment on the demurrer, unless the plaintiff shall, on leave obtained in that court, amend his declaration; and if the declaration be amended, for such further proceedings as may in that case be proper.

CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM.

What ca. sa. issued against insolvent will not be quashed.

After a ca. sa. against a judgment debtor has been returned non est inventus, and a scire facias sued out against the special bail, the debtor and the bail move to quash the ca. sa. upon the ground that before the same was issued, and since the judgment was rendered, the debtor took the oath of insolvency at the suit of another creditor, and that the said ca. sa. was issued without the direction of the court. The creditor, plaintiff in the execution and scire facias, resists the motion. It appears that the debtor, having been surrendered to the sheriff by his special bail at the suit of the other creditor, and brought before two justices of the peace, subscribed and delivered in a schedule of his estate, made oath thereto in due form of law, and was thereupon discharged by warrant from the justices, which recited that he had "complied with the directions of the general assembly for the relief of insolvent debtors." No other evidence is adduced to shew that the debtor was ever charged in execution by the creditor at whose suit he was surrendered: held, the motion to quash the ca. sa. must be overruled.

Commonwealth v. Scott, 695

COMMITMENT.

I. What does not sufficiently specify offence.

1. On trial of indictment against W. Y. for felony in stealing a slave, prisoner is acquitted; whereupon court makes the following order: "It appearing to the court, by the testimony of witnesses this day examined on the trial of W. Y. that he is guilty of a misdemeanour, it is ordered that he be remanded to jail, and continued in the custody of the jailor of this court till the next term, to answer an indictment then to be preferred against him." In a bill of exceptions to this order filed by the prisoner, the offence for which he was so remanded is further described as "a misdemeanour under the statute Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 184, § 1, p. 243." On writ of habeas corpus sued out by W. Y. the general court holds the commitment illegal, as not sufficiently specifying the offence, and discharges the prisoner out of custody under the same.

Young v. Commonwealth, 744

II. When general court will remand before a justice after discharge from illegal commitment.

2. A party being acquitted of felony, and thereupon committed by the circuit court to take his trial for a misdemeanour, the general court discharges him on habeas corpus, because the order of commitment does not sufficiently specify the offence; but it appearing from the record of the proceedings in the circuit court, that there is reasonable ground to suspect the party of having committed a violation of the criminal law (other than the specific crime of which he was acquitted) proper to be made the subject of judicial inquiry, the general court orders the sheriff to take him again into custody and carry him forthwith before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law.

DECREE.

I. What decree is interlocutory.

1. Question whether a decree was final or interlocutory. Per Baldwin, J. Where the further action of the court in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, there the decree upon which the question arises is to be regarded not as final, but interlocutory.

2. The opinion of the supreme court of the United States in Ray v. Law, 3 Cranch 179, that a decree for a sale under a mortgage is a final decree, disapproved. S. C., 20

3. In a suit by one partner against his co-partner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and for a moiety of a tract of land purchased by the defendant in his own name, and paid for out of the partnership funds, a decree having been made declaring the land partnership property, and directing a settlement of the accounts, and the cause afterwards coming on to be further heard upon the report of the commissioner, the court decrees that the plaintiff pay to the defendant a sum of money appearing due by the report, and that the defendant thereupon convey to the plaintiff a moiety of the land; but if the plaintiff shall not, within six months from the date of the decree, pay the said money, that the marshal sell the moiety of the land, and out of the proceeds of sale, after defraying the expenses, pay to the defendant the money so decreed, and the residue, if any, to the plaintiff. And the court further decrees that the outstanding debts due to the firm be equally divided between the parties, and that the costs of the suit be equally borne by them: held, this decree is interlocutory, and it may be reviewed upon an appeal, although there has been such lapse of time between the rendition of the decree and the appeal, as would preclude its being reviewed if the decree were final. DEDICATION.

What is no dedication of land to public use.

Case of a town established on a river, by the plan of which there was an artificial line, leaving a strip of land between the lower range of lots and the river. An express dedication of the strip being claimed to have been made by the proprietor to the use of the citizens, and the proof of such dedication consisting of his declarations, the evidence of which was uncertain, the claim defeated by proving that subsequent acts of ownership, inconsistent with such claim, were exercised over the strip by the proprietor and his representatives, for a long period, and with the acquiescence of the citizens.

ESCAPE.

I. Declaration for taking defective bounds bond.

1. In debt on official bond of sheriff, breach assigned is, that the sheriff permitted relator's debtor in execution to escape, by wrongfully accepting from him a defective bond, erroneously purporting to be a prison bounds bond, and that the relator, from the erroneous and defective form of the said bond, was unable to recover his debt by virtue thereof, but was cast in an action brought by him founded upon the same: but declaration makes no profert of such bond, nor vouches the record of the action alleged to have been brought thereon, nor gives any further description of the bond or of the action. On general demurrer to the declaration, held, the assignment of the breach is insufficient.

Vanmeter & al. v. Giles governor, 328

II. Plea that debtor was duly admitted to the bounds.

2. In debt on official bond of the sheriff of H. assigning for breach that the sheriff permitted the escape of a debtor in execution under a ca. sa. from the superior court of H. the defendants plead that the debtor gave bond according to law, with good security, to keep the prison rules for the county of H. and thereupon betook himself to the prison rules for said county, without this that he escaped in any other manner. The bond (of which profert is made in the plea) is with condition that the debtor shall keep within the prison bounds prescribed by the superior court of H. Plaintiff takes oyer of the bond and demurs to the plea: held, as the bond, made part of the plea by oyer, shews that the debtor was admitted to the proper *bounds, the defect if any in the allegations of the plea is thereby cured.

FINE.

Affirmance of judgment for a fine.

The statute allowing damages on affirmance (Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 32, Suppl. to R. C. p. 149,) does not apply to the affirmance of a judgment imposing an amercement or fine; the amercement or fine not being a debt or damages, within the meaning of that act. But though the judgment of affirmance in such case award damages according to law for retarding the execution, yet as no specific damages are thereby adjudged, and the law gives none, the error is merely formal, and the appellate court will disregard it.

FORTHCOMING BOND.

I. Effect of forfeited bond on original judgment.

1. The decisions in Randolph's adm'x v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490, Taylor v. Dundass, 1 Wash. 92, and Downman v. Downman's ex'or, 2 Wash. 189, approved. In conformity with the principle of the first case, held, that if judgment be rendered against two, and one gives a forthcoming bond with security, which is forfeited, the other is not discharged from the original judgment, if the obligors in the forthcoming bond prove insolvent. But also held, according to the decisions in the last two cases, that the forfeited forthcoming bond will prevent any execution or other proceeding on the original judgment, until the same be quashed. Garland &c. v. Lynch, 545

II. Creditor's right to quash bond.

2. Even after execution has been awarded on a forthcoming bond, the bond may be quashed on the motion of the creditor, to enable him to have execution on the original judgment, if the case be one in which the execution on the forthcoming bond has proved unavailing, without any default of the creditor. S. C., 545

III. What surety is insufficient in law.

3. Where the sheriff takes from the owner of goods levied on under execution a forthcoming bond with security, and upon the same being forfeited and execution awarded thereon, the obligors prove insolvent, the sheriff will not generally be liable to the creditor on account of such insolvency, if he can establish that the security was sufficient at the time of taking the bond. But where execution against two is levied on the goods of one, and he gives a forthcoming bond with the other as his only surety, such surety, being already bound, is not security such as the law requires; and if the execution on the forthcoming bond prove unavailing, the sheriff will in this case be liable to the creditor, although he may prove that the surety in the forthcoming bond was sufficient in point of estate at the time of taking the bond. S. C., 545, 6

II. Fraudulent assignment of purchase money.

2. When assignee of bond for purchase money must prove that the assignment was for value. See Assignment No. 4, and Breckenridge v. Auld &c., 148

III. What conveyance is fraudulent as to subsequent creditors.

3. The policy of the statute of 13 Eliz. ch. 5, (substantially adopted in the act of Virginia to prevent frauds and perjuries) investigated by Baldwin, J., and the true principle declared by him to be, that a fraudulent intent of the grantor against one or more creditors is fraudulent against all, and that no distinction exists between prior and subsequent creditors, other than that which arises from the necessity of shewing a fraudulent intent against some creditor, which cannot be done in behalf of creditors not in existence at the time of the conveyance, but by proving either a prior indebtedness, or a prospective fraud against them only.

Hutchison & al. v. Kelly, 123

4. A father made a deed, whereby, in consideration of natural love and affection, he conveyed to his four children, who were infants living with him, all of his property both real and personal. He had another child afterwards. The real property was transferred to the grantees on the commissioner's books, and the taxes charged to them. But the taxes were paid by the father, who *continued to reside on the lands and cultivate them, and to use the personal property as his own. A small part of the land was sold by him after the deed. One of the tracts of land conveyed by the deed was afterwards levied upon and sold under an execution at the suit of the commonwealth against the father, for money for which he was liable as sheriff. The father was still residing on the land at the time of the sale; and on the day of the sale, the father and one of the sons offered to sell the land, and make a good title; but the son forbade the sale by the sheriff. The purchaser from the sheriff obtained possession by virtue of a judgment against the father upon a complaint for unlawful detainer. And then ejectment was brought against the purchaser by the grantees, all of whom were infants at the time of the sheriff's sale. In the action of ejectment, a special verdict was returned, finding the foregoing facts, and also the additional fact, that the deed made by the father to his children was executed for the purpose of avoiding a liability to which he might be subjected in consequence of being the surety of a deputy sheriff: held, the deed made by the father is void as to his creditors, and the purchaser at the sheriff's sale is entitled to hold the tract of land so purchased by him. But it appearing that the commonwealth was satisfied by the proceeds of that tract of land, and the conveyance by the sheriff being not only of that tract, but of another, which was neither levied upon nor sold, held further, the conveyance by the sheriff presents no obstacle to a recovery by the lessors of the plaintiff of the last mentioned tract.

IV. Presumption of fraud from indebtedness of donor.

5. The conclusion drawn from the cases by Kent, chancellor, in Reade v. Livingston & others, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 500, that if a grantor be indebted at the time of a voluntary conveyance, it is presumed to be fraudulent in respect to debts then existing, and no circumstance will permit those debts to be affected by the conveyance, or repel the legal presumption of fraud, approved by Stanard, J., and disapproved by Baldwin, J. The principle declared by the latter to be, that while the indebtedness of the grantor at the time of a voluntary conveyance raises a legal presumption against its validity, that presumption is only prima facie, and not conclusive.

V. What voluntary conveyance is not fraudulent as to a subsequent creditor.

6. In March 1807, a voluntary conveyance was made, settling real and personal estate for the benefit of a wife and children. It was attested by highly respectable and intelligent witnesses, and immediately placed upon record. Eighteen years afterwards, a bill was filed to impeach this conveyance, by a creditor whose debt originated some years after the conveyance was made, and who, it appeared, had notice of the conveyance when not more than a fourth of the debt had been contracted. The bill alleged, that at the time of the conveyance the grantor was very much involved, and largely indebted to many persons. But in the opinion of the court it was proved that he was then, and for several years afterwards, able to meet all his engagements; the owner of property to a considerable amount; in good credit and extensive business; having the command of large sums of money, and not indebted except to a single individual, the debt to whom was not large, considering the grantor's estate: held (in accordance with the principles laid down by Baldwin, J., in Hutchison and others v. Kelly, ante, p. 132), that the bill of the creditor in this case cannot be sustained.

Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c., 500

VI. What purchaser cannot avoid voluntary conveyance.

7. The policy of the statute of 27 Eliz. ch. 4, and of so much of the virginian statute to prevent frauds and perjuries as relates to purchasers, investigated by Baldwin, J. And the principle laid down by him and concurred in by the court, that a voluntary settlement, without actual fraud, made by the grantor upon his wife and children, is not to be deemed conclusively fraudulent and void as to a subsequent purchaser *from him for valuable consideration, when such purchaser has full notice of the prior settlement.

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

I. Mode of stating guardian's account.

1. The decree of this court at the time of the decision reported in 3 Leigh 407, having remanded this cause with directions that the account of the land fund and the hire of the slaves should be stated as a guardian's account, question now whether those directions have been complied with.

Garrett ex'or &c. v. Carr & ux. &c., 196

2. Construction of the 7th section of the act in R. C. 1819, p. 407, concerning guardians, which requires every guardian to exhibit to the court which appointed him, once in every year, "accounts of the produce of the estate, of the sales and disposition of such produce, and of the disbursements;" and of the 9th section, which provides that the balance appearing against the guardian "may be put out to interest for the benefit of the ward, upon such security as the court shall direct and approve; or the guardian, if it remain in his hands, shall account for the interest, to be computed from the time his account was or ought to have been passed."

S. C., 196

3. If, upon the first settlement by the guardian of his account, a balance remain in his hands on which he is to account for interest, such interest must, in his second annual account, be credited to the ward, like other profits of the estate; and if the interest and other profits credited in this second account exceed the disbursements, the surplus, whether it arise from the interest aforesaid

or from other profits, will constitute a balance against the guardian, on which, if it remain in his hands, he must account for interest, which interest must, in the third annual account, be credited to the ward; and so on toties quoties. S. C., 196

4. The case of a guardian indebted to his ward for the annual value of land occupied, and of a slave possessed by him, forms an exception to the general rule that interest is not to be allowed on estimated rents and hires. Such annual value must, in the annual account exhibited by the guardian, be credited to his ward, and the surplus beyond the disbursements will bear interest, like other profits of the estate. S. C., 196

5. Where a guardian has returned no account to the court which appointed him, and a bill in equity is filed against him, the court of equity will charge him with interest from the time and in the manner that he would have been charged, if his account had been exhibited annually to the court which appointed him; and will settle the accounts, in other respects, upon the principles that would have governed the settlements, if regular returns had been made to that court. S. C., 197

6. From the time that the guardianship terminates, the account between the guardian and ward will be stated upon the ordinary principle that prevails between debtor and creditor. Sums paid after that time by the guardian to the ward will be credited at the respective dates of such payments, so as to stop interest pro tanto from those dates. S. C., 197

The court of equity is to dissolve or perpetuate the injunction, or perpetuate it in part and dissolve it for the balance, and it may in the latter case, if it shall appear just, direct that no damages shall be paid by the complainant; but it is not, in any injunction case, not even where the injunction is wholly dissolved, to make a decree for the damages payable to the creditor on the dissolution.

JOINT TENANTS.

I. Interest inter se of joint purchasers of land.

1. A tract of land is purchased by a bricklayer and carpenter, who are to pay part of the price in money at stipulated times, and the rest in a house to be erected by them. 778 The *work to be done by each is agreed upon between them, and they commence its execution: but the carpenter, from misfortune in business, becomes unable to comply with his portion of the agreement. Thereupon a new agreement is made, that the carpenter shall cover in the house, and that for the work he has done, and for covering the house, he shall be allowed the value thereof, and receive that amount in land out of the tract. The carpenter nevertheless fails to cover in the house, and the bricklayer has this part of the work done: held, 1. that by the new agreement, the carpenter's interest in the land is such proportion thereof, as the amount of work then done, and under that agreement to be done by him, was of the original price of the land; and 2. that this proportion is charged to the bricklayer with the value of the work which under that agreement ought to have been, but was not, done by the carpenter.

Cosby v. Lambert, 225

II. What purchase by one of the interest of another is subject to redemption.

2. The carpenter makes a deed of trust conveying his interest in the land to secure two persons, sureties for him in a bond, one of whom is the bricklayer. Being afterwards taken in execution at the suit of other creditors, the carpenter is discharged as an insolvent debtor, and his interest in the land is sold by the sheriff, and purchased, at the price of 50 cents, for the bricklayer. The bricklayer afterwards declares that the carpenter shall have such benefit from the land as his work entitles him to, and upon applying to his cosurety in the bond to contribute to the satisfaction thereof, states that he does not mean to keep the land for what it sold for; that he wants no advantage of that kind. The cosurety makes contribution. Eleven years afterwards, upon a bill in equity being filed by the carpenter, the bricklayer insists that the sale by the sheriff is valid: held, the carpenter is entitled to redeem the interest sold by the sheriff; and a decree should be made for partition of the land, so as to assign him his due proportion, holding the same chargeable with such amount as may be ascertained to be due the bricklayer, after crediting him for the value of the work done by him that ought to have been done by the carpenter, the sum paid by him in discharge of his suretyship, and the 50 cents paid the sheriff, and debiting him with such portion of the rents and profits as the interest of the carpenter in the land entitles him to.

LITERARY FUND.

After the decision in the case of the Literary Fund v. Dawson and others, 10 Leigh 147, an act of assembly was passed the 10th of March 1841, empowering the president and directors of the literary fund to receive the estate of Martin Dawson, devised by the 17th clause of his will, into the literary fund, and making provision for managing and administering the estate when so received. Whereupon the said president and directors filed a bill against the executor and heirs to recover the estate devised by the said 17th clause. And by the answer of the executor and the demurrer of the heirs, the objection was taken that the act of assembly was passed not on the application of the executor, but against his consent, and in other respects, as well as in this, was not such an act as the testator contemplated. The circuit court dismissed the bill. But on an appeal from the decree, the court of appeals reversed the same, and remanded the cause to the circuit court, with directions to overrule the demurrer and give the relief 781 *sought by the bill.

LOTTERY.

Constitutionality and construction of law affecting lottery privilege.

On the 30th of January 1829, a statute is passed appointing commissioners to superintend the raising by way of lottery the sum of 30,000 dollars, to be paid to the president and directors of a turnpike company for the improvement and repair of their road, and authorizing the commissioners to contract with some proper person for managing and conducting the lottery. The turnpike company, relying on the benefit of the statute, contract debts for the erection and completion of their road, expecting and intending to raise money for the payment thereof by a lottery; such debts being contracted prior to the 25th of February 1834, on which day a statute is passed enacting that it shall not be lawful to draw any lottery within the commonwealth, or to sell any ticket in a lottery to be drawn therein, after the 1st of January 1837, but providing that nothing in the statute contained shall interfere with contracts already made for the drawing of lotteries to extend beyond the 1st of January 1837, or with contracts to be thereafter made, under existing laws, for the drawing of lotteries not to extend beyond the 1st of January 1840. On the 11th of March 1834, a statute is passed appointing two persons commissioners, in place of two of the commissioners appointed by the act of January 1829 (who had resigned), to carry into effect the last mentioned act. No contract for the drawing of the lottery is made by the commissioners until the 19th of December 1839, when they make a contract for that purpose with J. P. who, after the 1st of January 1840, sells a ticket in the lottery, which is proposed to be drawn within the commonwealth. On presentment against J. P. for selling the ticket, held, 1. The act of February 1834 did not impair the obligation of any contract, expressly or impliedly made by the commonwealth with the turnpike company, nor contravene any right of private property vested in the company. 2. The act of March 1834, appointing new commissioners, had not the effect of exempting the lottery authorized by the act of January 1829, from the operation of the act of February 1834.

Phalen v. Commonwealth, 713

Mode of proceeding where lunacy of defendant in chancery is suggested.

In a suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage, after the defendant has answered, an account been taken before a commissioner, and a decree of foreclosure made, the sons of the defendant file a petition, suggesting that the defendant is, and was at the time of the mortgage, a lunatic; and they exhibit some affidavits in support of the suggestion. The circuit court thereupon appoints the petitioners guardians ad litem to the defendant, suspends the decree of foreclosure, and (the petition being traversed) directs an issue to try the validity of the mortgage. Afterwards, considering it improper that there should be an enquiry as to the validity of the mortgage until the fact of lunacy at the time of the suggestion is first established, the court sets aside the order directing the issue, leaves those interested to furnish proof of the fact of lunacy by procuring the appointment of a committee by the county court, and declares that if this be not done in a reasonable time, it will rescind the order suspending the decree. The court waits 18 months, and then (no such step having been taken) allows the decree of foreclosure to operate, and orders the parties who filed the petition to pay the costs incurred in consequence thereof. Whereupon those parties, as well as the original defendant, appeal: held, 1. That on the petition and the traverse thereof, the circuit court should have instituted an enquiry as to the state of the defendant's mind at that time, and ascertained whether it was such as to require for him the protection of a guardian ad litem. 2. That the court erred, when, without making this enquiry, it appointed guardians ad litem, and directed an issue to ascertain whether the defendant was of unsound mind when he made the mortgage. *3. That the order directing the issue was properly set aside, to correct the error in making it. 4. That, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was such incapacity as made it proper to appoint a guardian ad litem, the court might have taken such a course as is resorted to in England in like cases; that is to say, it might have referred the matter to a master, for him to report, on a personal examination of the party, aided (if need were) on such examination, by physicians. 5. (Allen, J., dissenting,) That, under the circumstances of the case, the appellate court ought to consider that which was done in the circuit court, as equivalent to an enquiry before the master, and a report by him against the suggestion. And 6. that the parties who filed the petition were not interested as parties in the original suit, and can only claim to be injured by the decree for costs, the appellate court must dismiss the appeal from such decree for costs, as a matter of which it has not jurisdiction.

Campbells v. Bowen's adm'rs &c., 241

MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS.

Construction of exception in statute of limitations.

1. Question whether the exception made by the statute of limitations, of accounts which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, prevents the statute from barring an action upon such accounts, when there has been a cessation of dealings between the parties for five years. Per Stanard and Allen, J., the statute is no bar in such a case. Accord. Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, 5 Cranch 15, and Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh 352.

Coalter v. Coalter, 79

2. Question whether persons engaged as partners in the business of farming, distilling, and purchasing and selling cattle, can properly be considered merchants within the meaning of the said exception. MILLS.

I. What communication with jury of inquest is no ground to set aside inquisition.

1. The jury impanelled under a writ of ad

quod damnum awarded on an application for leave to build a mill, having found difficulty in agreeing upon the damages to be assessed for the overflowing of certain land, it is announced by the sheriff that they are not likely to agree in a verdict; whereupon the applicant requests that the jury will make another effort to come to an agreement, saying that the business is a tedious and troublesome one, and he is willing to pay whatever damages they may think reasonable. A juror then states, that the other jurors wish to assess an amount of damages which he himself thinks too large, and that he is unwilling to concur with them, unless the applicant will consent to pay the damages; and he puts the question to the applicant, whether he is willing to pay the amount (naming it) which the other jurors have fixed upon? The applicant replies that he is; and this juror thereupon concurring with the others, the inquisition is completed. The communications aforesaid take place openly, before the sheriff and all the jurors, as well as other persons assembled; though the owner of the land to be overflowed is not present at the taking of the inquisition: held, this is not such an interference of the applicant with the jury, as to make it proper to set aside the inquisition.

Hunter v. Matthews, 468

II. What judgment granting leave to build mill is valid.

2. A judgment granting leave to the proprietor of the lands on both sides of a stream to erect thereon a mill and dam, is valid and sufficient, though the record does not set forth to whom the bed of the stream belongs, and though the owner of the land which the inquisition finds will be overflowed had no notice of the time of making the application for the writ of ad quod damnum, or of the time of executing the same.

Hunter v. Matthews, 468

783 *III. What judgment granting leave to build mill is erroneous.

3. Where, upon an application to a county court for leave to erect a mill and dam, the inquisition finds that a certain quantity of land not belonging to the applicant will be overflowed, and assesses damages to the proprietor, it is erroneous for the judgment granting leave to erect the mill and dam, to provide, that upon the payment of the damages so assessed, the land overflowed shall become vested in the applicant in fee simple; and upon appeal to the circuit court by the proprietor of the land, that court must reverse the judgment with costs, though the appellee himself suggest the error and move that it be corrected.

I. What shall be deemed a mortgage.

1. Where a deed for land is absolute on its face, and, at the time it is made, a written agreement is entered into by the parties, shewing that the object of the deed is to secure to the grantee money, and indemnify him against liabilities, such deed is only a mortgage, and the right of redemption by the mortgagor is incident to it.

III. Controversy between claimants under successive deeds of trust.

3. On the 25th of August 1827, a deed of trust was made to four trustees of the second part, for the benefit of certain cestuis que trust of the third part, conveying land slaves and personal property, and also a growing crop of tobacco and corn, subject to such disposition as the trustees might find it necessary to make of the crop for the payment of any money due from the grantor

(who was an attorney at law) to his clients. The deed was only executed by the grantor, and upon his acknowledgment was admitted to record. Two of the trustees expressly declined to act. On the 26th of November 1827, another deed was made by the same grantor to the two other trustees, conveying all the slaves mentioned in the deed of 784 August 1827, as well as some *others, and also the crop of tobacco, to secure to a party money advanced by him to pay off executions which had been levied upon the slave property mentioned in the first deed, one of which executions was for a debt due to a client, of greater amount than the value of the tobacco crop. The proceeds of the property conveyed by this deed are applied according to its provisions. It does not appear that the deed of August 1827 was made on previous consultation with, or received the subsequent ratification of, the creditors or trustees named therein, or that any claim was asserted under it until October 1832; when a bill is filed by a party not named in that deed, and, for aught that appears, not known until then as one embraced by the description of client creditor, asking a decree against the cestui que trust in the deed of November 1827 for the value of the tobacco crop: held that the plaintiff has no title to the relief sought. Per Stanard, J. The deed of August 1827, being, when the deed of November 1827 was made, without the sanction of assent or ratification, could not in that predicament be any shield of the property against the levy of executions of creditors, nor any effectual impediment to the bona fide conveyance of the property by the grantor for valuable consideration.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

1. According to the original plan of the mutual assurance society, as developed by the acts of 1794 and 1795, none but an unincumbered fee simple estate was insurable; the insurance of mortgaged property was not thereby contemplated.

Ingrams v. Mutual assurance society, 661

2. In 1796, declarations were made for assurance in the mutual assurance society. In 1798, the party who declared for assurance died. And in 1821, a bill was filed by the society against his widow and heir, to subject the property insured to sale for the payment of certain quotas, which had been required in 1805 and 1809, and succeeding years down to 1820, inclusive. It appearing that at the time of the insurance the property was under mortgage, and the lapse of time being also relied on, decreed that the bill be dismissed. S. C., 661

NEW TRIAL.

1. When venire de novo in ejectment is unnecessary. See Special verdict, and Hutchison & al. v. Kelley, 124

II. New trial in felony for misconduct of jurors.

2. Pending a trial for felony and before the testimony is closed, five of the jury having received permission to retire from the courtroom accompanied by the sheriff, another juror thereupon leaves the jury box without the knowledge of the court, passes out of the courthouse through a crowd of persons collected about the door, and remains absent a few minutes, after which he returns into court; having (as he deposes) held no communication whatever with any person during his absence; but not having been, during that period, in charge of the sheriff, or even seen by him. The trial proceeds and the prisoner is convicted: held, such separation of the juror from his fellows is sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict.

Overbee v. Commonwealth, 756

3. After a verdict of conviction for murder in the first degree, prisoner adduces testimony that two of the jurors who tried the case, and who on the voir dire declared that they had not formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, had in fact, previous to the trial, expressed decided opinions that the prisoner was guilty and ought to be hung; of which circumstance prisoner alleges he had no knowledge until since the verdict was rendered: and on this ground he moves to set aside the verdict: held, 1. Such enquiry

785 *was open, and the evidence admissible, for the purpose of shewing perjury and corruption in the jurors. But, 2. It belonged exclusively to the judge who presided at the trial, to weigh the conflicting credibility of the witnesses adduced by the prisoner and of the jurors, and to decide whether, in justice to the prisoner, and upon all the circumstances of the case, a new trial ought or ought not to be awarded.

quod damnum awarded on an application for leave to build a mill, having found difficulty in agreeing upon the damages to be assessed for the overflowing of certain land, it is announced by the sheriff that they are not likely to agree in a verdict; whereupon the applicant requests that the jury will make another effort to come to an agreement, saying that the business is a tedious and troublesome one, and he is willing to pay whatever damages they may think reasonable. A juror then states, that the other jurors wish to assess an amount of damages which he himself thinks too large, and that he is unwilling to concur with them, unless the applicant will consent to pay the damages; and he puts the question to the applicant, whether he is willing to pay the amount (naming it) which the other jurors have fixed upon? The applicant replies that he is; and this juror thereupon concurring with the others, the inquisition is completed. The communications aforesaid take place openly, before the sheriff and all the jurors, as well as other persons assembled; though the owner of the land to be overflowed is not present at the taking of the inquisition: held, this is not such an interference of the applicant with the jury, as to make it proper to set aside the inquisition.

II. What judgment granting leave to build mill is valid.

2. A judgment granting leave to the proprietor of the lands on both sides of a stream to erect thereon a mill and dam, is valid and sufficient, though the record does not set forth to whom the bed of the stream belongs, and though the owner of the land which the inquisition finds will be overflowed had no notice of the time of making the application for the writ of ad quod damnum, or of the time of executing the same.

Hunter v. Matthews, 468

783 *III. What judgment granting leave to build mill is erroneous.

3. Where, upon an application to a county court for leave to erect a mill and dam, the inquisition finds that a certain quantity of land not belonging to the applicant will be overflowed, and assesses damages to the proprietor, it is erroneous for the judgment granting leave to erect the mill and dam, to provide, that upon the payment of the damages so assessed, the land overflowed shall become vested in the applicant in fee simple; and upon appeal to the circuit court by the proprietor of the land, that court must reverse the judgment with costs, though the appellee himself suggest the error and move that it be corrected.

I. Correction of mistake in conveyance.

1. Sale is made of land embraced by a deed under which the vendor claims, but by mistake the conveyance from the vendor embraces some land not conveyed by that deed, and omits some comprised in it. MORTGAGES AND TRUSTS.

I. What shall be deemed a mortgage.

1. Where a deed for land is absolute on its face, and, at the time it is made, a written agreement is entered into by the parties, shewing that the object of the deed is to secure to the grantee money, and indemnify him against liabilities, such deed is only a mortgage, and the right of redemption by the mortgagor is incident to it.

III. Controversy between claimants under successive deeds of trust.

3. On the 25th of August 1827, a deed of trust was made to four trustees of the second part, for the benefit of certain cestuis que trust of the third part, conveying land slaves and personal property, and also a growing crop of tobacco and corn, subject to such disposition as the trustees might find it necessary to make of the crop for the payment of any money due from the grantor

(who was an attorney at law) to his clients. The deed was only executed by the grantor, and upon his acknowledgment was admitted to record. Two of the trustees expressly declined to act. On the 26th of November 1827, another deed was made by the same grantor to the two other trustees, conveying all the slaves mentioned in the deed of 784 August 1827, as well as some *others, and also the crop of tobacco, to secure to a party money advanced by him to pay off executions which had been levied upon the slave property mentioned in the first deed, one of which executions was for a debt due to a client, of greater amount than the value of the tobacco crop. The proceeds of the property conveyed by this deed are applied according to its provisions. It does not appear that the deed of August 1827 was made on previous consultation with, or received the subsequent ratification of, the creditors or trustees named therein, or that any claim was asserted under it until October 1832; when a bill is filed by a party not named in that deed, and, for aught that appears, not known until then as one embraced by the description of client creditor, asking a decree against the cestui que trust in the deed of November 1827 for the value of the tobacco crop: held that the plaintiff has no title to the relief sought. Per Stanard, J. The deed of August 1827, being, when the deed of November 1827 was made, without the sanction of assent or ratification, could not in that predicament be any shield of the property against the levy of executions of creditors, nor any effectual impediment to the bona fide conveyance of the property by the grantor for valuable consideration.

PARTNERSHIP.

- I. Competency of evidence on issue as to existence of partnership.
 1. In assumpsit against S. B. & C. as partners under the firm of S. & Co. for goods sold, the question being *whether B. and C. were partners of S. by whom the goods were purchased, and B. and C. appearing to have had a storehouse in another town, a witness was asked whether he saw boxes of goods marked S. & Co. at the storehouse of B. and C. The defendants objected to the question, but the circuit court permitted it to be answered, and the defendants excepted: held, the evidence had a connexion, though very slight, with the matter in controversy, and though it might have been of very little weight, it was not error to permit it to go to the jury as a link in the chain of circumstances.

2. A second bill of exceptions stated that the defendants asked a witness, whether he was present at a settlement made between S. B. and C. of their accounts relative to their mercantile transactions, after goods had been furnished the first by the last two? whether he knew for what certain bonds then executed by S. to B. and C. were given; and whether 20 per cent. on the amount stated to be due was not included in said bonds? The plaintiffs objected to the question, on the ground that the acts and declarations of the defendants could not be given in evidence for them, and the court sustained the objection: held, the evidence was properly rejected; the bill of exceptions not shewing the time of the transaction between the defendants, nor suggesting any connexion between the fact which the evidence was offered to prove and the matter in controversy, nor stating any thing from which such connexion could be inferred.

S. C., 267, 8

3. A third bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs asked a witness if he had heard S. say what representations he had made to the plaintiffs at the time he purchased the goods from them, as to the existence of a partnership between himself and the other defendants: held, the evidence was properly admissible to prove that the plaintiffs intended to sell to, and S. intended to purchase for, a partnership, but was no proof against B. and C. that they were the partners. That evidence, however, was not regularly admissible, even for this limited purpose, until the plaintiffs had offered evidence tending to shew that there was a partnership between S. B. and C. which authorized S. to purchase on the credit of the three. S. C., 268

II. What does not constitute partnership.

4. A fourth bill of exceptions stated, that the court was asked by the defendants to give the jury the following instructions: 1. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that in June 1832, S. bought of B. and C. $1000 worth of goods, to commence merchandizing with on Brush creek, and that S. was to pay B. and C. for said goods 20 per cent. upon the cost thereof, or a portion of the profits of the same, to be left to the election of B. and C. and that in September succeeding the purchase, and before all the $1000 worth of goods had been received by

S., B. and C. did elect to take the 20 per cent., and that when the goods were sold and delivered, they were charged by B. and C. to S., and the business upon Brush creek conducted, not only to the time of the election, but afterwards, in the name of S., then the said contract is not in law a partnership. 2. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the election by B. and C. under the contract with S. of June 1832, was made in September thereafter, and was to take the 20 per cent., and that the same was previous to the purchase of goods by S. of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs at the time of giving the credit to S. did not know of the said contract made in June 1832, then they ought to find for the defendants: held, the instructions so asked correctly expound the law of the case stated therein, and the circuit court erred in refusing to give them.

III. Limited partnership, and notice of dissolution.

5. The fourth bill of exceptions further shewed that the circuit court, instead of the instructions so asked, gave the following: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that B. and C. entered into a contract with S. by which they agreed to furnish him with 1000 dollars worth of goods for the purpose of merchandizing on Brush creek, for which, by said contract, they were entitled to demand from S. either an advance of 20 per cent. or to take a portion *of the profits arising from the sale thereof, and that the said goods or a portion thereof were furnished to S. who traded thereon previous to the said election being made, it constituted B. and C. partners of S. until such period as they have made their said election and given notice thereof to the world, and responsible for his contracts in relation to said business": held, the instruction so given was wrong in this, that though the case stated might have created a temporary partnership until election, it was limited to the sale of the goods furnished, and to the profits thereof, and did not extend to purchases and sales of other goods, and the dissolution of such partnership was effectual in respect to all who may have had actual notice, though such notice may not have been given to the world, or even publicly.

IV. Limitation of suit by one partner against another for account.

6. An action of account by one partner against his copartner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, must be commenced within five years next after the cause of action, and unless so commenced, will be barred by the statute of limitations, 1 R. C. 1819, ch. 128, § 4, p. 488, for such accounts do not concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, and therefore are not embraced by the exception to the statute. II. Who is a cosurety entitled to contribution.

2. A joint and several single bill being executed in the country by a principal and seven sureties, to enable the principal to borrow money from a bank, and the principal, upon coming to town, finding that the rules of the bank require a town surety, application is made by him to a citizen to become such surety. This citizen having adopted a rule not to put his name on bank paper for any person, but being willing to accommodate the principal, applies to a friend to become bound on the paper, with an assurance that if the principal does not pay it off when it becomes due, he will pay it off for him. Under this assurance, that friend puts his name on the paper as a co-obligor with the other sureties, without their knowledge. And thereupon the paper is discounted by the bank. The principal makes default when the bill becomes due, and soon afterwards the citizen pays it off: held by two judges (Brooke and Stanard) that the citizen is to be considered one of the eight sureties, having become such in the name of his friend, and that he is entitled to contribution from all except that friend: dissentiente Cabell, P.

III. What suit pending against absent surety does not affect purchaser of his land.

3. The facts being as above stated, a suit in equity was brought by the nominal surety against the cosureties, one of whom was an absent defendant owning land in the commonwealth. The suit was resisted on the ground that no payment had been made by the plaintiff. Subsequently, by an amendment of the bill, the surety who paid was united in the suit as a coplaintiff. In the interval between the commencement of the suit and the amendment of the bill, the absent defendant returned to the commonwealth, and conveyed the land to a purchaser for valuable consideration: held, no lien is created upon the land in the hands of the purchaser by these proceedings; not by the proceedings in the name of the nominal surety, because, no payment having been made by him, no decree could be rendered in his favour; and not by the proceedings in the name of the surety who paid, because the conveyance to the purchaser was before those proceedings.

IV. What prior surety will not be relieved against subsequent surety.

4. A personal decree against an administrator being recovered by a creditor of the decedent, the administrator appeals, giving an appeal bond with surety; the decree being affirmed, an arrangement is made between the creditor and the surety in the appeal bond, by which the decree is transferred to the surety, who makes a part of the amount due thereon by execution against the administrator, and then brings an action on the administration bond, in the name of the creditor as relator, against the surety therein bound, in which action a judgment is recovered for the balance due on the affirmed decree, being less than the amount of damages incurred by the appeal: held, the surety in the administration bond has no claim to be substituted to the remedy of the creditor on the appeal bond, and equity will not interfere in his favour by injoining the judgment.

PRISON BOUNDS BOND.

I. What bond is sufficient.

1. A prison bounds bond is taken payable to the sheriff, his certain attorney, his heirs or assigns, and the execution debtor having broken the bounds in the time of the same sheriff, the bond is by him assigned to the creditor: held, such bond and assignment are good and sufficient in law to render the obligors responsible to the creditor, and the sheriff is not liable for the escape.

Vanmeter & al. v. Giles governor, 328

2. Prior to the 1st of January 1820, the law did not require that bonds given for the prison rules should be conditioned for the return of the debtor to close prison at the end of a year. S. C., 328

II. Who may assign.

3. A prison bound bonds made payable to the sheriff and his successors in office, may be assigned to the creditor by the sheriff who took it, or by a succeeding sheriff, according as the debtor's escape may be in the time of the one sheriff or the other: per Baldwin, J. S. C., 328

4. Quære whether, if a prison bounds bond were made payable to the sheriff and his representatives, or to him alone, it would be assignable by him, or, in the event of his death, by his executor or administrator, after an escape of the debtor from a succeeding sheriff? S. C., 328

RESCISSION.

When rescission will be decreed in favour of vendee.

1. The grantee in a deed for land, which is absolute on its face, but in truth a mortgage, having conveyed the land to a purchaser from him for valuable consideration, without notice of the equity; and the purchaser, upon obtaining knowledge of it, having filed a bill against his vendor for a rescission of the contract, in which suit the mortgagor is a party, and unites in the prayer for rescission: held, such rescission will be decreed, unless there be some other party who has a right to object.

Breckenridge v. Auld &c., 148

2. The owner of a tract of land conveys the same in trust to secure a debt, and afterwards, in May 1819, sells 100 acres of the tract to a party having notice of the incumbrance, who receives from the vendor a deed and the possession of the land, pays him a part of the purchase money, and engages to pay the residue when the vendor shall make him a good title; no time being limited for perfecting the title, and both parties believing that several years will elapse before it is perfected. The whole tract is sold under the trust deed, and conveyed by the trustee to the purchaser; who, in 1820, brings suit in chancery against the original owner, his vendee of the 100 acres, and a third person, by whom a lien on the land is claimed under a trust deed prior in date to that under which the plaintiff purchased; the object of the suit being to have the plaintiff's title quieted, and possession of the land delivered to him. The vendee of the 100 acres, having failed to answer the bill though duly served with process, is brought into court in June 1832 to answer interrogatories, and the plaintiff thereupon offering him the election, to take a conveyance from the plaintiff of his title to the 100 acres, and pay him the residue of the purchase money stipulated with the 792 vendor, or else *to surrender his own title under the vendor's deed, he answers, declining to have his contract with the vendor carried into execution, and reclaiming the purchase money he has paid him. The land has then become greatly depreciated in value. In 1833 it is decided that the first deed of trust has been satisfied, and that the defendant claiming under it has no lien. In 1834 the court not only decrees that the plaintiff be quieted in his title and possession against all the defendants, but, holding that the vendee of the 100 acres has been unreasonably delayed in his title, and that the tender by the plaintiff was too late, proceeds to decree that the contract and deed for the 100 acres be annulled, and that the vendor repay to the vendee the purchase money he has received. The vendor appeals from the decree, and in the court of appeals objects.
1. That equity has no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's case. 2. That the vendee ought to have been required to take the title offered by the plaintiff. 3. That the case is not one in which a decree can properly be rendered between codefendants. But the court of appeals affirms the decree.

SETOFF.

I. Equitable defence in action at law.

1. The 62d section of the act passed the 16th of April 1831, establishing the circuit superior courts, allowed the equitable defences therein provided for, in all actions at law pending in such courts at the time of pleading the same, whether such actions were *originally brought in such courts, or had been transferred thereto from the former superior courts of law.

Campbell's adm'r v. Montgomery, 392

II. Setoff in equity against judgment at law.

2. A sale is made of a tract of land, and the terms set forth in articles of agreement executed under seal between the two vendors and the vendee. One of the vendors dies after bequeathing what is due to her, and appoints her legatee executor. A lien being alleged to exist upon the land, the surviving vendor and the executor enter into bond with surety to indemnify the vendee, who thereupon pays most of the purchase money. Afterwards the vendee is compelled to pay a considerable sum to satisfy the lien, and one of the principal obligors being out of the commonwealth, and the other insolvent, he retains for his indemnity the assets of the surety (of whose estate he is administrator) against other creditors of the surety, some of equal and others of inferior degree. An action of covenant being then brought on the articles of sale, in the name of the vendor who survived, for the benefit of the legatee of the other, against the vendee, a trial is had, upon which both parties treat the amount of assets of the surety's estate retained by the administrator, as a satisfaction pro tanto of the indemnifying bond, and the difference between the amount so retained and the sum paid to satisfy the lien being credited, a verdict is found and judgment rendered for what is supposed to be the balance due of the purchase money. On a bill in equity by the vendee, in his own right and as administrator of the surety, against the surviving vendor and the legatee of the other, shewing the foregoing facts, and that, since the judgment, debts against the surety, alleged to be of superior dignity to that upon the indemnifying bond, have been demanded of the complainant and claimed by suit, held, 1. That though none of the other debts against the surety's estate should appear to be of higher dignity than the claim on the indemnifying bond, still the complainant, as administrator of the surety, is rightly in equity, to obtain satisfaction for the payment made out of the surety's estate on account of the suretyship; and one of the principals having removed from the commonwealth, and the other being insolvent, he may stay in his hands the amount due from himself personally on the judgment, in part satisfaction of the claim of the surety's estate: 2. That if any of the debts against the surety's estate shall appear to be of higher dignity than the claim against the surety on the indemnifying bond, and it shall become necessary to apply to the payment of those debts any part of the assets of the surety's estate, the complainant will for so much have a valid claim in his own right, and to that extent the injunction to the judgment should be perpetuated.

3. That the sheriff is liable for taking as surety in forthcoming bond a party bound by the judgment, see Forthcoming bond No. 3, and

Garland &c. v. Lynch, 545, 6

4. In a suit on a sheriff's bond under the act 1 R. C. 1819, ch. 78, § 13, p. 279, there is a demurrer to the evidence, and it appearing thereby that the party for whose use the suit is brought had an execution against two, which was levied on the goods of one, who gave a forthcoming bond with the 794 other as security, and *that, the bond being forfeited, the execution awarded thereon proved unavailing, the circuit court holds the evidence sufficient to support the action. Some of the evidence which had been introduced tending to shew that part of the debt might have been made under the execution on the forthcoming bond if the creditor had not interfered, the counsel for the defendants then insists that the jury should weigh the evidence in assessing the damages. But the opinion of the circuit court is, that the plaintiff must recover the amount of his debt, or nothing, and that the evidence cannot be urged before the jury in mitigation of damages: held, that in fixing the damages absolutely at the amount of the debt, and thus taking from the jury all discretion, the circuit court erred. SLAVES AND FREE NEGROES.

I. Widow's interest in money received for deported slaves under treaty of Ghent.

1. Under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and the subsequent conventions between the United States and Great Britain, of London in October 1818, and of St. Petersburg in July 1822, the owners of slaves which were carried away from the territories of the United States by the british forces at the close of the late war, were entitled to indemnity for all such slaves, but not to the slaves in and specie: and a citizen of Virginia, the owner of certain slaves so deported, having died in 1825 without issue, leaving his wife surviving him, and his administrator having afterwards received, under the act of congress of the 2d March 1827, a sum of money as indemnity for those slaves, the widow is entitled to half the distributable surplus of that money, as her absolute property, not merely to such interest therein as she would have been entitled to in the slaves.

Foushee v. Blackwell & wife, 488

II. What suit for slaves is not within jurisdiction of equity.

2. Bill in equity by claimant of legal title to a female slave, against an adverse claimant, charges that the slave, with her increase if any, is in possession of defendant, who refuses to surrender the same to plaintiff; and prays that defendant may be decreed to give up the slave, that he may set forth the names of her increase if any, and say if the same be not in his possession, and that he may account for the hires and profits thereof since the plaintiff's title accrued: held, equity has no jurisdiction of the case.

Armstrong v. Huntons, 323

3. A feme sole owning slaves made a bill of sale of them for 500 dollars, took from the purchaser his bond for that sum, and on the same day made her will releasing the bond. She died soon afterwards, and her will was offered for probat to the county court of Nelson, and the case continued until the next term. Before that term a bill in equity was exhibited to a judge in vacation, by the purchaser against two defendants, setting forth that at the time the instruments were executed the slaves were in Stafford, but that after the death of the testatrix, and before her will could be proved, one of the defendants went to Stafford and took possession of the slaves, and together with the other, who aided him in getting possession of them, had clandestinely removed them, or was clandestinely removing them, from the county of Stafford, and would probably sell them to a trader, or so secrete them as to put it out of the complainant's power to regain the possession of them. An injunction was awarded, and the order directed to the clerk of the circuit court of Nelson, though neither the defendants nor the slaves had ever been in that county. The defendants in their answers objected to the jurisdiction, but did not set up any title to the slaves except through the decedent, and as her next of kin: held, 1. that the case made by the bill was not one for the equitable jurisdiction of any court; and 2. that if it were, that jurisdiction could not have been properly exercised by the circuit court of Nelson.

Henry v. Bradford, 53

5. A testatrix domiciled in the district of Columbia bequeaths a negro to a legatee, to serve him 27 years, and then be free. The legatee sells the negro for that period, and takes from the purchaser a bond conditioned that he will not sell the negro for a longer time. The negro is brought into Virginia by the purchaser, with the purpose of carrying him through this state to a city or state farther south. On a bill in the name of the negro, an injunction is awarded by a judge in Virginia, to prevent his being carried out of the commonwealth until farther order. The purchaser, by his answer, denies that he has attempted to sell the negro for a longer period than the 27 years, and denies that he has designed, or does design, to do any act to prevent him from enjoying his liberty at the end of that time. The evidence in support of the bill only shews that the purchaser was engaged in the business of purchasing and selling slaves: held, as it does not appear by the evidence that the contemplated removal of the negro beyond the limits of this commonwealth was with intent to defeat his right to freedom when the same should accrue, or upon any claim to hold or sell him as a slave beyond that period, the injunction must be dissolved, and the negro restored to the purchaser's possession.

Williams v. Manuel, 639

IV. Proceeding where slaves have been suffered by master to go at large.

6. No warrant is necessary for apprehending a slave going at large or hiring himself out contrary to law.

Abrahams v. Commonwealth, 675

7. A slave is committed to the jail of a corporation "until the next court of hustings to be held for the same," by warrant from a justice of the peace of the corporation, which recites that the slave has been apprehended therein and brought before the justice by J. T. informer, for having been permitted by S. A. his master to go at large and hire himself out contrary to the act of assembly in such case provided, and that it appears to the justice that such slave comes within the purview of said act: held, 1. The court of hustings has jurisdiction to proceed against the master, according to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 81. 2. It is no objection to the proceeding before the court, that the master had no notice of the proceeding before the justice. 3. In the proceeding before the court, no presentment, indictment or information against the master is necessary.

8. Warrant committing to jail a slave apprehended for going at large and hiring himself out contrary to law, recites that he was apprehended and brought before the justice "by J. T. informer;" order of court directing master to be summoned states that the slave is "charged on the information of J. T.;" judgment imposing fine on master directs two thirds thereof to be paid "to J. T. the informer, who caused the fact to be established": held, it sufficiently appears hereby, that the prosecution was qui tam, for the benefit as well of the informer as the commonwealth.

9. Several slaves of one master, apprehended in a corporation for going at large and hiring themselves out contrary to law, are committed to jail until the next corporation court, by separate warrants from a justice of the peace; the court awards a summons against the master, which is issued and duly served, requiring him to shew cause why he should not be fined as the law directs, for permitting his slaves D. A. &c. (naming them all) to go at large and hire themselves out in the city, contrary to law; the master appears and makes defence, and in respect to each slave a separate trial is had, and a separate fine imposed: in appellate court, the master objects that there was only one summons, and the corporation court had no authority to divide the trial: held, there is nothing in the objection.

S. C., 676

10. Quære whether a master, charged, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 81, with having permitted his slave to go at large and hire himself out contrary to law, is entitled to demand that the fact 796 shall be tried by a jury? But whether he has such right or not, yet if he appear in court and make defence without demanding a trial by jury, and a judgment be thereupon rendered against him, he cannot object in the appellate court that such trial was not awarded.

11. Judgment in county or corporation court, against a master for permitting his slave to go at large and hire himself out contrary to law, is properly rendered for the costs of the prosecution, including jail fees, as well as for the fine.

Hutchison & al., v. Kelly, 124, 5

SPECIFIC EXECUTION.

I. Specific execution denied to vendor; contract rescinded; and account taken between vendor and vendee.

1. On the 10th of October 1818, a sale was made of a tract of 370 acres of land in Augusta county, at $40 per acre, to be paid as follows, viz: $600 in hand (which was paid accordingly), $1200 on the 28th of December 1818 with interest from the day of sale, $1200 on the 28th of March 1819 with like interest, $750 on the 28th of March 1820, and the residue in sums of $750 payable at specified times. By the articles of agreement, the vendee was to give bonds and satisfactory security for his payments, and the vendor bound himself to make the vendee a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, with general warranty, at the first Augusta court after the payment in 1819. The vendee paid the instalment which fell due on the 28th of December 1818, and the instalment which fell due in 1819 was paid, part before, and the residue on, the 9th of December in that year, so that the vendor became bound to make a deed for the land as early as the first Augusta court after the 9th of December 1819. No deed was made. The vendee notwithstanding paid the instalment which fell due on the 28th of March 1820. About the 10th of April of that year, the vendor died insolvent, and the vendee, soon after his death, made known his determination to make no farther payments until he should get a title. On the 10th of September 1821, a suit in equity was brought by the administrators of the vendor against the vendee and the heirs of the vendor, to compel a specific execution of the contract; and no title having ever been obtained by the vendor, the complainants made defendants those in whom that title was outstanding. A considerable fall having taken place in the value of property, the vendee, by his answer sworn to in May 1825, resisted the prayer of the bill, on the ground that, under the circumstances of the case, equity required a rescission, and not an execution of the contract. At this time the default of the vendor's heirs still continued, and it continued three years afterwards; that 797 *is to say, it continued for more than eight years from the time when the vendor had bound himself to make the title. During this time the land had fallen in value more than 50 per cent. and the vendee had never surrendered possession: held, 1. That the long continued default of the vendor and his heirs, and the change of circumstances during its continuance, constitute a valid objection to a specific performance of the contract. 2. That the vendee should, on the one hand, release all his rights under the contract, deliver up the land, and account for its rents and profits during the time he held it; and, on the other hand, have the purchase money paid by him returned, with interest from the times when the payments were made, and also have the value of any permanent improvements which he may have put upon the land set off against the rents and profits, provided they do not exceed the amount of the said rents and profits. 3. That if, on stating an account between the parties on these principles, a balance should appear to be due from the vendee, he should be decreed to pay it; if in his favour, it should be decreed to him, and if there be no sufficient personal estate of the vendor to pay the same, the land should be subjected to its payment. 4. That each party should pay his own costs, except as to taking the accounts, the costs of which should be equally divided between the parties.

Bryan v. Lofftus's adm'rs, 12

II. What bill by vendee for specific execution in part will be dismissed.

2. A husband sells land in which his wife has an estate in fee, and executes a bond to the purchaser, conditioned that he and his wife will make a deed to the purchaser within a specified time. After that time the husband states that his wife has declined joining him in the deed, and has forbidden him to convey his estate, and he refuses to make any conveyance. Thereupon a bill is filed by the purchaser against the husband, stating that there are children of the marriage, claiming that the husband is therefore entitled to a life estate, and praying that he may be decreed to convey to the complainant all his interest in the land, reserving to the complainant his right of action at law upon the bond against the husband for failing to procure his wife to unite with him in the conveyance. The bill being demurred to, the circuit court sustains the demurrer and dismisses the bill; and this decree is affirmed.

TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES.

I. What is received by ex'or as a trustee.

1. What fund received by executor is not received in his executorial character but in that of trustee under the will. See Wills No. 6, and

Jackson & al. v. Updegraffe & al., 107

II. Rights of cestuis que trust in case of unexecuted trust to purchase and divide lands.

2. An inhabitant of Frederick county, Virginia, who died in 1806, desired by his will, 1. that the tract of land on which he lived should be sold by his executors, at such time and upon such terms as they in their judgment might think would be most conducive to the advantage of his heirs; 2. that the money arising from the sale should be applied to the purchasing other lands upon the most advantageous terms, either in state of Kentucky, or some other part of the western country that his executors might think would be most to the general interest of his heirs; and 3. that the lands so purchased should be divided amongst his five daughters and two sons, in the following manner; each of his daughters to have 400 acres, and the residue to be equally divided between the two sons; all of which divisions he desired should bear an equal proportion to each other in respect to the quality of land. The testator appointed his wife executrix, and one of his sons executor. The son qualified as executor a few months after the testator's death, and the widow died about two years afterwards. The husband of one of the daughters purchased the right of another daughter, and the three other daughters sold their rights to the son who was executor. In 1816, a bill was filed in the name of the husband and wife, to compel the executor to execute the trust by selling the land and distributing the proceeds. In 1827, a supplemental bill was filed, setting forth that in 1817 a sale was made, but the executor had taken no further step towards the execution of the trust; and praying that the plaintiffs might have a decree for their proportion of the proceeds of sale. The executor answered, that he had always been ready to purchase land in the western country for the complainants: held, 1. That as the trustee has improperly delayed the execution of the trust, until a great change has taken place in the situation of the western country and the circumstances of the parties, the beneficiaries ought not now to be compelled to take lands in the western country, but should be allowed to take their just proportion of the money arising from the sale of the Frederick lands; and that the principle of equality in the division of the said money is in this case just and proper. 2. That the female complainant's portion of the money arising from the sale of the lands should be so secured and protected, as to prevent its being subjected to the control or debts of the husband to a greater extent than if it were land, unless the wife should consent that the money be paid to the husband absolutely; as to which she ought to be privily examined, separately and apart from her husband, in the same manner as in the conveyance of her real estate.

3. Concerning devise in trust for testator's daughter and her children, see Will No. 7, and Stinson ex'or &c. v. Day & wife, 435

IV. Devise for literary fund.

4. Concerning devise to executors in trust for the literary fund, see Literary fund, and Literary fund v. Dawsons, 402

V. Breach of trust, and cooperation therein.

5. Parties dealing with an executor or trustee, and cooperating with him in the misapplication of assets or trust funds, in violation of the duties of the executor, or in breach of the trust, cannot use such transactions as a defence against the claim of creditors, legatees, or cestuis que trust. And the application of assets or trust funds, by the executor or trustee, to the discharge of his individual responsibilities, is, unless the estate or trust be indebted to the executor or trustee, a violation of duty or breach of trust.

TURNPIKE COMPANY.

See Roads No. 2, and Hill v. Salem turnpike co., 263

VENDOR AND VENDEE.

I. Who is not entitled to lien for purchase money.

1. A person entitled to have an assignment of a title bond and the possession of the property upon paying a certain sum, transfers his right, and his assignee pays that sum, and assigns his right to another, who obtains title to the property according to the bond; after which the person first mentioned files a bill, alleging that his transfer was in consideration of money which has never been paid him, and claiming that the lien of a vendor for purchase money exists in his favor, upon the property in the hands of the subsequent holders, who purchased, as he alleges, with notice: held, no such lien exists.

IV. Right of surveying.

7. Where there is a sale of land by the acre, a right of surveying exists whether expressly reserved or not, and if no time is limited for making the election to survey, it may be done at any time before the whole business is closed between the parties. Accord. Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 332, and Carter v. Campbell, Gilm. 170.

Crawford & al. v. M'Daniel, 448

V. Compensation for deficiency or excess.

8. A deed of bargain and sale conveys a tract of land described as "containing by survey 785 acres, and bounded as follows, to wit, beginning" &c: (here certain metes and bounds were set out) "this part containing 765 acres, and another part attached to the same tract containing 20 acres, and making up the full amount of 785 acres, being bounded as follows," &c.—the price stated in the deed being 11775 dollars, which is the product of 785 acres at 15 dollars per acre, and there being no evidence but the deed itself of the terms of the contract between the vendor and vendee. It turns out that the tract contains less than 785 acres: held, the vendee is entitled to compensation for the deficiency.

Crawford & al. v. M'Daniel, 448

9. The principles upon which equity gives relief to vendor in case of excess, or to vendee in case of deficiency *in the estimated quantity of land, examined by Baldwin, J.

Blessing's adm'rs v. Beatty, 287

10. An estimate by the parties of the quantity of land sold, whether in a contract executed or in a contract executory, ought to be taken prima facie to have influenced the price. Therefore where a sale was made, for 2000 dollars, of a tract of land, which, in the articles of sale and in the deed of conveyance, was mentioned as "containing 280 acres," without the addition of the customary words "more or less," and the tract proved to contain only 253 acres, it was considered that although the purchase money was not an equimultiple of the number of acres, yet the presumption was against the contract being one of hazard, and the vendor was held liable for the deficiency; dissentiente Standard, J.

VI. Rate of compensation and extent of relief to vendee.

11. Where, at the time of the sale of a tract of land, it is estimated that there is a certain number of acres within the boundaries by which the tract is conveyed, and it afterwards appears that the vendee is entitled to be compensated for a deficiency in the quantity, the rule of compensation will generally be according to the average value of the whole tract.

12. The vendee of land injoins a judgment recovered against him for a balance of the purchase money, alleging a defect in the title to the land, which he fails to prove, whereupon the injunction is dissolved and the bill dismissed. Afterwards he brings another suit, in which he establishes his right to compensation for a deficiency in the quantity of the land, to an amount equal to the unpaid balance of the purchase money: held, he is entitled to relief as well against the damages accrued on the dissolution of the first injunction, as against the judgment at law.

13. After judgment recovered by vendor against two joint vendees of land for a balance of the purchase money, one of the vendees dies, and the other brings a suit in equity against the vendor, alleging and proving a deficiency in the quantity of the land to a value exceeding the unpaid balance of the purchase money, and claiming that the judgment be enjoined and the overpaid money refunded: held, it is improper to decree in the cause without having the representatives of the deceased vendee before the court: dissentiente Stanard, J.

WILL.

I. Bill contesting validity of will.

1. Where a bill has been admitted to probat, and a person interested appears within seven years afterwards and files a bill in chancery under the act 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 104, § 13, it is sufficient in such bill to aver in general terms that the writing of which probat has been received is not the will of the decedent.

Malone's adm'r & al. v. Hobbs & al., 346

II. Plaintiffs in such bill.

2. An answer to a bill contesting the validity of a will states, that some of the plaintiffs had accepted legacies and devises under the will; and the fact appears to be so by exhibits filed with the answer. After verdict and decree against the will, the objection is taken in an appellate court, that those parties had precluded themselves from disputing the validity of the will, and that as they are improperly joined with the other plaintiffs, the suit cannot be sustained: held, the objection will not avail. S. C., 346

III. Evidence on issue devisavit vel non.

3. On the trial of an issue whether a writing, admitted to probat as a will, be the will of the decedent or not, the evidence against the will consists of statements by witnesses, of what a legatee had told them had passed on one occasion when he and the decedent were together. That legatee is one of many defendants, and it does not appear that he refused to testify. The admissibility of such evidence questioned before the appellate court by counsel, but not decided. S. C., 346

806 *IV. What is no revocation of will.

4. On the trial of an issue whether a writing, admitted to probat as a will, was the will of the decedent or not, it appeared that the decedent had made a codicil to his will, and that the codicil was afterwards destroyed by his direction. The evidence tended to shew that the will was written on one sheet of paper, and the codicil on another; that the will was left with one person, and the codicil with another; and that the will and codicil were with those persons respectively, at the time the codicil was destroyed. The circuit court instructed the jury, that if they believed from the evidence, that the decedent intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, thereby to destroy or revoke the will, in that case the destruction of the codicil was a revocation of both the will and codicil: held, this instruction was erroneous. S. C., 346, 7

5. Although a testator has directed his will to be destroyed, and believes that it has been destroyed as requested, yet if it be not in fact destroyed, such direction and belief will not operate as a revocation of the will, even in relation to the personal estate. S. C., 347

V. Direction that ex'or receive and pay over legacy charged on devisee.

6. A testator, besides bequeathing a sum of money to his wife, and another sum to his daughter Rebecca, bequeathed to his daughter Susanna $4000 to be paid by his executors in equal payments of $1000 each after his decease. He devised lands to certain devisees, provided they should pay into the hands of his executors the sum of $1000 per annum for eleven years. He made a bequest to two sons John and Samuel, they making themselves answerable for certain payments to his wife and his daughter Rebecca. And he directed his executors to receive $1000 annually from the devisees before mentioned for five years, to be paid over by them to his daughter Susanna. The remaining $6000 as it should become due, he gave to his sons John and Samuel. Under this will a question arose as to the quality and extent of the power conferred on the executors over the fund of $1000 per annum, charged on the devisees. Per Stanard, J., the proposition that this fund is identified with the personal estate of the testator, and passes to the executors subject in all respects to the executorial power over personal estate, and to all the liabilities of such estate, cannot be maintained: the legacy of $5000 for the daughter Susanna is not a general one, payable out of the personal assets, with the charge on the land as an auxiliary security, but is a legacy to be paid only by means of the charge; and the fund arising from this charge has no more the quality of personalty, than a fund arising from land directed to be sold to pay a legacy.

VI. Devise for testator's daughter and her children.

7. A testator devises to a married daughter A. R. and her heirs, W. S. R. included, two tracts of land, and declaring that the daughter's husband is not capable of conducting his own affairs, and is therefore entirely excluded from managing any part of his (testator's) estate, directs that his executor shall manage the land "in the following manner, that is to say, that A. R. and her children shall have the rents or profit, except the place I now rent to W. R. and J. D. for three years, but after that time the entire profit of both tracts shall be to the said A. R. and her children, and shall not be sold by them or any of them until her youngest child comes to the age of 21 years, and not then without the consent of my daughter A. R. if she is then living." At the date of the will A. R. has eight children, all of whom except two are living with her. The annual value of the land devised is about 175 dollars: held by the court of appeals (dissentiente Stanard, J.), A. R. is entitled to receive the whole rents and profits of the land devised, during her life, and her children can maintain no suit to recover any portion of the same. Accord. Wallace & ux. v. WINCHESTER AND POTOMAC RAILROAD COMPANY.

What assessment of damages will not sustain action of debt against the company.

Under the act passed April 8, 1831, to incorporate the Winchester and Potomac railroad company, the free holders appointed by an order of the county court for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by the proprietor of certain lands through which the railroad was to be opened, certified, in the form prescribed by the act, that they assessed the damages at the sum of 972 dollars; and then subjoined the following words: "We further declare that if the railroad company shall refuse to pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the lane, she (the proprietor) shall receive the additional sum of 2000 dollars." The report, upon being returned to the county court, was ordered to be recorded. An action of debt was afterwards brought to recover the 2000 dollars; the declaration averring that the company, although requested so to do, had refused to pass the water as aforesaid. Upon demurrer to the declaration, held, the action cannot be maintained. Per Stanard, J., the charter of the company does not warrant a contingent assessment of damages by the commissioners, and does not authorize the county court to render a conditional judgment therefor: the court is authorized to render such judgment only as would authorize the clerk to issue an execution thereon.

PREFACE.

In the court of appeals, on the first day of April 1844, Conway Robinson resigned the office of reporter. On the ninth of the same month, the court proceeded to fill the vacancy; and the vote being given viva voce in open court, judges Baldwin, Allen, Stanard, Brooke and the president voted for Peachy R. Grattan esquire, and so he was unanimously appointed.

The present reporter for the state of New York has announced, in the preface to his first volume, that within the last few years the justices of the supreme court of that state have, by extraordinary exertions, been able to clear off the large amount of arrearages upon their calendar, and to prevent any new accumulations of business. He tells us, that "at each of the forty-eight terms, general and special, which have been held within the last four years, with only two exceptions—one in 1838 and the other in 1839—every cause and motion has been heard which was ready for argument; and such as were not disposed of at the time, have usually been disposed of at the next succeeding term."* It is not now, and for many years it has not been, in the power of the reporter of the court of appeals of Virginia to communicate any such agreeable intelligence. The great principle of magna charta, that "justice or right shall not be sold, denied or deferred to any man," has been fully recognized in Virginia by statute;† but we have only in practice the benefit of part of it,—the most important part, it is true, but not enough without the other also. Justice, with us, is not sold, but it is deferred to a most grievous extent,—to such an extent as to amount almost to a denial of it. It is intolerable that a party to an appeal should be unable, with all possible diligence, to get a hearing for seven or eight years after the appeal is allowed. Yet such is the state of things in the court at Richmond, and it is fast becoming as bad at Lewisburg; for according to the returns, the number of cases decided at either place within a year is not equal to the number of new appeals and supersedeases awarded within the same time. The evil has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

The present volume terminates the official connexion of its compiler with the court; but he retains in full remembrance the courtesy always manifested towards him by the judges, and holds each and all of them in the highest respect. He feels the deepest interest in the court, being still at its bar, and expecting to be employed there so long as his capacity for labour shall continue. Thus situated, and fully sensible of the magnitude of the evil to which he has adverted; regarding it as one which bar, bench and legislature ought to do all in their respective spheres to correct, he ventures, with all due respect, to make the following suggestions.

From the bench we want, in the first place, some evidence that if more causes are argued or submitted, more can be decided. It happens often, after an argument is closed, that the decision is delayed for some months; sometimes for a year or two. This tends to produce an impression that, small as is the number of causes argued or submitted, it is as great as the court finds it in its power to decide. The best way to remove this impression is for the court to pursue a more energetic course of action. That will operate as a stimulus to counsel.

The court will then have a right to expect that counsel will be prepared to bring on a greater number of causes, and that time will not be wasted (in useless words) in one cause, which can be employed, so much to the advantage both of client and counsel, in another. Printed arguments will probably be made use of to a greater extent. And the arguments, when ore tenus, may be expected to be more condensed, because of the previous preparation.

Very possibly the court may, in this way, get as many causes argued or submitted as it may find itself able to decide. But if it shall be found otherwise, then it may be advisable for the court to protract its session an hour longer each day. It is, indeed, desirable that the morning hours prior to the meeting of the court should be retained by the judges for the examination of the records and authorities: but the court may perhaps find it in its power, instead of adjourning at three o'clock in the afternoon, to sit till four. And if it should, the time gained will be much more than the additional hour. Many an argument which, with the daily session of three hours, now takes up two days, would then be closed in one. Considering the ages of our judges, the amount of work they have to do every day out of court, and the length of their terms, a session of four hours a day is as much as can be hoped for, and perhaps more than can be accomplished.

In England, it is true, the usual hours of sitting in the court of queen's bench are from ten a. m. to four p. m. and the court, from a desire to keep down the business, has latterly protracted its session frequently till five, and sometimes an hour later.‡ But there the records to be examined out of court, being altogether in common law causes, are far less voluminous than the records generally in our court of appeals. And there, too, the compensation is sufficient to command the ablest lawyers in the prime of life. Here it is generally otherwise. And we are apt to find, that if our judges have attained great reputation for ability, they have also attained an age at which the capacity for labour begins to be impaired. It is worthy the consideration of the legislature, whether it be not wise to enlarge the range of selection for the office of judge of its supreme tribunal, and whether it be not more proper that one filling this high office should have a salary sufficient to enable him to live with his family in Richmond, than that he should be put on an allowance so meagre as to require him to be separated from them half the year.

It becomes our legislators also to consider whether they are not chargeable, on other grounds, with the delay in the administration of justice. It is a grievous thing that in the election of a judge, members should act as if they were choosing an elector for the office of president of the United States. If a suitor has his cause delayed or erroneously decided, it is small consolation to him that, at the time the judge was elected, he and the judge concurred in opinion on the question who was the most suitable person to be elected president. An appointment to the general court bench, upon any such ground, of a man of inferior judicial qualifications, operates most deleteriously in respect to the court of appeals. Many a case necessarily comes up, which, had there been a proper judge below, would have been there finally determined.

Perhaps the number of judges of the general court is larger than may be necessary as a permanent measure. If some were dispensed with, and the compensation of the rest increased by giving them the salaries of those dispensed with, the tendency would undoubtedly be to elevate the office. Any legislation of this sort must of course be prospective. It might be left to the judges, upon the happening of a vacancy, to re-arrange the circuits to suit the number of judges then remaining.

The most beneficial measure, however, that could be adopted to produce immediate relief, would be to create an office of chancellor for the country east of the blue ridge, and another for the country west of the ridge, to whom appeals should lie from the circuit courts in all equity causes. Supposing the office to be placed upon a good footing in respect to compensation, and the incumbent to be well qualified for it, the consequence here, as in New York, would be, that the mass of equity cases would never go beyond the chancellor: there would rarely be an appeal from him to the court of appeals, except in cases presenting very novel questions, or cases of great magnitude; and indeed the amount requisite to give the court of appeals jurisdiction might then, with great propriety, be enlarged in equity cases, say to five hundred dollars. The chancellors would very easily dispose of all the appeals from the circuit courts in equity cases, and might, in addition, give relief in those circuits in which the chancery business might be unreasonably delayed, by having jurisdiction to remove by certiorari chancery causes so delayed. In common law cases, as appeals lie in New York from the circuit courts to the supreme court, so here they might lie directly to the court of appeals. The time taken up with these is small, in comparison with that which is required for appeals from decrees of the circuit courts. And the court of appeals, relieved from the last, would be able to devote almost its whole energies to the present docket. We should then have a fair prospect (which at present we have not) of seeing the docket annually reduced.

This measure of two chancellors with appellate jurisdiction is a very simple one, making but little inroad upon the present system. Its value would of course essentially depend upon the mode of filling the office of chancellor. And the range of selection for the office would greatly depend upon the salary attached to it. It should not be less than the salary of a judge of the court of appeals. Virginia is not too poor to pay what is reasonable and proper for the administration of justice. She might pay the judges of her court of appeals enough to enable them to live in town with their families, and pay for two chancellors besides. But if no further appropriation can be obtained, then let the measure of two chancellors be carried out without any more money. It will only be necessary to provide that no vacancy in the court of appeals shall be filled until the number of judges of that court is reduced to three; and the great desideratum—taking no more money—will be attained.

The great size of the present volume forbids enlarging further upon this subject.

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Miller v. Trevilian and Others.

April, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent STANARD,* J.)

Debtor and Creditor—Application of Payments.—The principle laid down by CABELL, J., in Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 484, that "a debtor owing a debt consisting of principal and interest, and making a partial payment, has a right to direct its application to so much of the principal in exclusion of the interest, and the creditor, if he receives it, is bound to apply it accordingly," approved and acted on.

Trust and Trustees—Equitable Relief to Cestui Que Trust of Bond Secured by Trust Deed.—A testator having authorized a tract of land to be sold and the money put at interest for the benefit of his children, his executor sold the land and took a bond (secured by a deed of trust) to be paid the 21st of August 1820, with interest from the 25th of December 1817. On the 30th of October 1820, the executor received of the purchaser a sum of money, to be applied to the credit of the principal. The purchaser having sold part of the land and taken from his vendee four bonds, one payable the 16th *of April 1821, and the others on the 25th of December in the years 1821, 1822, and 1823, the executor, on the 21st of January 1822, took an assignment of those bonds and of a deed of trust securing the same, and gave a receipt stating that they were to be credited in part of the principal at the dates at which those bonds were due. In June 1823, the purchaser enjoined the executor from selling under his deed of trust, upon the ground of a defect of title to two parcels of the land, one of 16¼, the other of 100 acres, part of which last parcel being included in the sale to the subvendee, the alleged defect of title was made the ground also of injunction by him. In 1835, the injunction of the first purchaser was perpetuated as to the price of the 16¼ acres, and dissolved as to the residue, so far as it remained unpaid. The executor having in the mean time removed from the commonwealth, a bill was thereupon filed by some of the legatees, against the purchaser, the trustee in his deed of trust, the executor, and another legatee, to ascertain the balance due. The bill averred, that many years since, the bond payable to the executor was transferred to the legatee defendant, to collect for himself and the others interested, and he had removed from the state; that the complainants do not know where the bond is, or whether it is lost or destroyed; and that the trustee declines to advertise or sell, for want of the bond. As to all the defendants except the purchaser, the bill was taken for confessed. HELD, 1. Equity has jurisdiction; on the ground that the legatees, though entitled to the balance due from the purchaser, are mere beneficiaries, having no legal right which they could assert at law; and also on the ground that, the case being one in which it would have been improper for the trustee to sell until some proceeding was had to ascertain the amount due, the creditors had a right to come into equity to have the amount ascertained. 2. The purchaser, having in his hands evidence of all the payments alleged by him, has no right to require that the bond shall be produced before an account is stated. 3. The payments which the executor agreed should be credited against the principal must be so applied; the case not being taken out of the influence of the principle laid down in Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 484, by the circumstance that the party who so agreed was a fiduciary, nor by any of the other circumstances before mentioned.

Trustees—Duty as to Sale of Trust Property—Sacrifice of Property.—In Morris v. Virginia State Ins. Co., 90 Va. 373, 18 S. E. Rep. 843, the court said: "It is the trustee's duty to forbear to sell, and to ask the aid and instructions of a court of equity, in all cases where the amount of the debt is unliquidated or in good faith disputed, when any cloud rests upon the title, when a reasonable price cannot be obtained, or when, for any reason, a sale is likely to be accompanied by a sacrifice of the property, which, at the cost of some delay, may be obviated. 3 Minor Inst. 287; 1 Tuck. Com. 106; Lane v. Tidball (Gilmer 180); Wilkins v. Gordon, 11 Leigh 547; Miller v. Argyle, 5 Leigh 460; Miller v. Trevilian, 2 Rob. 25; Bryan v. Stump, 8 Gratt. 247."

The principal case is cited in this connection in Muller v. Stone, 84 Va. 837, 6 S. E. Rep. 223; Spencer v. Lee, 19 W. Va. 195.

See foot-note to Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Gratt. 657.

Frederick Argyle of the county of Goochland died in 1811, having made his will, which contained the following clauses:

"It is my will and desire that all my 3 *just debts should be paid by my executors hereinafter mentioned; after which I desire that my wife shall remain in possession of the land whereon I now reside; until such time as my said wife and my executors shall think proper to sell it, and appropriate a part of the money arising from such sale to the purchase of a small tract of land, which they shall deem sufficient for the support of my said wife and children; and after such purchase having been made and the purchase money paid, it is my will and desire that the residue of the money arising out of the sale of the land on which I live shall be put at interest for the benefit of my children, and the portion of each to be given up to them by my executors as they shall arrive to the age of twenty-one years.

“Item, it is my will and desire that the land directed above to be purchased by my executors shall, at the death of my wife, be sold, and the money arising therefrom equally divided between my children.”

The will was admitted to record in the court of Goochland county, and Isaac Curd alone qualified as executor.

The land on which the testator resided contained by survey 1033 acres, and was sold by the executor on the 21st of August 1817, to William Miller, for 27 dollars an acre, amounting to 27891 dollars, bearing interest from the 25th of December 1817, and payable one third the 21st of August 1818, one third the 21st of August 1819, and the other third the 21st of August 1820. At the time of the sale, the executor conveyed the land to Miller, and Miller executed three bonds to the executor for the purchase money, and a deed of trust upon the land, to Thomas Curd and Benjamin Anderson as trustees, to secure the payment of those bonds.

Miller discharged the first two bonds, and on account of the third made the payments evidenced by the two following receipts:

4 *“1820, October 30. Received of William Miller 1500 dollars, to be applied to the credit of the principal of his bond due me in August last as executor of Frederick Argyle deceased.

Is. Curd.”

“1822, January 21. Received of William Miller, William Guerrant’s note for 400 dollars due 16 April 1821, said Guerrant’s note for 1777 dollars 50 cents due 25 December 1821, said Guerrant’s note for 2777 dollars 50 cents due 25 December 1822, said Guerrant’s note for 2777 dollars 50 cents due 25 December 1823, which said several sums are secured by deed of trust given by said Guerrant and wife, which is assigned to Isaac Curd executor of Frederick Argyle deceased by said Miller. Said several notes are to be credited on said Miller’s bond to me, in part of the principal of said bond (which was due on the 21st of August 1820), on the dates on which the notes aforesaid fall due. Also the further sum of 24 dollars 63 cents, to be credited as aforesaid on this day. The above named bond is the only one due me from said Miller.

These receipts were exhibited by Miller with the bill of injunction filed by him in June 1823, in the case of Miller v. Argyle’s ex’or and others, reported in 5 Leigh 460, wherein he sought to obtain an allowance for an alleged defect of title to two parcels of the land, one of 100, the other of 16½ acres. He stated in that bill, that he “had gone on to settle towards the discharge of his” third “bond, as per receipts of the said Isaac Curd, the sum of 9257 dollars 13 cents;” and further said, that from a statement made by him of the transaction between said Argyle’s executor and himself, estimating his loss at 116½ acres, Argyle’s estate would be indebted to him 1435 dollars 88 cents, to carry interest from the 25th of December 1822. That statement was as follows:

6 *The four bonds of William Guerrant to Miller, which the latter assigned to Curd, were given upon a sale by Miller to Guerrant, at 15 dollars per acre, of 555½ acres of the land bought by Miller from Argyle’s executor. And Guerrant alleging that he had paid off the two first bonds, and that the title was defective to 100 acres of the land which he had bought, to wit, the same 100 acres in respect to which Miller had alleged a defect of title, an injunction was awarded Guerrant (upon a bill filed by him in September 1823) to restrain proceedings under his deed of trust as to 2000 dollars. But afterwards an affidavit of Joshua P. Hunnicutt, the deputy surveyor of Goochland, having

*The purchase money of 116½ acres of land at $7 dollars per acre amounted to 8145 dollars 50 cents, and 5 years interest thereon to 943 dollars 65 cents, making together this sum of 4089 dollars 15 cents. Deducting 4089 dollars 15 cents from 5264 dollars 12 cents, there would have been a balance against Miller of 1174 dollars 97 cents. But then by bringing into the account 2610 dollars 55 cents for Guerrant’s fourth bond, and deducting therefrom the 1174 dollars 97 cents, a balance would appear to be due Miller of 1435 dollars 88 cents, which corresponds within a few cents with the balance mentioned in this statement.—Note in Original Edition.

shewn that only about 72 acres of the land to which the title was alleged to be defective, was comprised in Guerrant's purchase, the court, on the 17th of March 1824, dissolved his injunction except as to the sum of 1080 dollars, that being the price of 72 acres at 15 dollars per acre.

Subsequently, to wit, on the 25th of September 1824, judgments were obtained by Curd against Guerrant on his two last bonds. One judgment was for 2777 dollars 50 cents with interest from the 25th of December 1822 till paid, and the costs, but to be credited by 209 dollars 19 cents received 2d November 1822, by 200 dollars 20th October 1823, and by 2116 dollars 19 cents on the 24th of April 1824. The other judgment was for 2777 dollars 50 cents with interest from the 25th of December 1823 till paid, and the costs, but to be credited by 1080 dollars by injunction, and the balance of this judgment was to be discharged by the payment of 1704 dollars 16 cents with legal interest thereon from 25th September 1825* till paid.

While Miller's injunction case was pending in the county court of Goochland, the following addition seems *to have been made to the statement exhibited with his bill.

On the 28th of December 1830, while the appeal of Argyle's executor from the decree obtained by Miller in his injunction case was pending in the superior court of chancery, Miller filed, as exhibits in the latter court, a copy of the record in Guerrant's injunction case (which was still pending), copies of the judgments obtained by Curd against Guerrant on his two last bonds, and the following assignment: "I assign the balance due on my judgments against William Guerrant in Goochland superior court of law, to William Miller, without recourse to me, this 9th day of November 1825. Is. Curd." The superior court of chancery, in January 1831, reversed the decree of the county court, and entered a decree dissolving Miller's injunction and dismissing his bill. Miller then appealed to this court, and the decision on his appeal is reported in the before mentioned case of Miller v. Argyle's ex'or and others, 5 Leigh

*Why this judgment, rendered the 25th of September 1824, was, as to the balance, to be discharged by a sum of money bearing interest from the 25th of September 1825, does not appear from the record.
—Note in Original Edition.

460. It was pronounced the 19th of November 1834; and upon a copy thereof being transmitted to the circuit court of Henrico, the cause was heard in that court the 11th of November 1835. The executor of 8 Argyle now *admitted that the 16½ acres of land, which had been recovered of Miller by a superior title, was a part of the land sold by the executor to Miller, for the title to which the executor was responsible; and it was decreed that the injunction be perpetuated as to 440 dollars of the principal of the debt, that being (as the decree stated) the value of 16½ acres of land at 27 dollars per acre, and Miller was declared entitled to a credit therefor as of the 25th of December 1817. For the rest, the counsel of Argyle's executor took a decree which declared in general terms, that "as to the residue of the sum" contracted by Miller to be paid "and which may remain unpaid," the injunction be dissolved and the bill dismissed; and then proceeded to dispose of the subject of costs.

This decree dissolving the injunction, in general terms, for what remained unpaid, was merely a foundation for a new suit to ascertain how much was unpaid.

In January 1836, a bill was filed in the circuit court of Goochland by John M. Trevilian and ——— his wife, and others, legatees of Frederick Argyle deceased, against Miller, Isaac Curd, Benjamin Anderson and Thomas Curd (the trustees in Miller's deed of trust), John W. Argyle, and the widow and infant children of a deceased legatee, setting forth, that according to a statement made from that of Miller exhibited in his injunction suit, it appeared that if there were credited against the third bond the price of the 16½ acres, the cash credited in Miller's statement, and all the four bonds of Guerrant, there would still be due from Miller on the 16th of June 1823, when his injunction was obtained, the sum of 2136 dollars 34 cents, with legal interest from that date on 2074 dollars 12 cents part thereof. That the complainants know nothing of the payments credited to Miller in his statement, and therefore do not admit them. That they have reason to believe that a 9 *large portion of one at least of Guerrant's bonds has not been paid off, viz. the 1080 dollars as to which Guerrant's injunction yet stands; and unless Miller can shew that he has paid off this sum to Curd, it remains, with its interest, as a debt due from Miller, Guerrant having left this commonwealth many years since, notoriously insolvent. That Miller refuses to furnish any statement of the amount due from him, or to enter into any settlement or make any payment unless and until his bond is produced. That the statement made from his, as before mentioned, has been submitted to him for revision and correction, if erroneous: but he has refused to correct or respond to it in any manner, other than by a demand of his bond. That the complainants, not having the bond, are unable to produce it. That, many years since, it was transferred to John W. Argyle, to collect for himself and the others interested. That Isaac Curd and John W. Argyle have removed from the commonwealth, and the complainants do not know where the bond is, or whether it has been lost or destroyed. That the complainants have been recently informed, that when Curd was about to leave the commonwealth, upon some settlement between him and Miller, the bond was surrendered by him to Miller. That they are advised it is their right to have a full and true statement from Miller touching the said bond, and the payments made by him, and the time and manner of such payments. That deeming at least 3154 dollars 12 cents due, with interest from the 25th of December 1822, they were willing to receive that sum, and called upon Benjamin Anderson, one of the trustees under the deed from Miller, to advertise and sell so much of the land as might be necessary to raise that sum, intending of course to have the cooperation of the other trustee; but Anderson positively declined to advertise or sell, for want of the bond. Two of the complainants made oath, that so much of the 10 bill as depended *upon their knowledge was true, and so much as depended upon the information of others they believed to be true.

Miller filed a demurrer to the bill, assigning for cause, that it did not charge that John W. Argyle had lost the bond, nor was there filed with the bill any affidavit of that fact.

The demurrer being overruled, Miller filed an answer, stating that he paid towards the discharge of the principal of the third bond, as was agreed by Curd and him, the sum of 1500 dollars on the 30th of October 1820, and 7757 dollars 13 cents on the 21st of January 1822, per receipts; and crediting in addition 445 dollars 50 cents for the 16½ acres, the principal of the bond was overpaid by 405 dollars 63 cents; which last mentioned sum, and the further sum of 94 dollars 16 cents due him from Curd for costs recovered against him and for clerk's fees, are to be deducted from the interest that accrued upon the main sum before it was extinguished. That no other credits are claimed by him. That the bond was assigned by Curd to John W. Argyle, for him to collect the balance due on it for his own use and benefit, and not for the use and benefit of the heirs of Frederick Argyle deceased, as charged in the bill. That on the respondent's refusing payment to John W. Argyle on account of the supposed deficiency in the land, Argyle returned the bond to Isaac Curd. That Curd had possession of it in the fall of 1825. That it was then his property, and the respondent believes it is at this time his property, as he has had no notice of the bond being assigned by Curd to any person whatever since that time. That the charge of the respondent's having possession of the bond is false, he not having had possession of it since he executed and delivered it to

Curd. That the respondent is under the impression, that if the heirs of Frederick

Argyle deceased have a claim against 11 any person on account of *the said bond, it is against Isaac Curd and his sureties, and not against the respondent; but he does not know what is the state of accounts between them and Curd, and does not know or admit that Curd is indebted to them a single cent, or that they have a right to call upon any person for any thing on account of said bond. That, finding the plaintiff Trevilian had not his bond, he had determined to have nothing to do with him on the subject, and deemed it not necessary to respond to his enquiries, or those of any other person, unless he was authorized by Curd to settle the matter, or produced his bond. That he conceives the complainants have no kind of right to call upon him for an exhibition of his accounts with Curd, or to ask any question about the time, place or means, when, where and how he may have paid off any debt which he may have owed to Curd; that he is advised they allege no shadow of right to claim any thing of him on account of Guerrant's bonds assigned by him to Curd; and that as it appears that Curd himself has settled that matter, and transferred his judgments against Guerrant to the respondent, no foundation is laid in the bill to support any enquiry touching a discovery about the said bonds, or the manner in which they have been paid and satisfied. He avers, "that in no settlement ever made between the said Isaac Curd and him, was the matter of his injunction disposed of or meddled with. That matter was then in court, and remained to be disposed of as might be adjudged in court. "The matter," he says, "of Guerrant's injunction for the 1080 dollars, and all other matters concerning Guerrant's debt, have long since all been paid off and satisfied. Not one cent is due on that account."

The infant defendants answered by guardian ad litem. The cause was proceeded in as to Isaac Curd and John W. Argyle in the manner prescribed by law as to absent defendants. And as to the other defendants the bill was taken for confessed.

12 *The circuit court ordered that Miller rendered before a commissioner an account of the sums paid by him in part of the purchase money of the land, and the times at which and the manner in which the said payments were made, so as to shew the balance due from him. A report being made under this order, and exceptions filed thereto by both parties, the court, on the 19th of October 1837, re-committed the report with the exceptions to the commissioner.

Under this order of recommitment an account was stated, whereby the price of the 16½ acres, the cash paid by Miller, and the two first bonds of Guerrant, were all deducted from the principal, and there was likewise credited against the principal so much of Guerrant's third and fourth bonds as appeared by the judgments thereupon to have been paid previous to the reassignment from Curd to Miller. Exceptions were again filed; and the cause came on to be heard the 19th of October 1839.

The circuit court was of opinion, that Miller was entitled to credit for the whole amount of the bonds assigned by him to the executor, on the days when they respectively became due; but that the credit should not be applied to the extinguishment of the principal, so as to leave the balances unproductive in whole or in part: and the court, adopting, in lieu of a report by a commissioner, a statement prepared by the court in conformity with its opinion, decreed accordingly.

From this decree, on the petition of Miller, an appeal was allowed.

Leigh for appellant. Miller states his belief that Curd was not indebted one farthing to the plaintiffs on account of this trust. And there is not any account taken, or directed, or asked for, of Curd's administration of the trust found. Miller's statement ought, under such circumstances, to be taken as correct. At all 13 *events, upon the record as it stands, without any account between Curd and his cestuis que trust, or between Miller and Curd, it is impossible to decide that Miller is not to have credit for the payments mentioned in Curd's receipts.

There is then but the single question as to the application of the payments. And on this point the case of Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 481, is a conclusive authority in favour of Miller, unless, as to this matter, a distinction can be established between the transactions of individuals, contracting each in his own right, and similar transactions between an executor, legally selling the trust subject, and his vendee.

Grattan for appellees. As to Miller's allegation of his belief that Curd the executor was not indebted to the legatees of his testator, it is enough to say that there is no proof whatever even tending to justify that belief.

The second receipt shews that two of the notes of Guerrant mentioned therein were not due at the date of that receipt. Even if money paid by Miller could properly be applied to the principal of the debt, there is no ground to hold that notes or bonds not yet due, taken as payment, can be so applied. Miller, too, was well aware that Curd was dealing improperly with the trust property. And a purchaser of trust property, confederating improperly with the trustee, and obtaining the trust subject for an inadequate value, will not be allowed to retain the advantage he has thereby acquired, as against the parties interested in the fund. Graff and others v. Castleman &c., 5 Rand. 195; Broadus and others v. Rosson and wife and others, 3 Leigh 12; Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119; Keane and others v. Roberts and others, 4 Madd. C. R. eng. edi. p. 332, am. edi. p. 177; Wilson v. Moore, 1 Mylne & Keene 126, 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 14 530. Moreover Miller *was himself the cause of the difficulty which Curd experienced in collecting Guerrant's bonds. The injunction of Miller produced the difficulty. And that injunction was upon a ground which this court adjudged to be available only as to a very small part of Miller's purchase money.

Grattan also argued to shew that credit ought to be withdrawn from Miller for parts of Guerrant's third and fourth bonds; to wit, the 1080 dollars as to which Guerrant's injunction was pending, and the balance due upon the judgments against Guerrant at the time of the reassignment from Curd to Miller.

[Leigh. As it seems the cause is to be argued upon the merits on every point, I now apprise the gentlemen on the other side, that I shall take an exception to the jurisdiction of equity to decree against Miller on a bond upon which there was full remedy at law. I shall further insist that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover without proof of the assignment of the bond, notwithstanding the bill was taken for confessed as to Curd the alleged assignor.]

Stanard for appellees. If the plaintiffs had merely set forth the loss of the bond, and that they had it not, the bill, being sworn to, would have given jurisdiction to equity. Atkinson v. Leonard, 3 Brown's Ch. Rep. 218; Toulmin v. Price, 5 Ves. 238; Cabell's ex'ors v. Megginson's adm'rs, 6 Munf. 202; Shields v. The Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 541. The case of Taliaferro v. Foote, 3 Leigh 58, may perhaps be relied upon on the other side. But in that case there was no affidavit of loss, and the statement in the bill was very vague and unsatisfactory: it was not stated that the bond was lost, or was out of the power of the plaintiff, or even that any enquiry had been made for it. But in this case

the bill was filed neither by the obligee
15 nor the assignee of *the bond, both of whom were out of the commonwealth. The plaintiffs are cestuis que trust who are entitled to the proceeds of the bond, but have no control over it, no means of enforcing its production, nor any remedy upon it at law. And their object is to obtain a discovery and account of the payments made by the obligor, and a decree for the balance appearing to be due.

Miller is called upon to say what payments had been made by him to the executor, or to any person entitled to receive the money. He answers merely that he has paid 7000 dollars and upwards, as per receipts, and denies the right of the plaintiffs to call upon him for any discovery of his payments, or of his settlement with Curd the executor. There is not a particle of evidence to prove any payment, except the receipts of Curd the executor, and Miller's assignment to him of the bonds due from Guerrant. And the question then is, how far those receipts and that assignment are evidence to prove such payments by Miller to Curd? There is nothing in the terms of the receipt for Guerrant's bonds, to entitle Miller to a credit for the amount, until it should be paid by Guerrant. And the evidence shews that two of the bonds were not paid to Curd. Guerrant, it appears, enjoined the recovery upon them to the amount of 1080 dollars. At the utmost, Miller could only be entitled to a credit for the balance which remained after deducting the 1080 dollars. But in November 1825, Curd reassigned to Miller the balance. This assignment does not purport to be for value received; and that it was not for value received, may be inferred from the fact that it was "without recourse." If the assignee relies upon the assignment as one for value, he ought to prove the consideration; the onus probandi is on him. There is not only no such proof, but every thing in the record conduces to prove that the assignment was without any payment by Miller. Miller had enjoined Curd from proceeding on the trust deed given by him for the 16 purchase *money, and that injunction was then pending. If he succeeded in it, the amount already received by Curd on Guerrant's bonds was more than he was entitled to receive; and therefore if Curd had attempted to enforce payment of the assigned bonds against Guerrant for the balance due on them, Miller (who was Guerrant's vendor of the land for which the assigned bonds were given) might himself have enjoined Curd from collecting that balance. On the other hand, if Miller failed in his injunction suit, Curd had full remedy to recover the balance of the purchase money by proceeding under Miller's own trust deed. If it is to be supposed that Miller paid off the balance due on the bonds of Guerrant at the time of the reassignment, then it is to be supposed that he actually paid off the whole balance of the original purchase money to Curd, at the very time when he was suing in chancery, and had obtained an injunction, to be relieved from the payment of that money to the amount of 116½ acres of the land. As to the 1080 dollars enjoined by Guerrant, it would be absolutely ridiculous to suppose that Miller, on the reassignment, paid that sum. Miller states in his answer, that "the matter of Guerrant's injunction for the 1080 dollars, and all other matters concerning Guerrant's debt, have long since all been paid off and satisfied; not one cent is due on that account to Isaac Curd nor no one else." What is the just, the only construction of this averment? It is that Guerrant had paid to Miller himself the sum of 1080 dollars; for there is no evidence that a single dollar of it was ever paid to the plaintiffs, or to Curd, or any other person for them.

Upon the other question, let it be supposed (for the sake of argument) that the payments were actually made in money by Miller at the dates when the bonds become due. The case of Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta admits, that in the ordinary case of creditor and debtor

17 dealing in their own right, the *creditor may refuse to receive a payment tendered with direction to apply it to the principal of an interest-bearing debt. He may agree so to apply it or not. The question here is, whether a stipulation so to apply a payment is legal and valid, when the nominal creditor is a trustee for others, and the debtor knows that he is dealing in that manner with the funds of the trust? The plain duty of Curd under the will was to sell the land, collect the purchase money, and put it out at interest for the benefit of the cestuis que trust. This duty was not performed in respect to the bond which fell due the 21st of August 1820. The trustee had no right to indulge his own feelings of kindness towards the purchaser of the trust subject, by delaying the collection and investment of the purchase money, or by accepting payments under a stipulation to apply them to the principal of the debt. Such benevolence could only be exercised at the risk and to the detriment of his cestuis que trust. It has been now supposed that the will, justly construed, required the trustee to collect the purchase money, and invest the whole of it, principal and interest, in some productive fund: let it be, however, that the trustee was not bound to call in the purchase money, but was authorized to leave it on security in the hands of the purchaser: he was at least bound to leave it as an interest-bearing fund, and had no imaginable right to stipulate for applying payments to extinguish the principal of the fund, leaving the interest (however large the amount accrued) a dead, unproductive stock. Miller, the purchaser, had full notice of the trust. For he not only purchased under it, but the will itself was recorded in the court of which he was clerk at the time of his purchase. The cases of Fisher v. Bassett and others, and Keane and others v. Robarts and others, which were cited by Mr. Grattan, shew the doctrines of courts of equity on this subject.

18 *But this is not the case of a payment of money. The receipt acknowledges the assignment by Miller of Guerrant's bonds; and the only sensible construction of the receipt is, that the amount of the bonds, if paid when they should become due, was to be credited against the principal of Miller's debt. The bonds were not paid when they became due; and the failure of Guerrant to pay them was the consequence of Miller's own act in enjoining Curd's proceeding on his trust deed. Shall Miller be allowed to make this application of the amount of the bonds, when not only the natural increase of the fund by accruing interest is thereby prevented, but through his means, the recovery of the stipulated payments on account of the principal itself is suspended from 1823 to 1835,—at which last period Miller's injunction was dissolved? If the transaction evidenced by the receipts had been between Curd and Miller in their individual rights alone, (instead of being a dealing with the funds of a written and recorded trust,) it would be most inequitable that Miller should be allowed, under such circumstances, and after such a lapse of time, to avail himself of the stipulation that the payments were to be applied to the principal of the debt.

Lyons on the same side. The fact that the bond was lost is itself sufficient to give jurisdiction to equity. 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 24, 5. But 2. the bill shews that the bond had been assigned by Curd to John W. Argyle for the benefit of the plaintiffs; and shews not only that he was a trustee for them, but that this trustee was a nonresident. And 3. it states that the trustee in Miller's deed of trust had refused to proceed to execute the trust. 1 Madd. Ch. Pract. 459; 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 325, 352.

In regard to Curd's duty as trustee, reference may properly be made to the authorities in respect to the duty of agents, and the limitations on their powers

19 *when acting in the discharge of the business of their principals. Hogg v. Snaith and others, 1 Taunt. 347; Smock v. Dade, 5 Rand. 639, and Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277. Can the rule regulating the application of payments between ordinary creditor and debtor (about which there is no dispute) be fairly and justly applied to payments made by a debtor to a trustee? Cases shewing that a dealing by a third person for the assets of a decedent's estate, with notice of the trust, and of misapplication (actual or intended) on the part of the executor or trustee to whom the payment is made, is a fraud on the part of the purchaser and cannot be sustained, have been already cited. The court is farther referred, in respect to the same principle of equity, to 2 Williams on Ex'ors 609-12, and Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. Rep. 157 (a case of a guardian dealing improperly with the estate of his ward). In Stevens v. Barringer and others, 13 Wend. 639, it is decided that after payment of the principal of a debt, an action will not lie for the interest. Supposing that case to be properly decided, there may be a total loss of the interest in this case in consequence of the application stipulated for by Miller in respect to his payments, should that stipulation be held binding.

Lyons also argued as to the effect of the reassignment from Curd to Miller of Guerant's bonds, and insisted that the proper inference was that nothing whatever had been paid for that reassignment.

Leigh in reply. The gentlemen on the other side have taken unnecessary trouble in citing authorities to shew that equity has jurisdiction to set up a lost bond. The objection here is, that no ground is furnished by the bill for the jurisdiction of equity on that score: there is no allegation in the bill that the bond has been lost or destroyed, or that any enquiry was made for it in the custody where it would 20 naturally be found—that *of John W. Argyle or Isaac Curd. But the refusal of the trustee in Miller's deed of trust to act is also relied on. To sustain the jurisdiction on this ground, the fact of such refusal must be proved: and there is no proof of it. The bill is taken for confessed as to the trustee Anderson, but his confession is no evidence against Miller. [Allen, J. Cannot the cestui que trust, at his option, treat the deed of trust as a mortgage, and go into equity to have it enforced?] It was so argued in Ambler & others v. Warwick & Co., 1 Leigh 201, but the judges did not take that view; they decided the case on its special circumstances.

But suppose that equity can take jurisdiction. The assignment to John W. Argyle for the benefit of the plaintiffs is averred in the bill: and that averment must be proved, and proved as it is alleged. Miller's answer may be taken as an admission that the bond was assigned to Argyle by Curd: but how does it appear that it was assigned to him for the benefit of the plaintiffs? The circumstance of the bill being taken for confessed as to John W. Argyle cannot avail against Miller. The assignment must be proved, unless admitted by the assignor and the parties against whom relief is sought. Corbin v. Emerson, 10 Leigh 663.

Miller refused to settle when applied to by Trevilian, unless the bond were produced. Looking to the ordinary motives which govern men in their transactions with one another, there can be no reasonable doubt as to the ground of that refusal. If the bond had been produced, it might have shewn, and probably would have shewn, that every credit claimed by Miller was authenticated and established by endorsements on the bond. Why was that bond not produced? Curd and John W. Argyle, though out of the state, were not beyond the reach of visit or communication from the plaintiffs. Yet no attempt was made to procure the bond, nor any enquiry made about it (so far as the 21 record *shews), either of Curd or Argyle. Why was this? It is easy to suppose one inducement on the part of the plaintiffs, and difficult to suppose any other:—Curd was insolvent, (the argument on the other side so supposes,) while Miller was perfectly solvent, and had executed a deed of trust on a tract of land amply sufficient to secure the whole amount of the bond. It would no doubt be highly agreeable to the plaintiffs to take Miller's admission of his execution of the bond, and deprive him, by their own failure to produce it, of the benefit of the evidence which might be afforded by the endorsements upon the bond (in all probability the only evidence in existence) of his satisfaction of it. [Lyons. Miller never ventured, in the court below, to make a suggestion of any such ground for requiring the production of the bond.]

There is no pretence for saying that Miller is not entitled to credit for the sum of 1080 dollars enjoined by Guerrant. The result of Miller's injunction suit shews that this sum ought not to have been enjoined. Curd has not assigned it to Miller. Guerrant's injunction suit is still open; and if Curd has not been paid this amount, he can yet get it. But Miller says it has been long since paid and satisfied.

As to the balance on the judgments which was reassigned; when we see that Curd had power, through Guerrant's trust deed, instantly to enforce the payment of this balance, and no motive to assign it but for money, and see also that he has assigned it without noticing the receipt which he had previously given, it is not to be conceived that he should have made such assignment without having received actual payment of the balance. Counsel on the other side rely upon the circumstances of the reassignment being without recourse. That circumstance is of no force to shew that the assignment was without consideration.

22 been paid. And the reassignment *in this case being to Miller the original debtor and first assignor, it was natural and proper, and conformable to the ordinary course of business, that Miller, even if he paid the whole of the original debt which remained due to Curd, should take back the subject he himself had assigned, without recourse to Curd. If such recourse had not been excluded by the terms of the reassignment, Curd would have been a guarantor, without consideration, of Guerrant's debt to Miller.

Was it a fraud on the part of Curd the trustee, participated in by Miller the purchaser of the trust subject, to stipulate that the payments should be applied to the principal of the debt? What was the subject to be so applied? It was bonds due from Guerrant to Miller, secured by Guerrant's deed of trust. Curd the trustee, by taking the assignment of these bonds, acquired a further security (the personal security of Guerrant) for the payment of Miller's debt. Can it be contended that this transaction, leading to the acquisition of additional security, was a fraud on the trust, or even an improper or unwise exercise of the trustee's discretionary power? There is not the smallest particle of proof that Curd either acquired, or designed to acquire, any personal advantage by the transaction; nothing to shew that it was not a judicious and beneficial arrangement, in fact and design, for the interest of the cestui que trust. It is notorious,—a part of the history of the country,—that the price of lands fell rapidly and greatly between 1817 and 1823: and Miller's trust deed, though ample security when given, might have become wholly inadequate at the time he assigned these bonds of Guerrant. The question is whether the acquisition of the bonds by a stipulation to apply the proceeds to the principal, was, under these circumstances, a fraud, for which Miller is to be charged with interest notwithstanding that stipulation. If it were shewn that Curd had 23 gained or purposed any actual advantage to himself, there might be *some pretence for holding Miller responsible. But nothing of the kind appears. And it is only on the assumption of such advantage gained or purposed, that the appellees' counsel can assimilate this case to those which they have cited respecting the fraudulent misapplication of funds of a cestui que trust or principal, by the trustee or agent. In Graff and others v. Castleman &c., 5 Rand. 195, and Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119, there was an actual application, known to the purchaser at the time, of the trust funds to the individual benefit and use of the trustee. In Hogg v. Snaith and others, 1 Taunt. 347, Smock v. Dale, 5 Rand. 639, and Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277, the party misapplying or commuting the debt was a mere attorney, having only a naked power to collect, and possessed of no authority or discretion to compromise, commute, or make any other arrangement on behalf of his principal, much less to make such arrangement in execution of a design to apply the proceeds to his own use.

ALLEN, J. The appellant, in argument, has objected to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant relief upon the case made in the bill. It seems to me, the relation which the plaintiffs bore to the subject entitled them to the aid of a court of equity under the circumstances of this case. By the will of the testator, his executors were empowered to sell his lands, and after providing for the support of the widow and children, the residue of the money arising from the sale of the lands was to be put out at interest, and the portion of each to be paid on attaining the age of twenty-one. The executor sold the lands, and took bonds payable to himself, and a deed of trust to secure the payment. Upon the last of these bonds a large balance is claimed to be due. The executor and trustee has removed from the commonwealth. The 24 bill avers, that many years *since, the bond was transferred to John W. Argyle, one of the legatees, to collect for himself and the others interested; that John W. Argyle has removed from the state; and that the complainants do not know where the bond is, or whether it is lost or destroyed. John W. Argyle is made a defendant, and the bill, both as to him and Curd the executor, is taken for confessed. The answer of Miller, though it denies that the bond was assigned to John W. Argyle for the benefit of the other legatees, admits that when payment was refused, John W. Argyle returned the bond to Curd the trustee, who had it in his possession in 1825, and that it was then, and, as respondent believes, still is his property. The legatees had no legal right which they could assert in a court of law. As beneficiaries, and so entitled to this fund, equity alone could give them relief. Whether the bond is lost or destroyed, or is still in possession of the trustee, it is not pretended that the proceeds, if there be any thing due, are not the property of the legatees. The trustee, the legal owner, has removed from the commonwealth; and having failed to perform his duty by collecting the money, the legatees are of necessity driven into a court of equity, to assert their equitable title.

The debt was secured by a deed of trust, and the bill avers that the trustee has refused to act; and as to him the bill is taken for confessed. It is unnecessary to determine whether every creditor by deed of trust, like a mortgagee, has a right to call his debtor into a court of equity at his pleasure. Here it is averred that the trustee refused to act, and the bill is taken for confessed; and whether this would be considered as evidence, so as to affect the other defendant, or not, is immaterial in this case, as it is perfectly clear upon the facts, that it would have been improper for the trustee to sell until some proceeding was had to ascertain the amount due. The beneficiaries were ignorant of the

fused to give them any information; and in this state of the affair, a sale by the trustee would have been irregular. If he had attempted to sell, a court of equity would have restrained him at the instance of the debtor. There can be no valid objection to the jurisdiction of the court, when invoked by the creditor in the first instance to ascertain the amount of the incumbrance, in a case where, at the instance of the debtor, the court would have arrested the trustee until the amount had been determined. I think that on both grounds the jurisdiction is clear.

Upon the merits, it is objected that the amount due cannot be determined until accounts are taken between Curd and his cestuis que trust, and between Miller and Curd. So far as Miller's interests are involved, an account between Curd and his cestuis que trust would seem to be unnecessary in this case. Curd has set up no claim to the proceeds of this bond. He is a party to the suit, and his rights will be bound by the decree. There seems to have been no question made in the case, that Curd held this bond in his fiduciary character alone. It cannot be a matter of any importance to Miller, how the accounts may stand between this fiduciary and the beneficiaries. If Miller owes the money, he is bound to pay it to some person, either to the trustee or the legatees; and as all are parties, any payment made under the decree will protect him against all claims hereafter.

As to the account between Miller and Curd, the bill was filed to adjust that, and it has accordingly been taken. The question as to the amount due arises upon the various aspects in which the account has been presented by the commissioner. The plaintiffs have not controverted the right of Curd to receive payments; they do not seek to charge Miller with money upon the ground of misapplication by their

to allow credit for all payments made to him, and have filed their bill to obtain from the defendant a disclosure of those payments. The demand was most reasonable, but has not been met with the frankness and candour to which it was entitled. The right of the plaintiffs to call for an exhibition of the accounts of payment is denied. Instead of the fair disclosure which common honesty required this debtor to make to these legatees seeking to gather up the fragments of their father's estate mismanaged by their trustee, he contents himself with the general averment of payment. His answer, instead of explaining what seemed doubtful, appears designed to involve the transactions between Curd and himself in still deeper obscurity. The plaintiffs and the court are driven to the necessity of making up the account from such facts as were within their reach and furnished by the record. If it does not contain a full exhibition of all the transactions between Curd and the defendant, it is not for the latter to complain; it was certainly in his power to give a full explanation, if he had thought proper to do so. It has been argued that the defendant has a right to insist on the production of the bond before any account is stated, because the endorsements on the bond may shew what credits ought to be allowed. The defendant has made no such allegation in his answer. He in fact admits that he is entitled to no other credits than for the deficiency in the land, the amount of the receipts, and some small claims for costs and fees. The evidence of his payments he has in his own hands. The difficulty arises from the subsequent acts of the parties in regard to some of the claims mentioned in these receipts: and on this point he has chosen to leave us in the dark.

[The judge then detailed minutely all the facts, and stated his inferences from them. A considerable space (about 7 pages) would be occupied by this portion of 27 *the opinion; and the reporter omits it, because the facts will be found in the statement which he has made, and the reasoning of the judge was upon the particular circumstances, and not illustrative of any principle of law. The conclusion to which he came will appear by the decree, in which he and the other judges concurred.]

It remains to determine how the credits are to be applied.

It is not controverted that in ordinary cases the party who pays money has the power to apply it as he chooses. The rule has usually been applied where the creditor held different securities. But in the case of Pindall's ex'x v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 481, there was but one debt; and judge Cabell, delivering the opinion in which the other judges concurred, says, that "a debtor owing a debt consisting of principal and interest, and making a partial payment, has a right to direct its application to so much of the principal in exclusion of the interest, and the creditor, if he receives it, is bound to apply it accordingly." It is argued that this rule of law is founded on the supposed agreement of the parties; that a contract, express or implied, lies at the foundation of it. It is said that the creditor is not bound to receive the payment, unless he be permitted to apply it first to the interest; that this is his right. But as he may waive his rights, he may agree to a different application; or if he receives the payment with directions so to apply it, the law implies the agreement from the act of receiving. And from this it is argued, that though persons sui juris may make such agreements, fiduciaries dealing with the trust estate have no such power; and that a person dealing with them with notice cannot be permitted to affect injuriously the rights of those interested in the estate, by such an application of payments.

28 contract implied from the act of *receiving payment with directions as to the application, or to a distinct rule of law independent of such contract, would seem to make no difference as to the result. The law sanctions the power, either as just in itself, or arising from a fair and legal contract, and therefore to be enforced. When, therefore, the debtor here stipulated for such an application, he exacted nothing which the law forbids to others in his situation. The right is that of the debtor; he may decline making the payment, unless it is applied as he directs: and I do not perceive how this right is to be affected by the character of the creditor. If the bond had been given to the testator in his lifetime, the debtor's right, as against him, would be clear. Can his death, in consequence of which the executor receives, change the obligation or impair the rights of the debtor? The right is one of some value; as for instance in a case like the present, where the bond was for nearly 10,000 dollars, on which, when it became payable, nearly 1800 dollars of interest was due. Suppose the debtor, having the principal, and wishing to stop interest, insists on so applying the payment: if the creditor refuses to receive it, the debtor can put his money to interest, and so provide a fund to meet the interest on his debt as fast as it accrues, until he obtains the means to extinguish it entirely. But if the payment is applied to the interest, a balance of principal is left, and the debt accumulates again. And how is the creditor injured? The interest on his debt is not an interest-bearing fund. If he refuses to receive the money and apply it to the principal, his interest remains as it was, a dead capital. If he does receive it, as money is worth the interest, he is receiving interest on precisely the amount he would have been receiving it upon if the money had not been paid. And how does the fact of his being a fiduciary vary this state of things? Whilst the debt remained unpaid, he was receiving interest on the principal alone:

29 *by receiving the principal and reinvesting, the estate is not injured. To hold that the power to direct the application in such cases does not exist, would in effect be to decide that every debtor to a fiduciary must pay interest on the interest of his debt. If there were any agreement to give time or indulgence, the case might be different. But here nothing of that kind is suggested. If an executor or other fiduciary, after receiving a payment with a direction to apply it to the principal, neglects or delays to collect the interest so as to make it an interest-bearing fund, the cestui que trust, in a proper case, might charge him for such a breach of duty; and an agreement with the debtor to commit such a breach, might charge him. But here the debt was due. Notwithstanding the receipt, the executor might the next day have proceeded to enforce payment of the balance, principal and interest, by a suit, or a sale under the deed of trust. If he improperly delayed, the debtor is not liable for his neglect. There may have been, and (in the absence of all proof to the contrary) it is to be presumed there were good reasons for the conduct of each in this case. By the direction of the will, the money was to be put out at interest. It was well secured by the bond of the purchaser, and the deed of trust. The executor may have thought it to be for the benefit of all to let the debt rest in that condition. There is some hazard in lending money. Experience has shewn that investments, even in government securities, are sometimes precarious. It was equally the interest of the debtor to relieve himself from this consuming moth, though few men in our country could at once command the means of discharging so large a sum. By retaining the money and using it, he would at least be realizing as much interest as was accumulating against him on the same amount of the debt; and therefore he properly insisted, that if it were 30 received, he should derive the like advantage from it, by applying *it to the principal; in the mean time leaving it to the executor, in the discharge of his duties, to enforce payment of the balance at once, or permit it to remain. The same reasoning applies to the bonds of Guerrant. While Miller retained them, the interest equalled the interest of a like amount of his principal, and when the executor received them, he was entitled to the accruing interest on them; the operation being precisely the same as if the money had been paid to the executor and at once loaned out, attended with this advantage, that whilst Miller continued bound as assignor, the executor acquired the additional security of Guerrant's bonds. In any view I can take of the transaction, it appears to me that the agreement was perfectly legal, and could only affect the estate injuriously, in this or any case, by an improper delay of the executor to enforce payment of the residue. For this, if any such delay occurred, Miller is not responsible. It has been argued, that after Miller assigned, he impeded the collection by his injunction. The bill did not injoin the executor from proceeding to collect the bonds of Guerrant; it sought to prevent a sale by the trustee for the balance due. Miller's bill and injunction interposed no obstruction to the proceedings against Guerrant.

It seems to me, therefore, that the cases which have held the debtor liable for aiding in a fraudulent misapplication of the funds of the estate to the debts of the trustee, have no bearing on this case. In insisting on the application of the payments to the principal, the debtor exercised no more than a legal right. In agreeing to it, the executor subjected the estate to no loss. The interest would have remained a dead fund, if he had refused to receive the payment. The loss, when any loss is sustained from such an application, results from the subsequent improper delay of the executor in proceeding to enforce payment of the balance. For such improper delay, the executor may under certain 31 *circumstances be held liable; but the debtor is not responsible, unless he has entered into an agreement to procure such improper indulgence, and the payment has been made in pursuance thereof. I think the court erred in disregarding the agreement of the parties here.

The decree drawn by judge Allen was concurred in by the other judges, and entered in the following terms:

This court is of opinion that the circuit court erred in deciding that the appellant Miller was entitled to credit for the whole amount of the bonds of Guerrant assigned to Isaac Curd the executor of Frederick Argyle; and that there was error in deciding, that, under the agreement of the parties, and the circumstances of this case, the debtor was not entitled to apply the payments evidenced by the receipts dated the 30th of October 1820 and the 21st of January 1822, to the principal of the debt. The decree is therefore reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with instructions to recommit the report to a commissioner, to audit, state and settle the accounts upon the following principles.

The commissioner is to charge Miller with the amount of the last bond, deducting therefrom the price of the 16½ acres of land as of the date of the bond, and also allowing all the other credits allowed in the commissioner's second report, made under the order of October 19, 1837, recommitting the former report; and also a further credit, as of the 25th of September 1825, for the excess due at that time on the judgments assigned, over the sum of 1772 dollars 97 cents,* the amount claimed by Miller as having been overpaid; the reassignment of the judgments being evidence that such excess was paid by Miller to Curd as a consideration for the reassignment. And

*This sum of 1772 dollars 97 cents is the same mentioned in the addition to Miller's statement. That addition will be seen ante, p. 7.—Note in Original Edition.

32 Miller is to be also allowed a *further credit for the sum of 1080 dollars in-joined by Guerrant, in the event of his shewing, by satisfactory proof, that this sum has been paid to Curd or the legatees of Frederick Argyle; but not otherwise.

And in stating the account, all payments received under the two receipts before mentioned, and also the amount assumed to have been paid by Miller, as the difference between the sums before referred to, at the settlement in September 1825, should be applied to the principal of the debt, according to the terms of the receipts, as of the times when the notes on which payments were received fell due: that is to say, where the entire note was paid, crediting the principal of the note paid, as of the date it fell due, against so much of the principal of the debt; and where but part of the note was paid, crediting the payments, and the payment supposed to be made in consideration of the reassignment at the settlement in 1825, against the principal, as of the dates of such payments, actual or assumed.

And the commissioner is to report the said accounts to the circuit court, together with any special matter deemed pertinent by himself, or required by either of the parties to be stated, in order to a final decree.

*M'Key &c. v. Garth.

(Absent BROOKS, J.)

Executions—Sale under*—Case at Bar.—Whilst on the one hand, where an officer holding two executions sells under the second, the title of the purchaser is good against the plaintiff in the first, and the remedy of the latter is against the officer, so on the other hand the purchaser at such sale cannot invoke the lien of the first execution, in aid of a title acquired at a sale made under the second. Therefore, where a slave was levied upon under a fl. fa. delivered to a constable before any conveyance of the slave by the debtor, and other executions issued after such conveyance, under which (and not under the first fl. fa.) the evidence tended to prove that the slave was sold, it was HELD, in an action brought by the grantee in the conveyance against the purchaser at the sale, that the title of the purchaser must be referred to the process under which the sale was made. Accord. Eckhols v. Graham & others, 1 Call 492.

By deed bearing date the 4th of June 1823 and admitted to record in the office of Albemarle county court on the same day, John Norvell conveyed to Andrew M'Key and Henry Chiles five slaves, one of whom was a girl named Mary, and another a boy named Randolph, and also other personal property, in trust for the purpose of securing the payment of certain debts therein mentioned.

*See monographic note on "Executions" appended to Paine, Surv., &c., v. Tutwiler, 27 Gratt. 440.

On the 6th of April 1824, M'Key and Chiles brought an action of detinue in the circuit court of Albemarle against William Garth, to recover Randolph. The cause was tried in May 1835, upon the general issue.

At the trial, the plaintiffs relied upon the deed of trust before mentioned, and the defendant relied upon a purchase at a constable's sale made under a writ or writs of fieri facias against John Norvell,

34 which he contended created a lien upon the property before the date *of that deed, and overreached the title conveyed by it. In support of this ground, the defendant introduced a fieri facias issued the 25th of May 1823, by a justice of the peace for Albemarle county, in favour of Ben. Johnson against John Norvell for 11 dollars 27 cents with interest from the 27th of December 1821 till paid, and 30 cents costs, (which was directed to the constable of the said county,) with endorsements thereon by James Thomas the constable, shewing that it came to his hands on the day of its date, and was levied by him the 17th of June 1823 on one negro girl Mary and one boy Randolph; and the said defendant also introduced the deposition of Thomas the constable to the following effect: that on the 17th of June 1823, while acting as constable of Albemarle, he levied the said execution (which had been in his hands from the 25th of May 1823) on the said boy Randolph; that he took the boy home, intending to keep him until the day of sale, but he ran away, and could not be found until after the August court, which was the time appointed for the sale; that after that time, to wit, about the 15th of August 1823, he found the boy at work on Norvell's plantation, and retook him for the same debt, and others which had afterwards come to his hands. The deposition continued as follows: "At the October court, he was regularly advertised and sold under that execution and others, and was purchased by William Garth at the price of 150 dollars. Before the day of sale the first execution ran out of date, and the magistrate renewed it, under which renewed one, in the name of Johnson, the sale was made; and the balance of the money after paying that execution was applied to the payment of the remaining executions, and there was not enough."

After the cause had been argued and the jury sent out to consult of their verdict, they returned into court, and asked the court to instruct them upon this point:

35 whether, if the fi. fa. of the 25th of May 1823 had *been levied in due time by the constable upon the slave, and he had escaped and been retaken, the constable could, after the return day of the fi. fa., legally sell the said slave without a new execution? The court instructed the jury that no new execution was necessary in such case; that in truth, in such case, no new original execution could issue; that a venditioni exponas might have issued, but was not necessary; and that if the constable had applied for and obtained of the magistrate new executions, under the mistaken opinion that they were necessary, and had supposed himself selling under such new executions, the plaintiff in the first fi. fa. did not thereby lose the lien of the first levy, but the jury should regard the sale as having been made under and by virtue of that fi. fa. and the levy thereof, so as to give to the creditor therein the full benefit of the lien thereby created. To this opinion the plaintiffs excepted.

A verdict being found and judgment rendered for the defendant, on the petition of the plaintiffs a supersedeas was awarded.

Grattan for plaintiffs. Although, when a fieri facias has been levied, a second fieri facias in the same case is so far illegal that it may be quashed on the motion of the defendant, yet if the same be not quashed, but the officer proceed to levy and sell under it, the levy and sale are valid and cannot be questioned by third persons; and in such case the lien of the first execution is lost, and neither the execution creditor nor any third person can avail himself of it. Eckhols v. Graham and others, 1 Call 492. Here the fact appears by the deposition of the officer, that he levied and sold under the second fieri facias in favour of Johnson, and under other executions, all of which, including Johnson's second fi. fa., came to the hands of the officer after the deed (under which the plaintiffs claim)

36 had been made and recorded. *The officer does not pretend that he sold under Johnson's first fi. fa. And it being well settled that an officer, having two executions in his hands, may sell under both or either at his pleasure, the purchaser must hold his title as he receives it from the officer, whatever may be the rights of the plaintiff in the first execution to the proceeds of sale.

Peyton for defendant. Although, in the abstract prefixed by the reporter to the case of Eckhols v. Graham & others, it is stated that "if plaintiff sues a second execution before the property taken under the first is disposed of, he waives the first, and destroys the lien on the property taken under the first," yet in truth no such question arose or was discussed in that case. There the lien created by the levy of the first execution was gone; but it was because of the execution of the forthcoming bond, and the restoration of the property to Bandy: and Graham and Trigg succeeded in virtue of their purchase evidenced by their bill of sale, and not in virtue of Trigg's purchase at the sheriff's sale. It cannot be fairly argued from this adjudication, that the seizure and sale under a void and illegal process will be valid. Here the second execution was sued out by the constable without authority from the plaintiff, and the question in the court below was, whether the right of a plaintiff could be affected, without his knowledge or consent, by the illegal and unauthorized act of the constable. It cannot be, that from such an act as this, a waiver by the plaintiff of his right is to be presumed. To affect a party on the ground of waiver, he must not only do the act relied upon as such, but must also be fully cognizant, at the time, of his rights in the matter.

Grattan in reply. The case of Eckhols v. Graham and others shews that the court placed its decision upon the ground that another execution had issued; and it is ³⁷ a very strong authority. For the second execution issued after a forthcoming bond had been taken, and the defendant might certainly have had this second execution quashed as improperly issued. Yet the court held that the issuing the second execution was a discharge of the lien created by the first.

The constable could only take out the second execution as the agent of the creditor; the justice could only give it to him as agent: and the creditor has sanctioned the act of the constable subsequently, if not before, by receiving the money made by a sale under it. The fact is, that in these cases of warrants before justices, the practice is for the constable to act as the agent of the plaintiff; and this practice is recognized by the legislature. Sess. Acts 1825-6, ch. 19, p. 21; Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 201.

But suppose the lien of the first execution had continued after the second issued; is the purchaser entitled to the benefit of that lien? The cases clearly establish that there may be a valid sale by a sheriff under a second execution, though he has in his hands at the time an execution entitled to be preferred; and that in such case the purchaser under the second execution will hold the property against the plaintiff in the first, and the only remedy of the latter will be against the sheriff. Smallcomb v. Cross &c., 1 Ld. Raym. 251; Hutchinson v. Johnston, 1 T. R. 729. If then Johnson's second fi. fa. was, as the judge instructed the jury, void, and the sale under it void also, yet as there were other executions under which the sale was made, and the evidence of the officer shews that he did not sell under Johnson's first fi. fa., the sale under those other executions was valid, and the purchaser must be considered as holding under them. Whether, therefore, Johnson's second fi. fa. was valid or void, the purchaser cannot be considered as purchasing under his first fi. fa.

This court is of opinion that as evidence had been introduced tending to prove that a second execution had been taken out by the constable, under which, and other executions in his hands, the sale was made; however the question might have been as to the lien of the first execution, in a controversy between the plaintiff in said execution (alleging that the second execution was taken out without his consent) and the constable, yet in this action between the purchaser at the sale and a claimant of the property, the title of the purchaser must be referred to the process under which the sale was made. That whilst on the one hand, where the officer holding two executions sells under the second, the title of the purchaser is good against the plaintiff in the first, and the remedy of the latter is against the officer, so on the other hand the purchaser at such sale cannot invoke the lien of the first execution, in aid of a title acquired at a sale made under the second. The court therefore erred in instructing the jury that they must regard the sale as having been made under and by virtue of the original fi. fa., though they might have been satisfied, from the evidence, that the sale was in fact made under and by virtue of the second fi. fa. and other executions in the hands of the officer.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to set aside the verdict and award a new trial of the issue, on which so much of the said instruction as is herein pronounced to be erroneous is not to be repeated.

May, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Guardian and Ward—Accounting—Setting Up New Claim in Appellate Court.*—The administrator of an intestate is also guardian of one of the distributees. Upon the termination of the guardianship, a bill is filed against the guardian and his sureties, to recover what is due upon the guardianship account. An amended bill is afterwards filed against the administrator and his sureties, to recover what is due on the administration account. Reports are made of both accounts. But, for reasons appearing to the court, the guardianship account is recommitted; and then, by consent of parties, the administration account is also recommitted. A further report is made upon the guardianship account, and none upon the administration account. Whereupon the cause is heard as to the guardian and his sureties, upon the further report so made, and a decree is entered against them for the sum deemed by the court to be due upon the guardianship account. From this decree an appeal is taken by a party interested to get rid of or reduce the amount. In the appellate court it is urged by the appellee, that the balance stated as due on the guardian's account should be augmented, by incorporating in it the appellee's share of the balance due on the administration account. HELD, this claim cannot be sustained: 1st, because the case was heard and the decree rendered between the parties to, and on the claim made by, the original bill for the settlement of the guardianship account, as contradistinguished from the administration account, the settlement of which was sought by the amended bill: 2dly, because the case was not prepared for hearing as to the administration account; it standing, as to that account, on a consent order committing the same, and the record of course furnishing no account on which a definite charge or decree in respect to the administration account could be made: 3dly, because no claim was made in the court below by the appellee, to bring into the guardianship account any charge against the guardian arising out of the administration account.

Appellate Practice—Affirmance of Decree—Costs.†—

Slaves conveyed by deed of trust to secure what may be due from the grantor as guardian, are afterwards attached by a creditor of the grantor, and under the attachment are sold, subject to the prior lien of the deed of trust. In a suit by the ward, a decree is made for the sum due upon the guardianship account, and the decree directs the trustees to retain the slaves until the amount *of the decree is satisfied, and then to surrender them to the purchaser at the sale under the attachment. On an appeal by the purchaser, the objection is taken that the decree ought to have provided for the sale of the slaves, so that out of the proceeds the amount of the decree might be paid, and the surplus paid to the appellant. Held, the appellant has no right to have the decree reversed for this cause, but the same should be affirmed, with the addition thereto of a decree for the sale of the slaves; and the appellant should be decreed to pay the costs.

Same—Same—Excessive Charge for Board and Clothing.—Case in which it was considered in the appellate court, that a guardian, who had been culpably in default in failing to render any account of his receipts or disbursements, was allowed by the court below more for the board and clothing of his ward, than he was entitled to; but as a particular sum payable by the ward had not been charged in the court below, it was deemed best to consider that as an equivalent for the excess of the charge for board and clothing, and (saving the parties the delay and expense of restating the guardian's account) to terminate the case by affirming the decree.

Joseph Mosby died about the year 1808, leaving a widow, Lucy Mosby, and three children, Robert W., Nancy, and Judith. The widow and her son Robert administered on the estate.

On the 18th of November 1812, Nancy having in the mean time married Jesse Owen, and Judith being still an infant, a bill was exhibited to the county court of Powhatan by the widow for a division of the estate, and commissioners were thereupon appointed to allot to her a third part, and divide the other two thirds amongst the children. Such allotment and division were made soon afterwards. The report of the commissioners of the division of the slaves did not bear date until the 20th of May 1814, and their report of the division of the land did not bear date until the 16th of August 1815, and neither report was confirmed until the day last mentioned. But the slaves were in fact divided early in 1813, and Robert W. Mosby, who was guardian of his sister Judith, held or hired her share of the slaves during the years 1813, 1814 and 1815. The land was *also divided in February 1813, and the guardian had, or ought to have had, possession of it during those years.

In April 1815, Judith Mosby married John C. Howard; and in December of that year, a suit in chancery was commenced by them in the county court of Powhatan, against Robert W. Mosby as late guardian of said Judith, and Jesse Owen and Henry Anderson his sureties, to recover what was due upon the guardianship account.

An amended bill was afterwards filed, asserting the rights of the complainant Judith as a distributee of the estate of her father. Lucy Mosby having married Peter Lesuer, Lesuer and wife and Robert W. Mosby and the sureties in the administration bonds were made defendants, an account of the administration was asked, and a decree sought for what might appear to be due.

Pending the suit, John C. Howard died, and the cause proceeded in the name of the female complainant. Robert W. Mosby and Lucy Lesuer also died, and the case was revived against their respective administrators. On the motion of Robert Anderson executor of Mary Williamson, he was also made a defendant. His interest will appear hereafter.

Under an order made the 15th of March 1821, accounts were returned both of the administration and of the guardianship, to which exceptions were filed on both sides. For reasons appearing to the court, the guardianship account was, by an order entered the 21st of January 1829, recommitted with the exceptions thereto, to the commissioner who made it, for reexamination and correction. "And by consent of parties," it was at the same time ordered that the report of Mosby's accounts as administrator be recommitted to the said commissioner, for a further examination and settlement thereof.

In December 1829, the commissioner made a report upon the guardianship account. He was not furnished with vouchers to enable him to make out a regular *account of disbursements by the guardian; and the charges against the guardian for the yearly value of his ward's land and slaves were founded upon the depositions of witnesses. The report contained four alternative statements. To this report, exceptions were filed by Anderson as executor of Mary Williamson.

The nature of the interest of Mary Williamson's executor appeared in another suit, brought in December 1828 by Jesse Owen and Nancy his wife, who (as has been stated) was also a daughter and distributee of Joseph Mosby. The bill of Owen and wife, after mentioning that upon the death of Joseph Mosby certain slaves were allotted to his widow for life, set forth, that she had lately died, leaving the said slaves and their increase; that Robert W. Mosby conveyed his interest in the said slaves to trustees, for the purpose of indemnifying Henry Anderson and the complainant Jesse Owen, as the sureties in the bond given by said Robert as guardian of Judith Howard, which trust deed was duly recorded; that subsequently to said conveyance, the said Robert removed to the state of North Carolina, and Mary Williamson sued out an attachment in chancery against him, and so proceeded in said suit, as to have the undivided interest of said Robert in the said slaves decreed to be sold for the payment of her debt, subject however to the prior lien created by the said trust deed; that a sale was made under the said decree, and the interest of said Robert purchased by the said Mary Williamson, of whom the said Robert Anderson is now executor. Judith Howard, Anderson as executor of Williamson, and the trustees in the said deed, were made defendants to this bill, and the prayer of it was that commissioners might be appointed to lay off and allot the said slaves among the parties entitled thereto.

This suit of Owen and wife was heard by consent upon the bill and the answers thereto, and by like consent the court made a decree appointing commissioners

43 *to divide the slaves into three equal parts, and to allot one part to the plaintiffs Owen and wife, one other part to the said Judith Howard, and the remaining third part to the trustees in the deed aforesaid, until the objects of the said trust deed were satisfied. The commissioners divided the slaves into three lots, numbered 1, 2, and 3, and assigned number 1 to the trustees, number 2 to Judith Howard, and number 3 to the plaintiffs Owen and wife; and they provided that, for equality of partition, the owner of lot number 2 should pay 13 dollars 33 cents to the owner of number 3, and 23 dollars 33 cents to the owner of number 1. By an order made in January 1829, the trustees were authorized to hire out the slaves allotted to them, either by the month or for a longer time not exceeding one year, as he might think best. But afterwards by another order made the 21st of July 1830, on the motion of the defendant Anderson, the trustees were directed to deliver the said slaves to the said defendant, to be held by him subject to the deed of trust aforesaid, and were further directed to pay over to him the bonds taken by them for the hires of the said slaves, or the amount thereof, after deducting all expenses incurred in relation thereto.

On the 22d of July 1830, the two causes came on together. The decree set forth that the first was heard only as to the administrator of Robert W. Mosby, and Jesse Owen and Henry Anderson the sureties in Mosby's bond as guardian, and that it was heard upon the report of the commissioner "made under the order of the 21st of January 1829, directing an account of the said Robert W. Mosby's guardianship of Judith Howard the plaintiff," and upon the exceptions filed by the defendant Anderson to that report. The court did not adopt altogether any one of the four statements of the guardianship account made by the commissioner, but caused the said account to be reformed, so as to charge

44 *the guardian with the rent of the land and the hire of the slaves of the plaintiff in the first suit, at the price of 35 dollars for the land and 150 dollars for the slaves, for each of the years 1813, 1814 and 1815, making in the whole 555 dollars; and so as to credit the guardian with 70 dollars for the clothing of the plaintiff for 1813, 140 dollars for her board and clothing for 1814, and 75 dollars for her board and clothing for 3 months in 1815, in which year she was married, making together 285 dollars; thereby leaving 270 dollars as the sum due to the said Judith Howard from the said Robert W. Mosby as her guardian, on the 31st of December 1815. And thereupon the court decreed that the administrator of Mosby, out of the estate of his intestate in his hands, and the defendants Jesse Owen and Henry Anderson, pay to the plaintiff in the first suit the said sum of 270 dollars with interest from the 31st of December 1815, and the costs by the said plaintiff and her deceased husband expended. And the order of the preceding day was so far amended, as to restrain the trustees in the deed of trust from delivering over to the defendant Anderson the slaves allotted to them, until the decree this day rendered in the first suit should be fully satisfied, and the lien created by the trust deed upon the said slaves thereby discharged; after which the said property, or any balance which might remain, was directed to be forthwith surrendered by the trustees aforesaid to the said Mary Williamson's executor.

On the petition of the defendant Anderson as executor aforesaid, the superior court of chancery for the Richmond district allowed an appeal from this decree.

Under the act of April 16, 1831, the appeal was transferred to the circuit court of Henrico.

In that court on the 29th of November 1831, by consent of the appellant and of the appellee Judith Howard, an order was made directing the surviving trustees

45 in *the deed of trust, or one of them, to sell the slaves allotted to the said trustees. Sale was made accordingly, and the net proceeds thereof were 1120 dollars 38 cents. Of this sum, 300 dollars was directed to be put out at interest, subject to the future order of the court; and the residue, being 820 dollars 38 cents, Anderson was allowed to receive, upon his giving security to repay the same within sixty days after an order requiring such repayment.

After the act of 25th February 1837, (Sess. Acts of 1836-7, ch. 61, p. 38,) forming a separate circuit of the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, the causes came on to be heard the 25th of July 1837, before the court for this circuit. On consideration whereof, the court, being of opinion that the decree pronounced in the court below on the 22d of July 1830 was right so far as the same ascertained the amount due from Mosby as guardian of Judith Howard, and was only erroneous in not directing a sale of the slaves conveyed by the said Mosby to trustees to indemnify his sureties, for that error reversed the decree, and retaining the causes for further proceedings, declared that out of the proceeds of sale of the said slaves, the said Judith Howard was entitled to receive the sum of 270 dollars with interest from the 31st of December 1815 until paid, and that the appellant Anderson, as executor of Mary Williamson, was entitled to receive the residue. A report was afterwards made by the acting trustee, of the state of the fund; and then a further decree was made the 30th of March 1838, in conformity with the principles above declared, whereby there was adjudged to the said Judith Howard not only the said 270 dollars with interest as aforesaid, but also her costs in the county court of Rowhatan and in the appellate court.

On the petition of Anderson as executor of Mary Williamson, an appeal was afterwards allowed to the court of appeals.

46 *The cause was argued by Harrison for the appellant, and Patton for the appellee. The points made in the argument are sufficiently indicated in the following opinion.

STANARD, J. The claim that was earnestly and ably urged on the part of the appellee, to have the balance of the guardian's account augmented, by incorporating in it the appellee's share of the balance of the administration account, consisting of the surplus profits of the real and personal estate of the father of the appellee while held by his administrators, cannot in this case be sustained in this court.

1st, Because this case was heard and the decree rendered between the parties to, and on the claim made by, the original bill for the settlement of the guardianship account, as contradistinguished from the administration account, the settlement of which was sought by the amended bill.

2dly, Because the case was neither heard nor prepared for hearing as to the administration account; the case, at the time of hearing, standing in that respect on a consent order recommitting the administration account, and the record of course furnishing no account on which a definite charge or decree against Robert Mosby in respect to the administration account could be made.

3dly, Because no claim was made in the court below by the appellee, to bring into the guardianship account, to her credit, any charge to her guardian arising out of the administration account.

The objection of the appellant, that the costs on his appeal from the county to the superior court of chancery were improperly decreed against him, rests on this, that the decree of the county court was reversed, and ought to have been reversed, by the superior court. The propriety of that reversal is vindicated on two grounds.

47 *First, That the decree did not provide for the sale of the slaves, so that the proceeds of the sale might be appropriated to the indemnity of the sureties of the guardian, and the surplus paid over to the appellant.

Though this seems to have been the ground of the formal reversal of the decree of the county court, it was not an adequate cause of reversal; and if it were, that reversal is one not for the benefit of the appellant, but for the benefit of the sureties of the guardian. The decree of the county court had, in respect to the disposition of the slaves, done every thing that the appellant could desire. Under it the appellant would have got complete title to and possession of the slaves, on his paying the amount decreed to be paid by the sureties; and he could not justly complain that the possession of the slaves was withheld from him until the sureties were indemnified. The omission of the county court to decree the sale of the slaves to provide the indemnity, withheld from the sureties a part of their remedy, and could not be justly complained of by the appellant. The addition of that by the superior court to the decree of the county court was for the benefit of the sureties; and in that respect the action of the superior court was not a matter of relief to the appellant, but to the sureties. In strictness, so far as this matter was involved in the appeal, the proper decree of the superior court would have affirmed that of the county court, and have added thereto the further decree of sale.

The other objection to the decree of the county court, and also to that of the superior court, is, that the amount decreed to the appellee is too large.

That fact on which this objection in part rests is not as has been supposed by the appellant. He has supposed that the division of the estate was not finally made until the year 1814 or 1815, and that the guardian did not hold the ward's share of the land and negroes during the years 1813, 1814 and 1815, the years for which rents and hires are charged.

48 *Though the confirmation of the reports of the division of the slaves and land does not appear to have been made before the year 1815, I think it appears with sufficient certainty that the slaves were in fact divided early in the year 1813, and that the guardian held or hired his ward's share during the years 1813, 1814 and 1815; and that the land was divided in February 1813, and the guardian had, or ought to have had, possession of it during those years.

As to the amount of hires and rents, my opinion is that the guardian has not been overcharged, especially as he has failed to render any account: and in respect to the credits to him for the board and clothing of the ward, I incline to the opinion that more has been allowed, than, 'under the circumstances of his culpable default, and failing to render any account of any disbursement, he was entitled to. But as the sum of 23 dollars 33 cents, payable by the appellee to equalize the share of the appellant in the division of the dower slaves, has not been charged to the appellee, I deem it best to consider that as an equivalent for the excess of the charge to the appellee for board and clothing, and (saving the parties the delay and expense of restating the guardian's account) to terminate this case by affirming the decree.

The other judges concurring, the decree was accordingly affirmed.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Action on Sheriff's Bond—Return—Amendment*—

Evidence—Case at Bar—In debt on a sheriff's bond, two breaches are assigned: 1. that the sheriff had levied an execution of the relator against an administrator, on slaves of the decedent, but negligently suffered them to be eligned and carried off; 2. that the sheriff might have levied the execution on such slaves, but neglected so to do. At the trial, the plaintiff, to shew the issuing of the execution, and the reception and disposition thereof by the sheriff, was under the necessity of giving in evidence not only the execution with the return originally made thereon, but also an amendment of that return, made by leave of court. This amendment had been made not by obliterating the first return and substituting another in its place, but in a more proper manner by making an addition to the first return; and the return thus constituted of that originally made, and of what was afterwards added, was upon its face contradictory in itself. HELD, that the defendant had a right to rely upon said return as prima facie evidence in his favour; that the plaintiff, on the other hand, was at liberty to disprove any part of it, as well by intrinsic evidence furnished by the return itself, as by evidence aliunde; that it was competent for the defendant in like manner to sustain any part of the return; and that it was the province of the jury to decide, upon the whole evidence furnished by the return or otherwise, whether or not the execution was levied by the sheriff upon the property of the intestate in the hands of the administrator, and the same thereafter eligned and lost by the negligence of the sheriff; or whether or not the sheriff might have levied upon such property in the hands of the administrator, but neglected so to do.

On a judgment obtained in the circuit court of King and Queen county, by Fayette Lathrop against William Gibson as administrator of John A. Longest, a writ of fieri facias issued the 6th of November 1834, returnable to the first monday in January following, upon which the sheriff of that county made the following return:

“On the 10th day of December 1834, I found in possession of William E. Gibson administrator of John A. *Longest deceased two female slaves, (a woman named Sarah and one child) which slaves were the property of the said John A. Longest at the time of his death. And on the same day I levied this execution upon the said slaves, they being the only property I could find of John A. Longest deceased. At the time of making the levy, the said Gibson stated that he had sold those slaves to John M. Abraham of King William county, and produced the account of sales of said Longest's property, shewing that the said slaves had been sold to said Abraham and were no longer the estate of John A Longest: that he had only hired them for the year. Under these circumstances, being doubtful of the propriety of removing them, I left them with Gibson upon his promise to keep them until I could get advice. I went the same day to the house of James Smith the attorney for the plaintiff, and informed him of the circumstances, and enquired of him whether I ought to take away the slaves or not: and said Smith advised me to take possession of the slaves. I then employed R. B. Bagby, who was present when I made the levy, to go to Gibson's, take the slaves, and secure them to be sold to satisfy this execution. When Bagby arrived at the house of Gibson, the slaves had been carried off. Bagby wrote to me immediately, informing me he had failed to get the slaves. I directly made diligent search and enquiry, and soon ascertained that the slaves were in possession of said John M. Abraham; and I have been unable to get them. I went to see Abraham, and he said the slaves were his property; that he bought them several months before. John Lumpkin D. S. for Hugh Campbell.”

Afterwards, by virtue of an order of the said court entered on the 4th of May 1837, the following amended return was made:

“By leave of the court for that purpose first obtained, I hereby return, that the annexed execution came to my hands on the 11th day of November 1834, and while it was in my hands I heard it rumoured that two negroes, one woman named Sarah and a girl named —, which were the property of John A. Longest deceased in his lifetime, were still in the possession of William Gibson his administrator, and unsold by him. After hearing this, I, on the 10th day of December 1834, met the girl in the road near the house of the said Gibson. I carried her back to the said Gibson's house, intending to investigate the matter, and if satisfied that the said negroes were still the property of John A. Longest's estate, to levy upon the same to satisfy this execution. Upon reaching the house of the said Gibson, he assured me that he, as administrator of the said Longest, had actually sold the said negroes and received the money for them; and exhibited to me the account of sales of the perishable property of the said Longest, made by him as administrator, upon which account of sales I found these negroes entered as having been sold to John M. Abraham. The account of sales, I thought, was kept in the handwriting of Mr. Thomas Jordan. After this investigation, I did not feel satisfied to levy the execution upon the said negroes, but left them, without having levied upon them, in the possession of said Gibson, saying to him, that I would see Mr. Smith, the plaintiff's attorney, and if he thought that I ought to levy upon them, I would return and do so; and requesting him in the mean time to keep them until I returned, which he consented to do. Upon seeing Mr. Smith, he advised me to take the negroes into possession. After that, I could never find them; nor could I find any property within my bailiwick upon which to levy this execution. John Lumpkin D. S. for Hugh Campbell."

*Amendments.—On this subject, see generally, monographic note on “Amendments” appended to Sneed v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 200.

On the 15th of December 1837, an action of debt was brought in the same court, in the name of the governor of the commonwealth, for the benefit of Fayette Lathrop, *against Francis Rowe, John Lumpkin, and others, on a bond executed the 10th of March 1834 by Rowe, and the other obligors as his sureties, with a condition for the faithful execution and performance by Rowe of the office of sheriff of King and Queen county, during his continuance therein.

The declaration, as amended, assigned two breaches. The first alleged, that at the time and after the execution of Lathrop was delivered to the sheriff, goods which were of the said John A. Longest at the time of his death, of great value, to wit, two female slaves (a woman called Sarah and one child) had come to the hands of the said William Gibson as administrator, and that John Lumpkin, as deputy for the said Francis Rowe, levied the said execution on the said slaves, but negligently and unlawfully suffered them to be eloigned and carried off. The second breach alleged, that when the execution was in the hands of the sheriff, there were in the hands of Gibson as administrator two female slaves, which were of the goods of Longest at the time of his death, upon which the said execution might have been levied, and that Lumpkin, though it was completely in his power to have levied said execution on said slaves, omitted and neglected so to do.

Rowe died before the writ was served. The other defendants, upon whom process was served, pleaded, 1. conditions performed; upon which issue was joined: and 2. that before and at the time when the execution came to the hands of Lumpkin as deputy for Rowe, Gibson the administrator of Longest had administered and converted all the goods which were of Longest at the time of his death, and which had at any time come to his hands to be administered.

At the trial, which took place the 5th of May 1842, the plaintiff gave in evidence the execution with the returns made thereon as before mentioned. And thereupon the counsel for the plaintiff moved the court to instruct *the jury, that they should disregard the amended return of the sheriff, where the same was contradictory to the first; and that upon the amended return, though true, the plaintiff was also entitled to recover. The court refused to give these instructions, and on the contrary instructed the jury that the amended return of the sheriff, when contradictory to the first return, was to be respected, and to be regarded as prima facie true; and that upon the amended return, if true, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. To which opinions the plaintiff excepted.

Verdict and judgment being rendered for the defendants, on the petition of Lathrop a supersedeas was awarded. The petitioner assigned the following errors:

"1. Your petitioner is advised that the instruction of the circuit court to the jury at the trial was erroneous, because, on the amended return, the law was for your petitioner. The return states that the property was Longest's in his lifetime; that it remained in the hands of his administrator (the defendant) until the officer having your petitioner's execution in his hands went to the defendant's house, took one of the slaves in the road and carried her back, and left her and the other slave in the defendant's possession, upon his promise to keep them there until the sheriff's return,—went away, and suffered them to be eloigned. The execution bound the slaves from its delivery to the sheriff, if they were the property of the intestate. It was levied on them. Actual seizure was not necessary, if they were in the power and view of the officer. Bullitt's ex'ors v. Winstons, 1 Munf. 269; Haggerty v. Wilber, 16 Johns. R. 287. But here was an actual seizure. At least there might have been a levy, and it was misconduct in the sheriff if he did not make it. The slaves, as to your petitioner, were the property of the defendant's intestate. The statement of the defendant that he had sold them, if true, imports nothing. His possession of them after an *absolute sale, unexplained, made the sale fraudulent and void as to creditors. Mason v. Bond & Co., 9 Leigh 181.

"2. The direction by the court that the jury should regard the second return as true, where it conflicted with the first, was erroneous. The first return, made when no suit had been brought, or possibly was ever anticipated, and in the regular course of the sheriff's duty, admits a clear liability on the part of the sheriff. The second was made after this suit was instituted,* and is evidently cautiously worded, so as to defeat the liability flowing from the first. Now the amended return was liable to con-

*This is a mistake. The suit was brought the 15th December 1837, and the return was amended the 4th of May preceding. (Reporter.)

diction by evidence aliunde on the part of the plaintiff, and if both returns had been put to the jury for what they were worth, on the whole evidence they might justly have inferred that the statements of the first return were, under the circumstances, more entitled to credit than those of the second, and were sufficient to contradict the second. They had a right so to decide. But the court, in determining that the statements of the first return were insufficient for that purpose, and were worth less evidence than those of the second, not only formed an erroneous conclusion on the matter of fact, but clearly invaded the province of the jury.

"3. No issue was joined on one of the pleas."

The cause was submitted without argument, by Daniel for the plaintiff in error, and Griswold for the defendant in error.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, that the amendment of the sheriff's return having been made not by obliterating the first and substituting another in its place, but in a more proper manner by making an addition to the first return, which original and amended returns are to be regarded as constituting but one return—the return so constituted is upon its face contradictory in itself: that the same was necessarily given in evidence on the part of the plaintiff, to shew the issuing of the fieri facias for the relator, and the reception and disposition thereof by the sheriff: that the defendant had a right to rely upon said return as prima facie evidence in his favour: that the plaintiff, on the other hand, was at liberty to disprove any part of it, as well by intrinsic evidence furnished by the return itself, as by evidence aliunde: that it was competent for the defendant, in like manner, to sustain any part of the return: and that it was the province of the jury to decide, upon the whole evidence furnished by the return or otherwise, whether or not the execution was levied by the sheriff upon the property of the intestate in the hands of the administrator, and the same thereafter eloiigned and lost by the negligence of the sheriff; or whether or not the sheriff might have levied upon such property in the hands of the administrator, but neglected so to do. The court is therefore of opinion that the circuit court properly rejected the instructions asked for by the plaintiff, but ought not to have given the instructions substituted therefor. The judgment is therefore reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict, to give the parties, on the application of either, leave to amend their pleadings and make up more correctly the issues contemplated by them, and to award a new trial, upon which the instructions given upon the former trial are not to be repeated.

Pleading—Matters of Abatement—What to Show.*—

Matter of abatement either shews the action to be abatable, or that it is de facto abated. The former usually exists at the time of the suit; the latter for the most part occurs during its progress. The first must be pleaded in technical form, and at a proper stage of the cause. The last may be, but need not be, pleaded; and when apparent, or made known to the court, will be declared by its order in any stage of the suit. Examples illustrating this distinction, stated in the opinion of BALDWIN, J.

Same—Corporations—Expiration of Term of Existence†

—Execution—Estoppel—Case at Bar.—If a corporation become extinct by the expiration of the term of its corporate existence, pending a suit at law for a corporate demand, and that fact be brought regularly before the court in which the suit is pending, the action must terminate. It is equally clear that if, after judgment in favour of a corporation, the corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of existence granted by the charter, no execution on such judgment can regularly be sued out in the name of the corporation, and if one be sued out, it is liable to be quashed, on shewing the fact of the extinction of the corporation before the emanation of the execution. On the other hand, if an original judgment be rendered in favour of a corporation, as it could not be regularly rendered unless the existence of the corporation continued, the necessary intendment from the rendition of it is, that the continued existence of the corporation was either proved or admitted; and if execution be sued out on the judgment, the defendant, being by this intendment estopped to deny the existence at the time of the judgment, would not, on a motion to quash the execution, be admitted to controvert this intendment, and proof on such motion of the extinction of the corporation before judgment, would be inadmissible or unavailing. Per STANARD, J.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—In an action by a corporation, a special verdict was rendered, which found, that by the act creating the corporation, it was to continue until the 1st of January 1830, and that by a subsequent act the charter was extended until the 1st of January 1835. Other facts were found in relation to

Pleading—Pleas in Abatement.—In Quarrier v. Peabody Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 521, it is said, as pleas in abatement, including pleas to the jurisdiction, tend to delay, great accuracy and precision are required in framing them. They must be certain to every intent and without any repugnancy. And all the old strictness and precision of the common law, both as to form and substance is still required in such pleas. See Hortons v. Townes, 6 Leigh 47; May v. State Bank of North Carolina, 2 Rob. 56.

†Corporations—Expiration of Term of Existence.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Rider v. Wilson & Albemarle Factory, 7 Leigh 154. See also, monographic note on "Corporations (Private)" appended to Slaughter v. Com., 18 Gratt. 767.

57 the merits of the *claim, upon which the circuit court, on the 24th of October 1831, gave judgment for the defendants. An assignment of the claim was made by the corporation on the 6th of December 1831. Whereupon, to wit in June 1832, a supersedeas was obtained to the judgment, upon a petition in the name of the corporation. In April 1837, the court of appeals reversed the judgment, and entered judgment for the plaintiffs; and in May 1837, judgment was entered in the circuit court in pursuance thereof. Execution being then issued, one of the defendants gave a forthcoming bond with surety, which was forfeited. Upon this bond a motion was made for award of execution in the name of the corporation, and the defendants produced the acts before mentioned, to shew that the charter expired on the first of January 1835; and this prima facie evidence of the extinction of the corporation was not met by any countervailing proof on the other side; but it was insisted that the judgment of the appellate court imported that the corporation was in existence at that time, and estopped the defendants from shewing the contrary. HELD, that according to The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton and others, 1 Rob. 499, had the attempt been made when this case was in the appellate court, to arrest further proceedings therein on the ground that the charter had expired, it would have been fruitless; and as the judgment of the appellate court could not have been prevented by shewing that the charter had expired, so there cannot be a legal intendment of the existence of the corporation, from the fact of the judgment being rendered. The forthcoming bond and the execution under which it was taken were therefore quashed, and the assignee left to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of the judgment: dissentiente BALDWIN, J.

After the decision of the court of appeals in the case of The State Bank of North Carolina v. Cowan &c., 8 Leigh 238, judgment was entered in the circuit court of Mecklenburg county, on the 12th of May 1837, in pursuance thereof, and execution issued upon that judgment, in strict conformity therewith, against the goods of William B. Cowan, Richard May, James Smith and Francis Jones. Under the execution, property belonging to May was taken to satisfy the same, and he gave a bond for the forthcoming thereof at the day of sale, with John A. Smith as his surety; which bond was forfeited.

58 *Upon this bond a motion was made in the circuit court of Mecklenburg at October term 1837, by the president and directors of the state bank of North Carolina, against the obligors therein.

The defendants proved that James Smith and Francis Jones, two of the defendants named in the execution, were dead at the time the judgment was rendered by the court of appeals; and offered in evidence authenticated copies of the following acts of the legislature of North Carolina, to wit, an act passed in 1810, creating a corporation by the name and style of the president and directors of the state bank of North Carolina, to continue until the first day of January 1830, and an act passed in 1811, extending the charter of incorporation until the first day of January 1835: and the said defendants insisted that the charter of the bank expired on the first day of January, 1835, and for this reason, and because two of the defendants named in the execution were dead at the rendition of the judgment in the court of appeals, asked the court to overrule the motion, and to quash the execution and bond. But the court gave judgment awarding execution upon the bond; and the defendants excepted.

The defendants presented a petition for a writ of supersedeas to the said judgment, and with their petition exhibited a transcript of the record, which contained a copy of an execution issued on the said judgment, with the following endorsement thereon: "This fi. fa. issues for the benefit of E. B. Hicks, by virtue of an assignment from the plaintiffs filed with the papers in the original suit." On reference to the transcript of the record of the original judgment, which was before the court of appeals at the time of the decision reported in 8 Leigh 238, the assignment is found copied at the end thereof, and bears date the 6th of December 1831. That record also shews that the original judgment by the circuit court of Mecklenburg in favour of the defendants, *was rendered the 24th of October 1831, and the supersedeas thereto was allowed in June 1832. The acts of the legislature of North Carolina, shewing the time for which the charter was granted in 1810, and for which it was extended in 1811, appear also to have formed part of the special verdict on which judgment was given.

A supersedeas was awarded, according to the prayer of the defendants' petition.

Macfarland for plaintiffs in error. The case of Rider v. The Union factory, 7 Leigh 154, is a conclusive authority to shew that the judgment of the circuit court was erroneous, if in point of fact the charter of the bank had expired. The only question in the case must be a question of fact, whether there was sufficient proof of the expiration of the charter. To shew this fact, there was all the evidence which the case admitted; for the charter was given in evidence, and it thereby appeared that the period for which the bank was incorporated had expired. It appears by the record, that on this ground of the apparent expiration of the charter, the application to quash the execution and bond was made; and it does not appear that there was any controversy in the court below as to the fact of such expiration.

The execution was also irregular, because some of the defendants against whom it issued were dead at the time of its emanation. The proper course was to suggest their deaths on the record, and issue the execution only against the defendants who survived.

Rhodes for defendants in error. There can be no difficulty upon the last point. The controversy in the original suit was brought up to this court by supersedeas, and judgment was entered here for the bank. The execution necessarily 60 conformed to that judgment, *and was properly issued against all the defendants therein, without enquiring whether all of them were alive or not. Our act of assembly expressly requires that the execution shall conform to the judgment, and the practice is to sue out execution without regard to the death of one of several defendants after judgment. In such cases the sheriff is to ascertain which of the defendants named in the execution are alive at the time of issuing it, and is to forbear serving it except as to them. Accordingly in this case, precisely that has been done, which would have been done if the deaths of the deceased defendants had been suggested on the record.

Upon the other point, it does not appear that the bill of exceptions contains all the evidence adduced on the motion. Not only does this not appear, but it does appear affirmatively that there was no plea or defence regularly made; that the defendants merely submitted to the court certain fragments of evidence, and asked judgment that the motion of the plaintiffs be overruled and the bond and execution quashed. The truth and accuracy of the copies of the acts passed by the legislature of North Carolina respecting the bank, are not denied; but it is insisted that whatever may be the prima facie inference from those laws, as to the expiration of the bank charter, the intendment of this court must be (in the absence of any plea, or any notice of the ground on which the motion was to be resisted, and with the judgment of the court below in favour of the plaintiffs) that there was other evidence on the point, and evidence sufficient to justify the judgment. It is not pretended that the acts given in evidence by the defendants were all the acts affecting the corporate existence of the bank. At all events, the most that can be ascertained from the acts so given in evidence is, that the charter may have expired. But the expiration of the charter does not necessarily infer the nonexistence of the 61 bank after the period when the charter expired. *[Brooke, J. After the expiration of the charter had been shewn by the defendants, ought not the plaintiffs to have shewn by proof on their part, that the bank was still legally in existence?] Here there was no plea or specific notice of defence on the ground of the nonexistence of the bank. It is a well established principle that pleadings must give the opposite party notice, by direct averment, of the point insisted on. Stephen on Pleading (1st edi.) 384, and case there cited. This principle applies to the case of a motion, even though written pleadings be dispensed with; for the necessity of precise notice, and the danger of surprise, are the same. If such notice had been given, it might have appeared that the principle of the Mayor &c. of Colchester v. Seaber, 3 Burr. 1866, was applicable. That case shews that after a corporation has become disabled to act, it may be so revived by a new charter as to revest a right of action on a bond executed and due before the disability occurred.

But here the appellants were estopped from denying the existence of the bank, and its power to enforce against them the judgment of this court. For that judgment was in 1837, two years after the alleged expiration of the charter. Williams v. The Bank of Michigan, 7 Wend. 539, is a case in which a judgment was held to estop from denying the legal existence of the plaintiffs. And The Dutchess Cotton Manufacturing Co. v. Davis, 14 Johns. 238, is a case of like estoppel by the execution of a bond. In 6 Bac. Abr. title Pleas and Pleadings, letter I. div. 11, p. 322 of Lond. edi. of 1832, it is said (citing Comb. 446), that if upon a writ of error it be assigned for error that the plaintiff died before the trial, and issue be thereupon taken, the plaintiff in error, by his pleading to the action, is estopped to give in evidence that the plaintiff died before the action brought.

62 *Moreover it appears that the claim in this case has been assigned. And according to The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton and others, 1 Rob. 499, if it appear that the claim in controversy in this court upon an appeal by a bank has been assigned to third persons, the expiration of the charter pending the appeal is no ground to dismiss the case. If the assignee of an expired corporation were not permitted to use the corporate name, his right would be extinguished. It will not do to say that the assignee may resort to equity. When he goes there, he must make the assignor a party; and this he could not do in respect to an extinct corporation.

Macfarland in reply. In motions on forthcoming bonds, the practice is to dispense with pleadings in writing, and the law is well settled that they are unnecessary. Upon the case as it appears by the evidence, the legal existence of the bank had ceased; and the appellate court is not to exercise its ingenuity in speculating whether there might not be a possible state of facts to justify the judgment of the court below. The appeal is a complaint against the judgment of the court below upon that state of facts, and that only, which appears on the record. True it is, that in this case the bill of exceptions does not expressly state that the evidence therein set forth was all the evidence adduced on the motion; nor is it necessary that it should. A party is only bound to make out a prima facie case; if there be evidence to countervail his prima facie case, it is for the party who relies on the countervailing evidence to have it spread on the record. Suppose a release by the plaintiffs in the motion had been produced, for the whole debt secured by the forthcoming bond, and the bill of exceptions had stated the production of the release, and proof that it was executed by the plaintiffs; could it be held that a judgment in favour of the plaintiffs must be presumed right, merely because the 63 *effect of the release might by possibility have been rebutted by proof that it was obtained by fraud or duress, and there is no express statement in the record that such rebutting proof was not produced?

In Jackson's adm'x v. The Bank of Marietta, 9 Leigh 244, 5, on non assumpsit pleaded, and a demurrer to the evidence adduced by the bank, it was held indispensable to prove the incorporation; and though it was manifest that the corporate existence of the plaintiffs was not in question in the court below, the judgment in favour of the bank was reversed. In the motion for award of execution on a forthcoming bond, when the defendant resists the award, he gives to the plaintiff as distinct a notice that all the proofs necessary to sustain the case are demanded, as he does in assumpsit by the plea of non assumpsit.

But it is contended that the judgment of this court precludes the defendants from contesting the corporate existence of the bank. On reference to the report in 8 Leigh 238, it will be found that the only question considered by the court was a question of usury in the contract: no question was made as to the legal existence of the bank. And the judgment of the court of appeals does not shew or necessarily establish its existence at that time. That judgment might have been properly rendered, though there had been full proof that at its date the corporation had expired. Under such circumstances, the defendants in this motion could not be precluded from the defence made by them, even if the defendants in the original suit and in this motion were the same. But they are not; one of the defendants here being a mere surety in the forthcoming bond. Neither is there an estoppel by the execution of the forthcoming bond. That admits merely the existence of the obligees who have assumed the name stated in the bond: it cannot be held to admit that by that name they are of the legislature in granting charters to artificial bodies, by which the privilege of suing is conferred, might in all cases be superseded by the mere act of individual parties. It is true that in Henriques v. The Dutch West India Company, 2 Ld. Raym. 1532, it was argued by counsel that the execution of the bail bond was a conclusive admission that the corporation was legally existing, and qualified to sue in the english courts. But the decision of the court did not at all turn on any question of estoppel.*

*Note by the reporter. In The Welland Canal Company v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 480. the plaintiffs gave in evidence a receipt signed by the defendant, in these words: "Received from Wm. Hamilton Merritt, agent for W. C. C. the sum of £250 currency." It was found that the letters W. C. C. stood for and

Suppose, however, that the defendants were precluded from denying the existence of the corporation at the date of the bond; on what principle can it be contended that they were precluded from denying the existence of the corporation at the time the motion was made? Such defence is in no manner a contradiction of the bond. Nor 65 can it be a valid objection to the evidence *offered in support of this defence, that it shews or tends to shew the nonexistence of the corporation at a period previous to the execution of the bond, and previous to the affirmance by this court in 1837. If an execution issue upon a judgment in the name of a plaintiff who was dead at the time of the recovery, the giving a forthcoming bond on that execution would not preclude the obligor from a motion to quash the execution and bond upon that specific ground.

As to the asserted assignment of the claim by the bank, supposing that fact to appear by the record of the original suit (though it does not appear in the report of the case) still it furnishes no just ground for continuing the suit in the corporate name, after the corporation has expired. No one is interested in enforcing the demand except the assignee, and he has a remedy in a court of equity. It is argued that when the assignee goes into equity to claim the subject assigned, his assignor will be an indispensable party. But if the assignor be a corporation which has become extinct, the assignee will be unable to make the assignor a party, and this inability will be an adequate excuse for his failure to do so. It is obvious then that the assignee would not, in a court of equity, lose the benefit of his assignment by the extinction of the corporation; while on the other hand his rights might be seriously affected, perhaps lost, by suffering the money to be collected under process from a court of law in the name of the extinguished corporation.

were understood to mean the Welland canal company, and that William Hamilton Merritt was the agent of the company. And it was contended for the plaintiffs, that the receipt of the defendant, and his contract with the agent of the company, ought to estop him from denying their legal existence; or at least were prima facie evidence of the fact, subject to be rebutted. The dictum of THOMPSON, C. J., in The Dutchess Cotton Manufacturing Co. v. Davis, 16 Johns. 245, and the case of Henriques v. The Dutch West India Company, 2 Ld. Raym. 1532, were both cited and examined, and the conclusion arrived at by the court was, that the defendant had neither admitted the legal existence of the plaintiffs as a corporate body, nor done any thing by which he was estopped from denying it. In The First Baptist Society v. Rapalee, 16 Wend. 605, the contract was with "the trustees of the first baptist church:" and on the question whether the defendant was estopped to deny that the plaintiffs were a corporation, the court said it was enough to refer to The Welland Canal Company v. Hathaway, and especially to the reasoning of the chief justice, to shew that this contract was any thing but an estoppel.

BALDWIN, J. This is an attempt, by motion, to defeat a judgment, for matter of abatement which occurred prior to the judgment. The defendants in the action resist the process of execution, chiefly on the ground that the charter by which the plaintiffs were incorporated expired at a certain period; and that period, it appears 66 by their own shewing, was antecedent to the rendition of the judgment.

The defence, it will be seen, is not upon the merits, but against the merits, and supposes that the merits ought not to have been considered. And the only enquiry that need be made in regard to this objection is, whether it comes in due time and by a proper mode of proceeding.

Matter of abatement either shews the action to be abatable, or that it is de facto abated. The former usually exists at the time of the suit; the latter for the most part occurs during its progress. The first must be pleaded in technical form, and at a proper stage of the cause. The last may be, but need not be, pleaded; and when apparent or made known to the court, will be declared by its order at any time, in any stage of the suit. A few examples will illustrate this distinction, and serve to throw light upon the question before us.

Misnomer of the plaintiff or defendant in the writ and declaration must be pleaded in abatement; and if not so taken advantage of, the cause proceeds to judgment and execution, according to the erroneous designation of the party. The execution must strictly pursue the judgment, and be warranted by it; and therefore if a defendant be sued by a wrong name, and omit to take advantage of the misnomer, he may be arrested on a ca. sa. by such wrong name. 1 Archb. Pract. 304; Crawford v. Satchwell, 2 Str. 1218. The plaintiff in that case brought trespass and false imprisonment by the christian name of Archibald: the defendant justified under a capias ad satisfaciendum upon a judgment against Arthur, and averred that the plaintiff in the then action was the same person who was sued in the former by the name of Arthur: and on demurrer the court held it a good plea, the defendant having missed his time for taking advantage of the misnomer, which should have been by pleading it in the first action. And the court said that in the case of a bond given in a wrong name, the obligor must be sued by that wrong name, and the execution must pursue it.

67 *So also if a feme covert sue as a feme sole, and her coverture be not pleaded in abatement, she recovers judgment (if successful upon the merits) as a feme sole, which judgment may be enforced by process of execution in exact conformity with it. This proposition is manifestly correct upon principle, and the case of Wortley v. Rayner, 2 Doug. 637, goes beyond it. In that case a verdict was found for the defendant on a plea of coverture, and a writ of fieri facias sued out for the costs, commanding the sheriff to levy and pay them to the defendant and her husband. A rule was granted to shew cause why the writ and proceedings thereon should not be set aside for irregularity; it being a maxim that a person not a party to the record cannot be benefited or charged by the process, without a scire facias. Cause was shewn; but the rule was made absolute, the court being clearly of opinion that the proceedings were irregular: and Ashhurst justice said, the wife might have had process in her own name, because the plaintiff having declared against her as sole, he was concluded from denying it.

And to come nearer the present case, if the plaintiff be dead at the time of action brought, this can only be alleged by plea in abatement, and a judgment, if recovered against the defendant, is in the name of the dead plaintiff; and process of execution may be sued out and acted upon in his name.

In these and other instances that might be given of matter for which the writ is merely abatable, the defendant is liable to an estoppel not only by force of the judgment, but also by reason of his failure to object the false designation, or the disability, or the nonexistence of the plaintiff at the time of action brought; which omission is considered a waiver of the objection on his part. It is this latter consideration which prevents the judgment from being erroneous; for the court is consequently not bound judicially to know the fact: and 68 *hence it is that such judgment by a false name, or for a married woman or a dead person, cannot be reversed or impaired, by writ of error or any other proceeding whatever.

On the other hand an abatement de facto, for matter of abatement occurring after the commencement of the suit, rests on a somewhat different principle. I need only notice the case of death of the plaintiff or defendant after action brought. In such case the action, though well brought, cannot properly proceed when one of the parties has become extinct. The objection may come from either side, at any stage of the cause, and need not be pleaded in any shape or form. It is equally incumbent on both sides to give information of the fact to the court; and it is at their peril that those who conduct the demand or the defence take judgment for or against the dead party. To give effect, however, to the abatement, it must be declared by the act of the court; for though, in the language of the books, the cause is abated de facto, yet the abatement must be judicially pronounced. But whether so pronounced or not, it is equally error to render judgment for or against a dead man. If the death appears upon the face of the record, it is error in law; if it does not so appear, it is error in fact: and in either case the judgment may be reversed by writ of error; in the former, by a writ of error in an appellate court; in the latter, by a writ of error coram vobis in the same court.

Such is the uniform rule of the common law in abatements de facto by the death of a party pending the action, at any time before final judgment. It applies to all cases, whether before or after a decision upon the merits, whether the cause of action does or does not survive to the representatives of the deceased party; and whether the death be that of a sole plaintiff or defendant, or of one of several joint plaintiffs or defendants. In these re-

69 spect the rule has been modified *by statutory provisions, but not so as to affect the principle upon which the doctrine rests. By statute 17 Car. 2, ch. 8, § 1, (substantially adopted into our code) the death of either party between verdict and judgment shall not be alleged for error. Upon the construction of this statute, and by the express provision of ours, the judgment is entered for or against the party as though he were alive. 2 Tidd's Pract. 848, 1024; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 38, p. 498. Hence the necessity of reviving the judgment by scire facias before execution can be sued out upon it. Earl v. Brown, 1 Wils. 302. For as the judgment is general for or against the party as if he were living at the time it was entered, so the scire facias must follow the judgment, and recite it as if it had been entered in his lifetime. 2 Wms. Saund. 721. By the statute 8 and 9 Will. 3, ch. 11, § 6, if the plaintiff or defendant happen to die after interlocutory and before final judgment, the action shall not abate, if originally maintainable by or against the executors or administrators of the party dying, but may be revived by scire facias. Our statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 38, p. 497, is in conformity with this, but broader, as it extends to death at any time before verdict rendered. Though the statute provides that the action shall not abate, it of course means that it shall not abate so as to be incapable of revival; and does not authorize a judgment for or against the dead man, (which would be as much error as it was before,) but for or against his executors or administrators after revival by scire facias. 2 Tidd's Pract. 1027. And by the same statute of Will. 3, § 6, which ours pursues (1 Rev. Code p. 498), if there be two or more plaintiffs or defendants in a personal action and one or more of them die, if the cause of action shall survive to the surviving plaintiff or plaintiffs or against the surviving defendant or defendants, the writ or action shall not be thereby abated; but such death being suggested upon the record, the 70 *action shall proceed at the suit of the surviving plaintiff or plaintiffs against the surviving defendant or defendants. Such was, in most cases, the rule of the common law before the statute; and it was error before, as it is since, to give judgment for or against any one of the joint plaintiffs or defendants who may have died. 3 Bac. Abr. 11, title Abatement, letter F.

But though it is error to render judgment for or against a party who has died pending the action, it by no means follows that the judgment is void. On the contrary, it is valid and effectual to all intents and purposes until reversed by a writ of error, and can be in no wise impeached or impaired in any supplemental or collateral proceeding. In Jourden v. Denny, 2 Bulstrode 241, in which such a judgment was reversed, Coke said, "If judgment be given against a dead person, this is not void, but to be reversed by a writ of error, for there ought to be a court, a plaintiff, and a defendant; nominatim, that it is not to be avoided by averment, but by a writ of error." The estoppel is not so extensive as in the case of death before action brought; for there, as already stated, even a writ of error is precluded. But it repels all averment or evidence (except by writ of error) of an essential fact, virtually affirmed by the judgment; to wit, the continued existence, at the time, of the party for or against whom the judgment was rendered. The estoppel, however, is only in support of the judgment, and does not obstruct its most convenient and beneficial execution. The judgment may therefore be revived for or against the representative of the deceased party, by a scire facias suggesting the death subsequently to the judgment; which suggestion the estoppel prevents from being traversed, for that would be equivalent to an averment that it occurred before. But a scire facias is not at all essential, and execution, if in due time, may be sued out in the names of the parties on the 71 record. *Nor is there any practical inconvenience in this, as may be inferred from the rules authorizing the levy &c. of a fi. fa. notwithstanding the death of either party after it has been sued out or tested. 1 Rob. Pract. 511; 1 Wm. Saund. 219f.

That there can be no averment or evidence of the death before judgment of a party for or against whom it was rendered, in any supplemental or collateral proceeding, whether it be a new action, or a scire facias to obtain execution, or consequently in avoidance of execution, is very clear upon authority. In 1 Rolle's Abr. 742, the following strong cases are put: "If the tenant in a cui in vita dies seized pending the writ; and, after, judgment is given against him, which is erroneous; and, after, the recoveror sues execution against the heir, and he brings an assize; he shall not avoid this judgment against his father, by saying that his father died pending the writ; for the judgment is not void, but only voidable."—"If a man recover in an ejectione firmæ, and then his executor sue execution per scire facias against the recoverer, the recoverer cannot avoid the judgment, nor stay execution, by saying that the testator died between verdict and judgment, or the like, but is put to his writ of error: and by the clarks, such pleas have been divers times disallowed."—"So if a man recover land in any real action, and then sue execution against the heir of the recoverer per scire facias, it is no plea for the heir to say that his father died pending the writ, but he is put to his writ of error."—"If a man recover against the principal, and sue a scire facias against the bail, they cannot say that the principal died before judgment, for that is to avoid the judgment by plea which is contrary to the record." It is correctly stated in 1 Rob. Pract. 585, (in conformity with the decision in M'Farland v. Irwin, 8 Johns. R. 78,) as a settled rule, that the defendant cannot plead any matter to a scire facias on a judgment, which he might 72 *have pleaded to the original action, or which existed prior to the judgment. In West v. Sutton, 2 Ld. Raym. 853, the case was this: "The plaintiff sued out a scire facias upon a judgment in assize obtained against the defendant for the office of marshal in the king's bench. The defendant pleaded in abatement that the plaintiff was an alien enemy &c. But by the whole court, the plea is ill, because this matter ought to have been pleaded in the original action." It appears from 1 Bac. Abr. 184, title Aliens, letter E. that it might have been so pleaded, either in abatement or in bar; and from De Bret v. Papillon, 4 East 502, that if the plaintiff had become an alien enemy after the action brought, it need not have been pleaded at all, but there might have been a judgment against him on that ground without plea.

Thus it will be seen that according to the principles of the common law, a disability of the plaintiff to prosecute his action, whether occurring before or after its commencement, cannot be relied upon after judgment as a defence against the process of execution. It is in vain to argue that the disability is a general one embracing all process whether before or after the judgment, and that it is no good objection to the evidence that it proves a continued disability, extending before as well as after. The answer is that the disability is not a substantive fact, but a consequence of the fact of death, natural or legal, which must have occurred at a precise period of time; that the estoppel excludes proof of its having occurred at a date prior to the judgment; and that its occurrence since is in the very teeth of the evidence. The argument was overruled in Lambert v. Cameret, coram Holt, C. J., at nisi prius, Comberbach's R. 446. In that case, it is true, the death occurred before action brought; but the principle is the same where it occurs pending the action; the only difference, as

73 already shewn, being, that in the former the estoppel is *inclusive, and in the latter exclusive, in regard to a writ of error. The case was this: "An action was brought in K. B. in the name of Cameret against Lambert, and verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in that action: now Lambert brings a writ of error coram vobis, and assigns error in fact that Cameret died before the trial of that issue, viz. tali die &c. The defendant in error, per A. B. attornat. suum, saith that he was live, et adhuc in plena vita existit; et hoc petit quod inquiratur per patriam. And now the plaintiff in error (Lambert) gives in evidence that the defendant in error (Cameret), being a seaman, died several years ago; before the action brought. Holt said, Here you are estopped to give in evidence the plaintiff's (Cameret's) death before the principal action brought, for then by your plea you admitted him to be alive. Sir B. Shower pro quer. in err. We are indeed estopped to plead that he died before the action brought; but sure we may give it in evidence, for if he were dead before the action, he must needs be dead before the trial. Holt, C. J., contra: You are estopped in evidence. But here the defendant in error saying, et adhuc in plena vita existit, et hoc &c. seems to have let the plaintiff in error loose from the estoppel; whereas if he had said, absque hoc that he died between the action brought and the trial, he would have hampered him." The drift of the case is, that the continued disability consequent upon death cannot be relied upon in evidence, where the fact of death at a given period is within the range of the estoppel: unless, indeed, the estoppel has been waived by bad pleading.

These principles of the common law must govern the case before us. The charter of the bank expired pending the action, and before the rendition of the judgment upon which the process in question issued. The extinction of a corporation by efflux of time cannot be distinguished, as regards disability, from that of an individual by death. Both are placed 74 upon the same *footing by Tucker, P., delivering the opinion of the court in Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, and by judge Stanard, delivering the opinion of the court in The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c., 1 Rob. 499. The estoppel of the judgment is equally applicable to both cases. See the remarks of the chancellor in the New York court of errors, in Williams v. Bank of Michigan, 7 Wend. 541-2, upon the case of Henriques v. Dutch West India Company, 2 Ld. Raym. 1532, in which he shews, that where a judgment has been recovered in the name of a corporation, the corporate existence of the plaintiffs cannot be denied upon a scire facias against the bail.

The circumstance that the expiration of the charter was between the verdict and the final judgment cannot influence this question; for the statute of 17 Car. 2, ch. 8, § 1, already noticed, has no being upon the present case. By that statute (1 Bac. Abr. 12, title Abatement, letter F.) it is enacted, "that in all actions, personal, real or mixed, the death of either of the parties between verdict and judgment shall not be alleged for error;" and by ours, in accordance with it, (1 Rev. Code 498,) "in all actions, real, personal or mixed, if either party should die between verdict and judgment, such death shall not be pleaded in abatement, but judgment shall be entered as if both parties were living." The terms of this statutory provision, it will be seen, are only applicable to the natural death of an individual, and do not embrace the expiration of an incorporated company. There is no construction according to the spirit or equity of the statute, which would extend it to the present case. The spirit of the statute was to prevent the action from being defeated after a decision upon the merits, even in cases where the right of action dies with the person; and this was accomplished by making a death between verdict and judgment, in point of 75 law, and against the fact, a death after judgment, so as thereby *to authorize a revival for or against the representative of the deceased party. But to extend the statute to corporations would be to produce directly the opposite effect, namely, to defeat the action after a decision upon the merits; inasmuch as there can be no representative of an expired corporation, and of course no revival by scire facias. There is no equity in such a construction: on the contrary it is fraught with the grossest injustice, for the result is that the creditors and stockholders of the expired corporation are deprived of all redress, though the justice of the corporate demand has been established by the verdict of a jury. To bring about such a result by the construction of a statute beyond its letter, would be an utter perversion of all reason and justice. I am not aware of any authority which, by a freedom of construction, has extended the provision of the statute beyond its express terms. On the contrary, the statute 8 and 9 Will. 3, ch. 11, § 6, authorizing a revival in case of death after interlocutory and before final judgment, has been held not to extend to cases where the party dies before interlocutory judgment, though after the expiration of the rule to plead. Wallop v. Irwin, 1 Wils. 315.

The cause of the defendants is not at all aided by the proceedings which were had on the supersedeas to the original judgment in their favour upon the special verdict. The effect of those proceedings was to suspend and reverse that judgment, and produce a judgment de novo in favour of the plaintiffs. The original judgment was rendered in October 1831: the bank obtained a supersedeas thereto in June 1832: the charter expired in January 1835: the supersedeas was heard in April 1837; when this court reversed the judgment, and proceeding to give such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered, gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the debt demanded &c. which judgment was entered in the circuit court in May 1837. This and rendering it utterly null and void from the beginning. But a judgment de novo for the appellant, upon reversal of the adverse judgment, has no connexion in point of time with the latter.

76 *judgment, rendered after the expiration of the charter, notwithstanding affirmed the then continued existence of the bank. It was a judgment de novo, having no relation to any period antecedent to its date. A judgment of affirmance relates to the time of the judgment affirmed, by removing the objections to it and establishing its original validity. A simple judgment of reversal has a like relation, by destroying the judgment reversed,

That the final judgment thus recovered by the plaintiff is not liable to contradiction, either directly or indirectly, nor to reversal by a writ of error, having been rendered by the highest judicial tribunal, is not a subject for regret, as it works no injustice. If the defendants are without remedy, it is because they have sustained no wrong. This alone would be a sufficient answer to the ancient writ of audita querela, which is an equitable action to be relieved from some oppression or injustice in the proceedings, where the party has had no day in court, nor can have a writ of error. 2 Wms. Saund. 148 a. b. c.; 3 Bac. Abr. 56; Error, A.; 1 Id. 424. Much less can the party avail himself of the modern substitute by motion, where the execution is in due time, is in conformity with the judgment, and there has been no abuse of that process, nor release or discharge of the demand. If the court, under such circumstances, could have the power to quash on motion, it would assuredly be merely discretionary; and it would be a strange exercise of discretion to sustain the motion in a case like this. Even before judgment the court, after a decision upon the merits, may refuse to arrest the proceedings on the ground of a supervening disability, upon the authority of Vanbrynen & others v.

77 Wilson, 9 East 321, in which case the plaintiffs had become *alien enemies since the verdict, but the court refused to stay the judgment and execution, saying, if the defendant had any remedy at law, he might avail himself of it. Arguments founded on the supposed disability on the part of the plaintiffs, after the money shall have been made by the execution, to coerce payment of it from the ministerial officer, or others into whose hands it may come, can avail the defendants nothing. That is a matter in which they have no concern. All they have to do is to pay this honest debt to the proper officer of the law, without troubling themselves about its ulterior disposition; leaving it, if there be any difficulty, to the vigilance of the legislature to devise, or the astuteness of the courts to ascertain, an adequate remedy for an undoubted right, by which those entitled in the stead of the bank, as creditors, stockholders or purchasers, may make the fund available. In truth, however, in the present case, there is no difficulty in this matter; for it appears from the record on the original appeal, that after the judgment for the defendants, before the expiration of the charter and before the supersedeas was awarded, the bank assigned its demand to Edward B. Hicks; for whose benefit the execution on the final judgment for the plaintiffs has been endorsed by the clerk, as appears from the record on the present appeal. His right therefore to receive the money when made upon the execution, cannot, I presume, be doubted. On the other hand, if the process of execution upon the judgment be defeated, he will be driven, and that by a mere technicality, to the tedious, uncertain and precarious remedy of a new action or a bill in equity. And what can be more technical than a distinction founded upon the mere circumstance that the assignee is not the formal, but only the substantial plaintiff, for whose benefit the execution is endorsed, who has a right to control it, and who is entitled to its proceeds?

78 *I have said that the final judgment in the cause affirmed the continued existence of the bank at the time of its rendition. I do not thereby mean the continued existence of the charter; which is evidence of the fact, but not the fact itself. The fact itself is a legal conclusion, compounded of law and fact. A corporation may have a legal existence notwithstanding the expiration of its charter. The legislature may thereafter confer it for a particular purpose, such as the recovery by suit of its just demands; or a judicial tribunal may infer such remaining capacity, however erroneously, from common law principles. The legal conclusion of the judgment overrules all conflicting evidence and argument. And evidence of the expiration of the charter before the judgment was rendered either disproves the then legal existence of the bank, or it does not: if the former, it is inadmissible, if the latter, unavailing, as a defence against the execution of the judgment. The strongest evidence after judgment, against the existence of the bank before, amounts to nothing; for it has to encounter every intendment of law and fact to the contrary, and if that were not so, every intendment of an adjudication against both law and fact; and either way the result is decisive. After judgment, the defendants can only be permitted to prove a supervening disability; and that is not pretended. This defence after judgment is in truth a renewal, in part, of that which was made before. Suppose it appeared from the record, that the defendants, pending the cause, had, by plea or motion to abate the action, alleged the extinction of the bank by expiration of the charter, and that the court overruled the objection, because such was not the fair construction of the charter, or of the act supplemental thereto, or because in its opinion a suit does not abate by the expiration of the charter; could the same question be renewed after judgment, by 79 *a plea to the forthcoming bond, or a motion to quash the execution? And this is substantially the true state of the case. The statutes of N. Carolina establishing the bank and constituting its charter were set forth in the special verdict; and thus presented directly the question, whether judgment could be rendered for the plaintiffs after the expiration of the charter. We may not know whether the question was presented in argument at the bar, or not.

It is enough that it was presented by the record, and of course adjudicated by the court. This is indeed more than enough; for the effect of the judgment would have been precisely the same, whether the question had appeared on the record or not; since a judgment precludes all questions against its effect and operation, not only which were, but which might have been made in the cause. And if a plaintiff be competent to recover judgment, I cannot understand how, things remaining the same, he can be incompetent to obtain execution to enforce it. I presume it would hardly be contended that an estoppel must be pleaded and cannot be relied upon against the evidence, where the defence is not by pleading, but by evidence only; or that it is to be disfavoured where it goes to sustain the merits of the cause.

The obstacles suggested in argument to suing out the process of execution, for want of the agency of some one authorized to act for the plaintiffs, seem to me merely imaginary. The authority of the attorney at law recovering the judgment is not extinguished by the demise of his client: the assignee entitled to the money has a right to issue and control the execution: and after the execution has issued, as in the present case, it is surely not competent for the defendants to allege that it was not issued by the plaintiffs.

I am wholly at a loss to perceive how, in a case like this, the regularity of the execution can be impeached, without impeaching the validity of the judgment, at least for the purpose of execution; and if it be not good for that purpose, it is good for nothing as a judgment in the cause, being incapable, from its very nature, of revival, and if not wholly nugatory, utterly abortive so far as regards the powers of the court which rendered it. Such a judgment would, to my mind, be extremely anomalous.

If the doctrine of the appellants be correct, it is very remarkable that no case has been produced by their learned counsel, and I presume none can be found, in which an execution has been quashed on the ground of the demise of the plaintiff before judgment, or in which an audita querela was sued out to prevent or set aside an execution on that ground; and that the writ of error should in such cases be the habitual and only recognized remedy. To tolerate such a practice would, I apprehend, impair much the force and dignity of judgment, and not unfrequently lead to the renewal of controversies already had in the action, or a reservation of them till after an unsuccessful trial upon the merits; controversies which might sometimes involve questions of law and fact extremely troublesome and perplexing, occasioning great delay (as in the present case) in what ought to be the final administration of justice, and wholly unfit for the informal and summary remedy by motion. On the other hand, I cannot perceive any inconvenience in repelling such tardy efforts in abatement, or that doing so could occasion injustice in any imaginable case.

It will be seen that the whole argument against the regularity of the execution, in whatever form or shape presented, turns upon the assumption of the expiration of the charter more than two years before the rendition of the judgment; and if I have succeeded in shewing that evidence of the fact is inadmissible, or if admitted avails nothing, against the effect and operation of the judgment, then there is, as I conceive, an end of the *question. There

81 is no foundation in authority for the idea that it is necessary, under any circumstances, to sue out a scire facias after judgment, because of matter which occurred before. The rule relative to marriage or death, and formerly but not now to bankruptcy, that where a new person is to be benefited or charged by the execution of a judgment, there ought to be a scire facias to make him a party to the judgment, (2 Tidd's Pract. 1021; 2 Archb. Pract. 93,) applies, ex vi termini, only to cases where the new interest accrues after the judgment, and not where it accrues before. The change of interest (where it operates at all), when before judgment, goes to the action, and when after judgment, to the execution. And the rule never applied to assignment by act of the party, whether before or during the action, or after judgment. The statute 17 Car. 2, ch. 8, it is true, in case of the natural death of a party between verdict and judgment, renders a scire facias, not by express terms but by necessary consequence, indispensable; because it makes what was at common law a death before judgment, a death after judgment. But it by no means follows that at common law, where a party died before the action, or pending the action, whether after or before verdict, a scire facias was necessary to have execution. If it had been, it is strange that there is no case at common law to that effect, and that the question should never have arisen until and upon the statute. In truth, at common law there could be, pending the action, no scire facias upon a death before judgment, because the action abated; and it would be remarkable if that which, before judgment, could not be employed to revive the action, should, upon the identical fact, become indispensable afterwards to revive the judgment. Suppose the scire facias should state truly, that the party died before the action, or before the judgment; could it be sustained

82 on demurrer? And does the law require that the scire *facias should suggest falsely a death after judgment, when in truth it occurred before? Again, if it be true, as suggested in the case of Rider v. The Union Factory, that upon the extinction of a corporation its personal estate goes to the commonwealth, it furnishes no reason for quashing an execution upon a judgment obtained by the corporation during its legal existence (as in this case the judgment itself establishes), but the reverse, for it would deprive the commonwealth of that remedy; and surely it can have no application to a case where the debt was assigned by the corporation before its extinction.

Thus, according to my view of the subject, where an execution is in due time and conforms to the judgment, it cannot be abated for any matter which occurred before. That the judgment of this court for the plaintiffs upon the special verdict was the final judgment in the cause, I think there can be no room to question. The writ of error, it is true, is a new action; but it is brought to have the proper judgment. "Where a judgment is given for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings error, there shall only be judgment to reverse the former judgment; for the suit is only to be eased and discharged of that judgment: but where the plaintiff brings error, the judgment shall not only be a reversal, but the court shall also give such judgment as the court below should have given; for his writ of error is to revive the first cause of action, and to recover what he ought to have recovered by the first suit, wherein erroneous judgment was given." Parker v. Harris, 1 Salk. 262. And where the judgment of the court below is against the plaintiff on a special verdict by which the debt or damages are ascertained, (as in this case,) the appellate court, in case of reversal, gives a new and complete judgment for the plaintiff to recover the debt or damages. 2 Wms. Saund. 101 x. Where the damages are not assessed, the judgment is of course interlocutory;

83 *and a writ of enquiry is not only awarded by the king's bench when that is the appellate court, and the subsequent proceedings had there, but, being also a court of original cognizance, the execution issues from that court, as it does where the first judgment was final. Ibid. and 101 z.; 1 Rob. Pract. 673. And so by our practice and statute law, the court of appeals renders, on such reversal, such judgment final or interlocutory as the court below ought to have rendered, and its judgment may be entered by the clerk below in vacation as well as in term time, and if final, execution in either event may be sued out thereupon. 1 Rob. Pract. 672. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the judgment of this court was the final judgment between the parties, though repeated by the circuit court upon the remittitur, and although the execution issued from the court below, as it does in England when the appellate judgment is in the house of lords or exchequer chamber; in which respect, and in regard to the proceedings after an interlocutory judgment, this court, not being a court of original cognizance, is governed by the rules which prevail in the courts last mentioned.

The judgment of this court was not the less final, because the charter of the bank expired pending the writ of error. If, for that or any other reason, this court had abated the appellate suit, such abatement would not have extended to the original action, which was determined by the judgment therein; and the only effect of the abatement would have been to extinguish the supersedeas, leaving the judgment to which the writ of error had been granted in full force. But the appellate cause was not abated, and could not be, however strong the reason, without the order of this court. This court, instead of directing an abatement, proceeded to hear and decide the cause; reversed the judgment of the court below; and gave a new and complete judgment for the plaintiffs. That judgment has the same effect and operation, 84 tion, *whether it was right or wrong: and if it could even be regarded as a mere mandate to the court below to proceed to final judgment between the proper parties, the result would not be different; for the circuit court has proceeded to final judgment, in conformity, as it conceived, to such mandate; and if not between the proper parties, that is error for which the judgment can only be impeached by writ of error. If neither the judgment of this court for the plaintiffs, nor that of the circuit court in conformity therewith, is to be regarded as the final judgment, I am utterly at a loss to understand what is the present condition of the cause; and if either be the final judgment, what authority or control can now be exercised over it by the circuit court.

But I cannot doubt that the course of this court in declining or omitting to abate the writ of error, and proceeding, after reversing the judgment for the defendants, to final judgment for the plaintiffs, was perfectly correct; nor can I conceive how it can be regarded otherwise, without repudiating the principles recognized in the case of The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton & C. above cited. In that case a bill in equity was filed by the bank, to set aside a voluntary conveyance made by its debtor, and subject the property conveyed to the satisfaction of its demand. The chancellor, upon a hearing of the merits, dismissed the bill of the plaintiffs, who appealed to this court. Pending the appeal, the charter of the bank expired, and the appellees moved the court, on that ground, to abate the appeal. But it being conceded that the bank, pending the original suit, and before the expiration of the charter, had made an assignment of its claim, this court refused to abate the appeal, and proceeded to hear and decide the cause. The decree of the chancellor was affirmed; but if it had been reversed, then this court, in its discretion, would have

85 given the proper relief upon the merits, or *settled the principles of the cause, and remanded it for further proceedings in the court below. The reasons for the decision will be found stated in the opinion of judge Stanard, in which a majority of the other judges concurred. It was by that opinion held, that in Virginia a writ of error or appeal in no case abates by the death of either party, where the cause is capable of being revived for or against his representatives; that the established rule in such cases requires the revival of the appellate cause by scire facias; that where, upon the extinction of one of the parties, as of a corporation by expiration of its charter, there is no legal representative or successor for or against whom the appellate cause can be revived, the court will, upon the principles and authority of Rider v. The Union Factory above cited, abate the writ of error or appeal, unless it appear that the rights involved in the cause passed by assignment to living persons before the legal extinction of the party on the record, in which case the court, to prevent a failure of justice, will not abate the writ of error or appeal, but proceed to a hearing, and a judgment or decree, between the parties on the record. It will be seen that the present case and the one cited were, in regard to the preliminary question, precisely the same; except that one was an action at law, and the other a suit in equity. The ruling principle of both was to remove a formal impediment to the administration of justice. This was to be accomplished, in the first place, by refusing to abate the appeal, and examining the merits of the cause; and if the merits should be ascertained to be in favour of the appellant, then by proceedings adapted to the respective forums. The plastic powers of a court of equity allow the introduction of the equitable claimant as a party in the cause, and suggest the remanding of the suit to the court below, after settling its merits, to enable him to become the plaintiff by a supplemental

86 bill. The more *rigid rules of a legal forum do not permit this, and require the progress to final judgment and execution in the name of the formal party. This, and nothing more nor less, was the direct and inevitable effect of not abating the writ of error; unless, after overruling the abatement of the writ of error, and reversing the judgment of the court below, this court, in proceeding to give such judgment as that court ought to render, had abated the original action. This it ought to have done, if the bank was to be defeated by the expiration of its charter; and this it might have done upon the authority of Hook's adm'rs v. Hancock, 5 Munf. 549. There, in an action of slander, this court reversed the judgment rendered for the plaintiff in the court below, for error on the trial of the issue; and then abated the original action, on the ground that the defendant having died subsequently, the action no longer survived against his representatives. But instead of this course, which was obvious if this court intended to defeat the recovery, it rendered final judgment for the plaintiffs, to prevent the recovery from being defeated; and now the effort of the defendants is to abate that judgment in effect, by preventing its execution. Such a course imputes to this court a mere mockery of justice and an utter trifling with its own authority. With judicial knowledge of the fact that the charter of the bank had expired, it renders a direct, peremptory and unconditional judgment for the recovery of the debt, interest and costs; foreseeing that this exercise of its supreme power was to be disregarded and set at nought by the very court whose judgment it had reversed; and thus deciding, in one and the same breath, that the recovery should not and should be defeated, or that its own conscious error should be corrected by the summary and informal action of the subordinate jurisdiction.

I will not say that where a party dies pending an appeal, in a case capable of revival, and the cause notwithstanding 87 *by inadvertence passes through the appellate court without revival, it may not still be revived in the court below, upon the remittitur. I believe the practice in the circuit courts is otherwise, and very properly so. But where the suit is incapable of revival, and the demise of the party appears to the appellate court upon the record, or is made to appear by extrinsic evidence, and that court, without abating the appeal, proceeds to reverse the judgment, and then, instead of abating the action, proceeds to a final judgment de novo in the cause, I consider it beyond the power of the court below to impose the impracticable condition of revival, or in any wise to defeat or obstruct the execution of the judgment. In the present case the appellate court, in rendering final judgment, was not confined to the consideration of what judgment the court below ought to have rendered at the time of the action of that court, independently of that which ought yet to be rendered; but being bound by its own recognized doctrine to consider the question of abatement, had to regard all proper evidence on the subject, whether furnished by the record, or evidence aliunde. And here it was furnished by the record, shewing upon its face the expiration of the charter; and no countervailing evidence, such as a subsequent enabling statute, was offered, as there might have been; for, as was held by the opinion delivered in The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c. such incidental questions are open to enquiry by the requisite means. The case, to my mind, stands precisely upon the same footing as if it had never been taken to the appellate court, and judgment had been rendered for the plaintiffs by the circuit court after the expiration of the charter.—I think this plea in abatement comes too late.

The view of the subject thus presented renders it unnecessary to consider the objections taken by the appellee's counsel to the mode of presenting and reserving 88 *the question in the court below.

And it surely cannot be necessary, upon the other supposed error alleged by the appellants, to wit, that the execution was irregular in embracing two of the defendants who had died before the judgment, to say more, than that it was not the less a judgment against those defendants, and as the execution conforms to the judgment, it is an objection which goes to the latter, and not to the former: and the rule is perfectly well settled, that the execution must embrace all the defendants named in the judgment, though some of them have died, and the officer proceeds upon the execution as if the names of the decedents were not included therein. 1 Rob. Pract. 575.

My opinion is that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, overruling the motion to quash the first execution and the forthcoming bond, and awarding execution upon the bond.

ALLEN, J. The authorities bearing on the questions presented by this case have been fully reviewed by judge Baldwin. They clearly establish, that where matter in abatement existed prior to the suit, advantage must be taken of it by plea in proper time, and that after judgment the party is estopped, and cannot avail himself of it by a writ of error: and that where such matter occurs pending the suit, if not suggested or brought to the notice of the court before judgment, though a writ of error coram nobis in some cases may be prosecuted, the judgment until reversed estops the party from alleging the fact. And as a consequence from these principles, in all proceedings based upon the judgment and tending to enforce it, the party is concluded from availing himself of this error in the judgment. Thus the scire facias to revive is a mere continuance of the proceedings, and it is not competent for the heir or personal representative of the original defendant to set up his death 89 before judgment, in *order to defeat the plaintiff. The judgment unreversed has established the fact to be otherwise. And hence the well settled rule, that the defendant cannot plead any matter to the scire facias on a judgment, which he might have pleaded to the original action, or which existed prior to the judgment. So in a scire facias upon a recognizance of bail, the bail cannot require evidence of that which was necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover in the original action, because the scire facias is a continuance of the proceedings. That is the amount of the decision in Henriques v. The Dutch West India Co., 2 Ld. Raym. 1532. It was a proceeding on the recognizance of bail, and the plaintiffs were not required to produce proof of their incorporation; but the reporter says he was informed by lord King, before whom the original action was tried, that on the trial of that case the proof was required. So with regard to alienage and coverture, the disability is personal; but judgment having passed, the defendant is concluded; and the parties continuing to exist, the execution follows the judgment. These principles, however, respect the validity and effect of the judgment, in a proceeding to enforce it, and based upon it: but their application to the question now under consideration is not so distinctly perceived. That respects the regularity of the process. If the state of facts existing at the time the process issued be such as to render it unlawful, the process is void. And this irregularity may frequently appear by extrinsic circumstances. As where the execution issues against a defendant who is dead, the death does not appear on the face of the writ, but appears by evidence aliunde. Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cowen 739.

It is argued, that to impeach the regularity of the execution, in a case like this, is to impeach the judgment for the purpose of execution; and that as there can be no revival, if it be not good for that purpose, it is good for nothing in the cause.

90 This might be conceded, *and yet not affect the question. If by the common law the debts of a corporation, either to or from it, are extinguished by its dissolution, (as laid down in Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 156,) the fact that the debt is due by judgment cannot operate to save it. And if, by a renewal of its charter, it is restored to all its rights and liable for all its obligations, (2 Kyd on Corporations 516,) it may, when so renewed, revive and obtain the benefit of the judgment. If the personalty of an expired corporation goes to the commonwealth, or if there has been a valid assignment before the dissolution, in either case the judgment may be enforced, if not at law, by a proceeding in equity. And by whatever mode enforced, the judgment establishes conclusively the validity of the debt and the right of the party to recover, at the time of its rendition. With as much force it might be argued, that as at common law, and before a scire facias was given to revive after the year and day, there could be no revival, the judgment was of no validity. And yet in such case the judgment, in an action of debt upon it, cannot be assailed for any matter which might have been pleaded to the original action.

At common law, the death of a sole plaintiff or defendant abated the suit. 2 Tidd's Pract. 1168. The statute of 17 Car. 2, ch. 8, provided that the death of either party between verdict and judgment should not be alleged for error. Under this statute, judgment is entered for or against the party as though he were alive. Weston v. James, 1 Salk. 42. But there must be a scire facias to revive it before execution. Earl v. Brown, 1 Wilson 302. In the case just cited, the plaintiff died after verdict and before judgment: judgment was entered and execution taken out, without any scire facias sued out by the plaintiff's representative: and the whole court held, that though by the 17 Car. 2, ch. 8, the judgment was regularly entered, yet the fi. fa.

91 issued *irregularly, for there ought to have been a scire facias. That is a much stronger case than the one under consideration; for the death of the plaintiff (a natural person) does not extinguish the debt. But the scire facias in that case is supposed to be rendered necessary by the statute of 17 Car. 2, because the judgment is general for or against the party as if he were living at the time it was entered, and the scire facias must follow the judgment, and recite it as if it had been entered in his lifetime. If, before the statute, a judgment were entered against or for a dead man, the same result would follow: the judgment, until reversed, would be evidence that the party was living; the scire facias would so recite it; and the defendant would be estopped on the scire facias from shewing the contrary. That being the case, in what sense can it be contended that the statute rendered the scire facias necessary? Where it authorizes a judgment to be entered as though the party were living, the same effect should be given to it as where the judgment was so entered erroneously. And if in the latter case an execution might have been taken out in the name of the parties on the record, a fortiori would such an execution have been regular where the judgment itself was legalized. The scire facias could only have been rendered necessary, because the common law required it, and the statute, whilst curing the error in the judgment, left the parties to their common law remedies to enforce it. And the case referred to is a decisive authority, that, by the common law, the judgment must be revived in the name of the proper representative. No case has been adduced establishing a contrary position. But we have cases without number, deciding that if the plaintiff dies after judgment, there cannot be execution before a scire facias in the name of the representative. Com. Dig. title Pleader, 3 L. 1; 1 Rolle's Abr. 900, pl. 15, 20. But if 92 the plaintiff dies after execution, in that case the sheriff *may go on and levy the money, and if there be no executor or administrator, the money is to be brought into court. Thoroughgood's case, Noy's Rep. 73. As between the parties, the execution has relation to its teste, (Tidd's Pract. 915,) and if tested before the party's death, is regular, though issued afterwards. Cro. Car. 459. But if tested after the plaintiff's death, it is irregular. Heapy v. Parris, 6 T. R. 368. How would this question so frequently have arisen, if, by the common law, execution might be sued out by or against a party where the death occurred before judgment? There could be no good reason for a distinction, whether the party died before or after the judgment, so far as the regularity of the process was involved. The rule which has always prevailed is laid down in Pennoir v. Brace, 1 Salk. 319, that where a new person is to be better or worse by the execution, there must be a scire facias, because he is a stranger, to make him a party to the judgment; as in the case of an executor or administrator. And hence the necessity of a scire facias in all cases of death before execution. Here the corporation is extinct: that it cannot have benefit by the execution is evident: and whoever is to be the better for it, should in some form be brought into the case. If the forms of proceeding at law interpose difficulties, the party may have redress in equity.

If then there is no authority for the position assumed, that in case of death before the judgment, a scire facias was not essential, and execution might be sued out in the names of the parties on the record; but on the contrary the common law did, whenever there was such change of parties, require a scire facias; the whole argument derived from the doctrine of estoppel and the adjudication of the fact, falls to the ground. The estoppel applies only where the attempt is made to impeach the validity of the judgment for that cause. In such case the party is precluded by the 93 judgment from *denying the fact.

And that is the effect of the decision in Comberbach's Rep. 446. The proceeding there was to reverse the judgment by writ of error coram vobis. The plaintiff having died before action brought, the defendant, by pleading to the action, waived the objection and admitted him to be alive. If therefore the plea to the assignment of error had simply averred that the plaintiff in the original action was alive at the time the action was brought, and relied upon the record, the plaintiff in error would have been estopped. But even that case proves that the technical estoppel must be pleaded in such way as to preclude the party from shewing the contrary. The defendant in error averred by his plea the continued existence of the party to the time of the judgment; and this let the plaintiff in error loose from the estoppel. He was permitted to shew by evidence that the party was dead at a time when, by the record, he was deemed to be alive; and by so doing, to avoid the judgment. But in a case where the judgment is not impeached; where the motion raises merely the question whether the process is irregular in itself or in the mode of issuing it, (a question to be determined with reference to the state of facts existing at the time the process issued,) it would be carrying the doctrine of estoppel, and the intendment of an adjudication, to a great length, if the defendant is to be precluded from shewing that at that instant of time no party was in existence capable of suing out process, because such existing disability is a consequence of another fact, which occurred before final judgment.

The case of The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c., 1 Rob. 499, is supposed to have some bearing on this question. In that decision I concurred, for the reasons assigned in the opinion delivered, and also because I felt satisfied that in this court there was no necessity for a revivor in any case; that though it might be convenient, when a death occurred, to apprise the 94 parties *interested of the pendency of an appeal, there was no absolute necessity for it, and it was the duty of this court, whenever justice required it, to determine the questions appearing on the record, and leave the parties to proceed thereafter as their interests might require and the law permit. The court held in that case, that before the act of 1806, appeals and writs of error did not abate by the death of either party, but his representative or the other party might revive by scire facias; and that even this practice did not require such revivor at the time of the judgment or decree of this court, if the death had occurred subsequent to the argument. The difficulty of proceeding in error unless there were existing parties, legal or natural, at the time of the hearing and judgment, was therefore not insuperable. When, as in that case, there was a suggestion that rights might be compromised unless the decree, if erroneous, were removed out of the way, it was competent for the court to act on the decree in the name of the parties on the record. The power was considered essential to prevent injustice: and the case was put, of a decree or judgment of the court below in favour of the corporation against the appellant, and a subsequent dissolution of the corporation; when, if the appeal must necessarily be abated, the recovery would be left in force, and the appellant liable to be charged with it at the suit of an assignee. The court in the present case, in rendering judgment on the special verdict, decided upon the facts as there presented, and with reference to the time when presented. The correctness of the judgment of the inferior court was the matter for consideration: and on the facts as presented to that court, and passed upon by it, no impediment to a final judgment existed. The corporation was then in being, and entitled to recover. And this court, by its reversal, and the entry of such judgment as that court should have given, adjudicated that fact and nothing

95 *more. Had the dissolution of the corporation been suggested here, and rights might have been compromised on one side or the other by abating the appeal, this court, under the authority of The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c. would have refused to abate, and proceeded to render the judgment it did. It passed no judgment upon matters which supervened after the special verdict, and the judgment on it by the court below. Its action was confined to the correction of the error in that judgment, as of the time it was pronounced, without considering or deciding what would be the effect of any subsequent events upon the rights of the parties. The charter might have been renewed after the appeal; but this would be matter extrinsic to the record. In such case the appeal ought not to be abated. But if the rights of the parties are to be considered as determined as of the time of pronouncing the judgment in the appellate court, the court must, by abating the appeal, decide that the corporation has expired, or, if it notices the extrinsic evidence, the judgment would be rendered not upon the record as it came from the court below, but upon that in connexion with matter for the first time exhibited in this court.

The argument pressed upon us as to the merits of the case, and the inconvenience, is not entitled to much weight if the law is obligatory. But in truth, where is the inconvenience or hardship complained of? If the corporation had expired by efflux of time after judgment, I presume there could be no pretence that an execution could issue in its name; for in that case, this technical doctrine of estoppel would not apply. There would be no judgment determining, against the fact, that that was existing which had ceased to exist. Yet in such case the judgment would remain, as in this, entitled to all the respect of a judgment, whenever enforced in a proper way by the party entitled to enforce it. But on the other hand, 96 serious inconvenience, if *not gross injustice, might and probably would flow from establishing the principle contended for. Is any man who can succeed in inducing the clerk to issue an execution on a judgment standing in the name of an expired corporation, to be permitted to enforce payment? If the sheriff collects the money, to whom is he to pay it? It is suggested, that there is an assignee: but how is his right to be determined on an ex parte proceeding, without notice to any party interested in controverting his claim if erroneous? The debtor has an interest in seeing that the money he owes is paid into the proper hand. By requiring the party (whoever he may be) claiming to be entitled to the benefit of the judgment, to enforce it in the proper mode, the injustice which may be committed by permitting execution to issue in the name of the extinct corporation, is guarded against, and the rights of all secured.

It seems to me that the court should have overruled the motion for a judgment on the forthcoming bond, and quashed the execution.

STANARD, J. It is not questioned that if a corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of its corporate existence, pending a suit at law for a corporate demand, and that fact be brought 97 regularly* under *the judicial cognizance of the court in which the suit is pending, the action must terminate. It is equally free from doubt, that if, after judgment in favour of a corporation, the corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of existence granted by the charter of incorporation, no execution on such judgment can regularly be sued out in the name of the corporation, and if one be issued, it is liable to be quashed, on shewing the fact of the extinction of the corporation before the emanation of the execution. On the other hand, I do not question that if an original judgment be rendered in favour of a corporation, as it could not regularly be rendered unless the existence of the corporation continued, the necessary intendment from the rendition of it is, that the then continued existence of the corporation was either proved or admitted; and if execution be sued on the judgment, the defendant, being by this intendment estopped to deny the existence at the time of the judgment, would not, on a motion to quash the execution, be admitted to controvert this intendment, and proof on such motion of the extinction of the corporation before judgment would be inadmissible or unavailing.

Assuming the foregoing propositions as unquestioned or unquestionable, the enquiry is, by which of them should the case in judgment be ruled? The case that the record presents is that of a corporation plaintiff existing at the time of the original judgment in the court below, and at that time, according to the judgment of the

98 court of appeals, entitled to judgment against the *defendants, but whose charter expired pending the proceedings and before the final judgment in error: and this expiration of its corporate existence is the matter alleged for quashing the execution which issued on that judgment. If the expiration of the charter of incorporation pending the proceedings in error, and the subsequent judgment in error notwithstanding that expiration, be properly assimilated to an original judgment after the expiration of the charter, then, according to the second assumed proposition, the judgment precludes the enquiry into the existence of the corporation at the time of its rendition; and therefore forbids or nullifies the proof of the nonexistence of the corporation at the time of the judgment in error, and consequently at any antecedent time. The material question then is, can this assimilation be properly made?

The principle which the second proposition rests is, that the expiration of the charter before original judgment was a fact on which the defendant might have protected himself from the judgment, and if properly brought to the judicial cognizance of the court, would have denied to the court judicial capacity not only to render the

*Note by the reporter. The case of Agnew v. The Bank of Gettysburg, 2 Harr. & Gill 478, shews the necessity of bringing the fact before the court in a regular way. This was an action of assumpsit brought the 30th of July 1824 by the bank against Agnew, and the plea was the general issue. At the trial on the 15th of February 1826, the plaintiffs, to shew that when the suit was commenced they had a right to sue, gave in evidence letters patent whereby it appeared that at the time the suit was brought they were an existing corporation. But the same letters patent shewed that the charter was limited to the first day of April 1825, and so had expired between the time of bringing the suit and the time of trial. The defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that from the evidence the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. This instruction the court refused to give; and verdict and judgment being rendered against the defendant, he appealed. The court of appeals of Maryland was of opinion that the defendant could not, under the general issue, have given in evidence the dissolution of the charter subsequent to the institution of the suit; and this being so, that he could not be allowed to avail himself of the fact to nonsuit the plaintiffs, merely because it appeared in the letters patent which the plaintiffs were compelled to adduce. The court therefore affirmed the judgment.

judgment, but to proceed in the cause; and the legal intendment is, that the fact of the continued existence of the corporation was conceded or proved. Is such the predicament of the case in error? Does the judgment in error necessarily import that the parties are existing at the time of its rendition, so as to create an estoppel to the denial of that fact, in proceedings in execution of the judgment? This enquiry must be answered in the negative. It has been the constant practice of this court, where natural persons are the litigant parties, to proceed to judgment as though such persons were living, if the death occurs between the argument of the case and the judgment, though the judgment be rendered months or even years after the death: and

be contended that the successful party could proceed to have it executed without process of revivor in the court below. In the case of a corporation whose existence may have terminated pending appeal or writ of error, and to which there is no legal succession nor can be a legal representative, but whose rights, at least in equity, may have passed to others by assignment for value during its existence, the appellate proceedings are continued to judgment or decree in the appellate court, irrespective of the fact that the corporate existence has terminated. Such was the decision of this court in the case of The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c. According to that decision, had the attempt been made, when this case was in the court of appeals, to arrest further proceedings in error, and thereby intercept the judgment that was rendered, on the ground that the charter of the corporation had expired, it would have been fruitless. The court would, notwithstanding such objection, have proceeded to a decision, and would have rendered such judgment as the court below ought to have rendered. As the expiration of the charter would not have prevented the rendition of the judgment, there cannot be a legal intendment of the then continued existence of the corporation from the rendition of the judgment, as in the case of an original judgment. The judgment in error, in respect to this question, has relation to the time of the judgment of the court below, being the judgment that ought to have been rendered by that court; and execution on that judgment, if sued out in the name of a party who may have ceased to exist pending the appeal or writ of error, is as liable to be objected to on that ground, as it would be if the judgment on which it issued had been rendered by the court below when its original judgment was rendered. There can be no estoppel to the allegation and proof of the 100 expiration of the *corporation, resulting from a judgment which, so far from implying either concession or proof of its existence at the time of its actual rendition, would have been rendered though there had been the allegation and proof that at that time its existence had terminated.

The evidence that was offered to show that the corporation had ceased to exist at the time the execution issued in its name was, I think, prima facie proof thereof, and, uncontrolled by other proof, ascertained that fact: and that being ascertained, it established that the execution on which the forthcoming bond was taken issued irregularly, and the court ought to have overruled the motion for award of execution on the forthcoming bond, and to have sustained the motion to quash that execution and the bond taken under it. This would have left the judgment rendered by this court to the fate to which the extinction of the corporation consigned it. If any party, by virtue of a transfer from the corporation during its existence, was beneficially entitled to the avails of the judgment or the subject involved in the controversy, though that party could not have a legal remedy by suing out execution in the name of a nonentity, an expired corporation, I do not doubt that his equitable title would be protected by a court of equity, and his claim to the avails of the judgment enforced in that forum against the party chargeable.

BROOKE, J. I think the case of Rider v. The Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, ought to govern this case, as I thought it ought to have governed the case of The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton &c., 1 Rob. 499. It differed from the rest of the court in the last mentioned case, because I could not see that an ex parte exhibition of a deed of assignment by the bank before the expiration of its charter, (not to be found in the record, and not noticed in the pleadings) could be made the ground of a decision in this court. The charter of the bank having expired, the assignment could not be contested here by that institution, nor by the defendants, who had no notice of it in the record. Had the bill been in the name of the assignees instead of the bank, that might have been a ground for relief though the charter had expired. In the present case, I cannot distinguish between the expiration of the charter of the state bank of North Carolina after the judgment of his court, and before it. In the former event, there could be no doubt that the motion on the forthcoming bond would be overruled, and the execution and bond quashed. Nor can I understand how the supposed estoppel of the judgment is to be availed of. It is said by the court in Rider v. The Union Factory, before referred to, that upon the expiration of its charter, a corporation can neither hold property, nor be responsible for any of its acts in the corporate character. It is a nonentity. As such, it can neither plead nor be impleaded. How then could the bank in the present case avail itself of the estoppel of the judgment? Where a natural person, party to a suit, has died before judgment, his representative, in a case like the one before us, might insist on the estoppel of the judgment: and all the cases that have been cited are of that character. I believe no case can be found, in which the court has applied the estoppel of a judgment so as to enforce the judgment, on behalf of a dead party having no representative before the court, against the defendant. In any view of the case, I think the motion on the forthcoming bond ought to have been abated, and the execution and bond quashed; but without costs.

Judgment reversed, and execution and forthcoming bond quashed.

†Jurisdiction—County Courts—Grants of Administration.—It is well settled, that the county court is a court of general jurisdiction in regard to probates and the grant of administrations; that it has jurisdiction in regard to the whole subject-matter; and that though it may err in taking jurisdiction of a particular case, yet the order is generally not void, but only voidable on citation or appeal, and cannot be questioned in any collateral proceeding. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. 102; Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358; Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323; Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 85; Andrews v. Avory, 14 Gratt. 229.

The principal case is cited on this point in Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 379, 380, 382; Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 90; Andrews v. Avory, 14 Gratt. 236; Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 326; Smith v. Henning, 10 W. Va. 617.

See foot-note to Andrews v. Avory, 14 Gratt. 229.

In Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119, it is decided that a grant of administration by the court of a county or corporation that was not authorized to grant it according to the provisions of the statute (the decedent in that case having been a foreigner, and having died abroad, and who had no residence in the corporation by the court of which the administration was granted, and no estate of any kind there), is not void, but voidable only: And it was accordingly held in that case that acts of and dealings with such administrator consummated before the letter granted to him were revoked or superseded could not be called in question. The doctrine of this case is repeated and affirmed by the principal case.

Same—Same—Same.—In Ballow v. Hudson, 18 Gratt. 681, the court said: "The cases in this court in result against his representative. But afterwards that process was quashed and that order set aside, as early as 1811; and then, by consent of parties, the suit was revived against the administrator de bonis non of the executor, and by like consent it was entered that the cause was not to abate by the death of any of the parties. A personal decree was obtained in 1818 by the legatees against the administrator de bonis non, from which he appealed. Pending the appeal, he died. Whereupon, though the two former grants of administration on the executor's estate had been by the court of Orange, the court of Hanover now granted administration on the same estate, not in the form of a grant de bonis non, but of an original grant. At the instance of the legatees, a scire facias issued to revive the appeal against this new administrator, (calling him administrator de bonis non) which was duly executed, and in 1822 the decree affirmed. In the caption to the decree of affirmance, the name of the administrator de bonis non against whom the decree of the court below was entered did not appear as a party, but the new administrator was mentioned therein as appellant. In 1823, a bill of revivor and supplement was filed in the court below, convening before the court, and seeking to charge, the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non. It turned out, that after the scire facias to revive the appeal had been executed, and before the decree of affirmance, the new administrator had, in the character of administrator de bonis non, brought suits and obtained decrees for the assets garg to grants of administration, although not bearing directly upon the question here, yet seem to illustrate the general principle that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction over the subject is conclusive until it is avoided, or expires by its own limitation; and this although the facts of the particular case were not such as to give the court jurisdiction over that case. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. R. 102."

Grant of Administration—Jurisdiction—Validity of Grant.—It was held in the principal case, in conformity with Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119, that where administration and administrations d. b. n. were granted by a court which, upon the facts, should not have taken jurisdiction, the grants were valid, the orders standing unreversed, and the grants unrevoked. And further that when the grant to the administrator d. b. n. expired by his death, and the estate was unrepresented, it was competent for the court which might in the first instance have rightfully exercised jurisdiction, to make a valid grant; and the sureties in the last administration bond were bound.

Liability of Sureties of Administrator d. b. n.—It was also held in the principal case, that though an administrator de bonis non cannot recover of a former administrator assets converted by him (because they are not unadministered assets, and therefore not within the scope of the commission of the administrator de bonis non), yet if he actually receive them, he and his sureties are accountable therefor. See the principal case cited in Andrews v. Avory, 14 Gratt. 244; Gilmer v. Baker, 24 W. Va. 92; Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 528, 9 S. E. Rep. 938.

of the executor's estate in the hands of the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non, against those representatives respectively, without opposition on their part; and the decrees so obtained were soon after satisfied. Those decrees were in 1820 and 1821, about six years before the decision in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c.,

103 *5 Rand. 51. HELD, 1. (In accordance with Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119.)

that the grants of administration by the court of Orange to the first administrator and the first administrator de bonis non, never having been reversed or revoked, must be considered valid grants, which conferred upon those administrators respectively all the powers of rightful administrators. 2. That when the grant to the first administrator de bonis non expired by his death, and there was no conflicting right in existence, it was competent for the court which might in the first instance, have rightfully exercised jurisdiction, to act on the subject; and Hanover court having acted when there was no such conflicting right, and its grant not having been reversed or revoked, that grant is valid, and the sureties in the administration bond taken by Hanover court are liable thereupon. 3. That as the legatees, after the death of the first administrator, dismissed his representative from the suit, it was lawful for that representative to pay over to the administrator against whom the legatee were proceeding, the unapplied assets of the executor's estate; and such payment, made in good faith and under the sanction of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete protection to such representative against the legatees, as to the money so paid. 4. That the decree in favour of the legatees against the administrator de bonis non was personal, only in respect to the assets in his hands, and (it being nowhere alleged that he had converted or wasted the same) such unapplied assets coming to the hands of his representative must in equity be regarded as unadministered assets of the executor's estate; and the representative of the administrator de bonis non having in good faith, and in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, paid over the said assets to the administrator against whom the legatees revived the appeal, such payment protects the estate of the administrator de bonis non from the claim of the legatees. 5. That for the assets so paid over by the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non, the administrator to whom such payment was made, and the sureties in his official bond, are liable. 6. That the dismissal of the bill as to the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non should be without costs.

It is now fifty years since certain legatees of John Burnley filed a bill in the high court of chancery at Richmond, to recover their legacies from Zachariah Burnley, who took administration upon the estate

104 of John. *A report of the case when it was before this court on a former occasion, will be found, under the name of Burnley's administrator v. Duke and others, in 1 Rand. 108. To that report such addition will be made at this time, as is necessary to understand the questions now discussed.

On the 5th of March 1803, the suit abated by the death of the defendant Zachariah Burnley, and on the motion of the plaintiffs by counsel, a subpoena was awarded to revive it against Hardin Burnley junior his administrator. On the 4th of September 1809, the suit was entered abated as to the defendant Hardin Burnley administrator of Zachariah Burnley, by his death. On the 19th of that month, a scire facias was awarded to revive it against John M. Sheppard as administrator of Hardin Burnley: and on the 10th of September 1810, it was by consent ordered that the suit stand revived against him. But afterwards, to wit, on the 3d of September 1811, an order was entered, whereby,—after setting forth that by a clerical mistake the order of the 19th of September 1809 awarded process to revive against John M. Sheppard administrator of Hardin Burnley deceased, instead of Alexander M. Shepherd administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, and that in the scire facias and the subsequent order the same mistake occurred,—it was ordered that the said writ of scire facias be quashed, and that the orders of the 19th of September 1809 and the 10th of September 1810 be set aside. And on the motion of the plaintiffs by counsel, a writ of scire facias was thereupon awarded to revive the suit against Alexander Shepherd as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley. Subsequently, to wit, on the 12th of February 1813, the following order was entered: "By consent of the parties by their counsel, this suit, which abated as to Hardin Burnley administrator of Zachariah Burnley deceased by his death, stands revived

105 against Alexander *Shepherd administrator de bonis non of the said Zachariah Burnley deceased." Proceedings were then had to obtain an account of Alexander Shepherd's administration of Zachariah Burnley's estate, in the course of which certain orders were entered by consent, and among them the following: "And by the like consent, this cause is not to abate by the death hereafter of any of the parties."

In the meantime John M. Sheppard, as administrator of Hardin Burnley, had made various payments to Alexander Shepherd as administrator of Zachariah Burnley. On the 18th of August 1809, the latter received of the former 604 dollars 77 cents, found in a bag which had been deposited in bank, and was considered to belong to the estate of Zachariah Burnley. A suit was also instituted by the latter against the former, in the superior court of chancery at Richmond, in which, on the 25th of February 1811, it was entered of record that the plaintiff acknowledged to have received on that day, from the defendant, the sum of 2000 dollars; and on the 24th of September 1811, it was likewise entered that the defendant that day paid in court, to the attorney of the plaintiff, 1756 dollars. With these sums Alexander Shepherd was duly charged, in the account returned of his administration on the estate of Zachariah

Burnley; and there appearing due from him on that account 1613 pounds 16 shillings and 8 pence, with interest at 5 per centum on 1384 pounds 13 shillings and 7 pence, part thereof, from the 31st of December 1817, the court of chancery at Fredericksburg, on the 2d of May 1818, decreed that the said "defendant Alexander Shepherd, administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley deceased," pay the same, in part of the legacies due to the plaintiffs who filed the original bill, and others who had been admitted to join with them in the progress of the suit.

106 *Pending the appeal of Alexander

Shepherd from this decree, William D. Taylor was made a party to the case in the court of appeals, in the character of administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley deceased. At the instance of the appellees, a scire facias issued for this purpose the 15th of April 1820, which was executed the 6th of May 1820. And on the 30th of March 1822, when the court of appeals pronounced its decree, the name of Alexander Shepherd did not appear in the caption to the decree as a party, but "William D. Taylor administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley deceased" was mentioned therein as "appellant." By the decree of the court of appeals it was ordered, that the decree of the court of chancery be affirmed, and that the appellant, out of the estate of said Zachariah Burnley in his hands to be administered, pay unto the appellees damages according to law for retarding the execution thereof, and also their costs by them about their defence in the court of appeals expended.

While the case was in the court of appeals, to wit, on the 31st of August 1820, William D. Taylor as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley deceased filed a bill in the county court of Orange against William Shepherd as administrator with the will annexed of Alexander Shepherd, to which bill and answer was at the same time filed; and the cause coming on by consent to be heard, the court on the same day appointed commissioners to state an account between the parties. They made a report, based upon the account previously returned of Alexander Shepherd's administration on the estate of Zachariah Burnley; charging Alexander Shepherd with the same money, and shewing a balance due from him, at the date of the report, of 1882 pounds 8 shillings 11½ pence, of which 1385 pounds 3 shillings 7½ pence was principal money. The report was made the 23d of April 1821; and on the same day, both parties consenting that the court should act upon it,

107 *and neither party excepting to it, the same was approved and confirmed, and the court decreed that the defendant William Shepherd, out of the estate of Alexander Shepherd in his hands, pay to William D. Taylor as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley the said sum of 1882 pounds 8 shillings 11½ pence, with interest on 1385 pounds 3 shillings 7½ pence from the date of the decree, and the costs of suit.

The decree of the court of appeals was entered in the court of chancery at Fredericksburg on the 19th of September 1822. Thereafter the suit was abated as to the defendant Alexander Shepherd by his death, and revived against William Shepherd his administrator. William Shepherd, as such administrator, filed an answer, setting forth the grant of administration de bonis non upon the estate of Zachariah Burnley to William D. Taylor; the abatement in the court of appeals as to Alexander Shepherd, at the suggestion of the appellees; the revival by them in the name of Taylor alone, as the administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, and the absence of any proceeding in the said court against the respondent as the legal representative of Alexander Shepherd: whereby, the respondent insisted, the appellees had released him from all liability under the said decree of the 2d of May 1818, and waived all their rights to come against him for satisfaction thereof. The respondent then set forth the proceedings by, and decree in favour of, William D. Taylor as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley against him as administrator of Alexander Shepherd, and stated that he had paid off that decree to William D. Taylor, and to Robert Taylor esq. his attorney. He insisted that these payments were, under the circumstances, proper and legal; and at all events that the plaintiffs should be compelled to exhaust their remedy against William D. Taylor and his sureties, before the respondent, or the estate of Alexander Shepherd, *should be charged again with the payment of money which had been once fairly and fully paid.

At December rules 1823, the plaintiffs filed a bill of revivor and supplement, reviving the suit as well against William D. Taylor administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, as against William Shepherd administrator of Alexander Shepherd, and praying that the defendants, or some of them, may be decreed to pay the amount of the decree in favour of the legatees. By way of supplements, the bill farther set forth, that besides the money found due from Alexander Shepherd to Zachariah Burnley's estate, there was still a large balance due to the legatees, and the money due from Zachariah Burnley to the estate of John Burnley was more than sufficient to have satisfied that balance: that a considerable estate of the said Zachariah came to his representatives, who ought to have made good, out of the same, any waste of the said Zachariah; or the waste ought to be compensated by the representatives of the said Zachariah, or their sureties: that the administrator of the said Zachariah was Hardin Burnley, who received a large personal estate, and died largely indebted as such administrator: that after the death of Hardin Burnley, John M. Sheppard took administration of the said Hardin's estate; and upon the death of John M. Sheppard, administration de bonis non on Hardin's estate was granted to Henry Pendleton: that considerable assets of the said Hardin have come to the hands of the said Henry Pendleton; and indeed the complainants have understood that a considerable payment was made by Henry Pendleton to William D. Taylor as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley. Henry Pendleton was therefore made a defendant; and William D. Taylor being insolvent, John Darracott and James Madison his sureties were also made defendants. And the bill, besides asking that the proper accounts might be taken, prayed that 109 Darracott and *Madison, as sureties of William D. Taylor, might be decreed to make good such portion of the assets of the said Zachariah that had come to the said William D. Taylor's hands, as he might be delinquent.

It turned out that while the case was in the court of appeals, to wit, on the 14th of June 1821, a decree was obtained in the superior court of chancery at Richmond, by William D. Taylor as administrator of the estate of Zachariah Burnley unadministered by Alexander Shepherd, against Henry Pendleton as administrator de bonis non of Hardin Burnley. The entry of the decree set forth, that, the plaintiff admitting that Alexander Shepherd, the former administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, received of John M. Sheppard, the administrator of Hardin Burnley, 600 pounds on the 23d of February 1811, and 526 pounds 10 shillings on the 24th of September in the same year, in part of the balance appearing by the report of a commissioner in the cause to be due from the estate of Hardin to the estate of Zachariah Burnley, the court, approving the said report, and allowing credit for those sums as paid at those dates, decreed that the defendant Henry Pendleton, as administrator de bonis non of Hardin Burnley, pay to the plaintiff 1268 pounds 7 shillings 4 pence (that being the balance due after allowing the said credits), with interest from the 24th of September 1811 till paid, and the costs of suit. Pendleton paid to Taylor, in part of this decree, 488 pounds 8 shillings on the 5th of January 1822, and on the 21st of February 1822 he paid the balance, then amounting to 1594 pounds 1 shilling 11 pence.

The payments to William D. Taylor, and his insolvency, now gave rise to questions of difficulty. The cause being revived against the administrators of Henry Pendleton, they filed an answer relying upon the validity of the payments made by him, in like manner as William Shepherd had relied upon his payments 110 *as administrator of Alexander Shepherd. On the other hand, the sureties of William D. Taylor (or rather Madison one of them) sought to be exonerated from all liability for the money which he had received.

A copy of the order granting administration to William D. Taylor was filed. It was as follows:

"In Hanover county court, January 26, 1820. In the motion of William D. Taylor, a certificate is granted him for obtaining letters of administration of the estate of Zachariah Burnley deceased, he having taken the oath of an administrator, and with James Madison and John Darracott his sureties entered into and acknowledged a bond according to law, which bond is ordered to be recorded."

A copy of the bond was filed also. It was in the penalty of 15,000 dollars.

Madison, in his answer, stated, that he was informed and believed that Zachariah Burnley lived and died in the county of Orange, seized and possessed of a considerable estate, both real and personal, in the said county, and he had no knowledge of his possession estate in any other county: that administration upon his estate was duly and legally granted by the county court of Orange to Hardin Burnley: that upon the death of Hardin Burnley, administration de bonis non was duly and legally granted by the same court to Alexander Shepherd: and that upon the death of Shepherd, the grant was made to Taylor by the county court of Hanover. And the respondent insisted, that the court of Hanover had no right or jurisdiction whatever to grant such administration to Taylor; that the said grant, and the bond taken of Taylor and his sureties, were void; and that the sureties could not be charged by virtue thereof.

Pendleton's administrators, in their answer, said, that the grant of administration to Taylor was made by a court possessing power to grant administrations upon 111 *the estates of dead persons; that in the grant of the said administration, their said testator had no agency; and that when the same was made, and even when he paid Taylor, he had no information (they believed) which could induce him to entertain a doubt as to the propriety of the grant. They had understood (they said) that Zachariah Burnley, for some time before his death, had no fixed place of abode, but resided sometimes in the county of Hanover and sometimes in the county of Orange, and that he actually died in Hanover.

Depositions were taken, and exhibits filed, relative to the matters of fact upon which depended the regularity of the grant of administration on the estate of Zachariah Burnley by the county court of Hanover. But the ground on which the opinion of this court rests, renders it unnecessary to state the purport of the evidence.

As to Taylor and Darracott the bill was taken for confessed. Upon the death of William Shepherd, the cause was revived both against his executors, and against the administrator de bonis non of Alexander Shepherd. And when Henry Pendleton died, the cause, besides being revived against his administrators, was revived first against John T. Swann, and afterwards against John H. Steger, as administrators de bonis non of Hardin Burnley.

Steger, in his answer, insisted upon the validity of the payments made by the previous administrators of Hardin Burnley, and stated also that no assets had come to his hands. Madison dying, there was a revival against Lawrence Battaile sheriff of Caroline county, to whom the estate of Madison was committed.

On the 19th of October 1830, the court of chancery at Fredericksburg made a decree, directing an account of the administration upon the estate of William Shepherd, and an account of his administration upon the estate of Alexander Shepherd, (in taking which last account, *the commissioner was directed to consider the payments made by William Shepherd to William D. Taylor as improper and of no avail, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned,) and directing also the administrator de bonis non of Alexander Shepherd to render an account of his administration, and the administrators of Henry Pendleton to render an account of theirs.

Afterwards the cause was removed to the circuit court of Essex, and came on to be heard before that court the 9th of October 1832, upon the report of the commissioner, which shewed that sufficient assets of William Shepherd's estate came to the hands of his executors to satisfy the plaintiffs' demand. Whereupon the court decreed that the executors of William Shepherd pay to the plaintiffs the sums decreed against Alexander Shepherd on the 2d of May 1818, subject to a credit for certain sums which, pending the suit, had been obtained by means of an injunction restraining Robert Taylor from paying over funds received by him as attorney for William D. Taylor. And the report further shewing that the administrators of Henry Pendleton had received of his estate more than enough to pay the balance due the plaintiffs on account of their legacies, after deducting what had been decreed against Alexander Shepherd, the court decreed payment by Henry Pendleton's administrators of the said balance. The court further decreed that William Shepherd's executors and Henry Pendleton's administrators pay to the plaintiffs their costs; that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed as to Darracott and Madison's administrator; and that the plaintiffs pay to those defendants their costs. And liberty was reserved to William Shepherd's executors to apply to the court for a decree against Taylor.

On the petition of William Shepherd's executors and Henry Pendleton's administrators, an appeal was allowed.

113 *Patton for appellants. On what ground can the sureties of Taylor, who have become bound for the money received by him as administrator, be exonerated? Does it lie in their mouths to say that the administration ought not to have been granted, and that Taylor, who has recovered and received the money, ought not to have recovered and received it? Can any thing be more universally true, than that when an administrator has asserted a right in that character, and recovered money as such, he must account for that money as assets, to creditors or legatees of the deceased? Upon the principle of res adjudicata, creditors and legatees would be conclusively bound by a judgment against an administrator for a claim asserted against him, and they are as conclusively entitled to the benefit of a recovery of assets by him. Let it be conceded that the county court of Hanover was not the proper court to grant administration; still that is not material. For that court, having a general jurisdiction to grant administration, has also authority to determine whether the facts are such as make it proper that administration should be granted; and the correctness of its determination cannot be enquired into in this collateral way. This is settled by the decision in Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119. The decision is, that although the grant of administration ought not to have been made, yet until revoked on appeal or citation, it confers all the rights resulting from a regular administration. Perhaps, however, it may be attempted to liken this case to the one upon which there was a difference of opinion among the judges in Fisher v. Bassett. It was a question there, supposing a grant of administration to be irregularly made and therefore voidable, what would be the effect of a subsequent grant by that court which would have had jurisdiction if the first grant had not been made. On this question, if it were involved here, perhaps nothing at all material could be added to what 114 *was said by judge Tucker. But the question is not involved in this case.

Upon the death of Alexander Shepherd, the administration was vacant, and it was not in the power of the court which granted the administration to him, to act upon it by citation or otherwise. The administration being vacant, a grant by any court of general jurisdiction must be valid. The opinion of judge Parker, differing from that of judge Tucker on the question just adverted to, rested chiefly on Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch 1, in which the subsequent grant was considered a nullity because there was an administrator in full life. The court there likened the case to the grant of administration on the estate of a living man. But here it would be necessary to go a great way farther, to hold the subsequent grant a nullity. The position would have to be maintained, that an administration irregularly granted is, after the death of the person to whom the irregular grant was made, sufficient to prevent a grant by the court which would have had jurisdiction but for the previous grant.

But passing from the question as to the validity of the grant of administration to Taylor, the payments to him were under regular decrees, which are conclusively binding unless impeached for fraud or collusion. Payment of money to an executor is valid, though he was acting under probat of a forged will. Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125. Here the court is called upon to compel parties to pay money which they have once paid under the sanction of a court of competent jurisdiction. For the county court of Orange and the court of chancery at Richmond clearly had jurisdiction to act upon the bills presented to them, and to decree payment. It may be said, that what those courts did was in conflict with the law, as now settled in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 51. It would be curious to apply the doctrine of that case to this, in which every dollar decreed against

Shepherd was recovered by him
115 *as administrator de bonis non, from a previous administrator. If Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c. settles the law against us, it equally settles it for us. But the court never meant to settle, in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c. that if an administrator de bonis non received assets from a predecessor in the administration, he and his sureties would not be liable. 5 Rand. 92, 3, opinion of Green, J. It may be said, that here the legatees had asserted their claim against Alexander Shepherd, and therefore his estate ought to be held liable to them. But the answer is, that so soon as he died, the legatees ceased their pursuit against him. They not only abandoned all claim against his representatives, but carried it on against Taylor. Not only by the consent of the appellees but by the decree of this court, Taylor is the party against whom their rights are to be asserted. Let it be admitted that it was a mistake, an oversight,—that it would be a hardship to deprive the legatees of what they are entitled to; would not the hardship be much greater if Shepherd's representatives were made to bear the loss? The case is analogous to that of a party standing by and seeing another purchase without making known his claim. Here the legatees have been active in inducing Shepherd's representatives to part with their money. So too as to Henry Pendleton's representatives. If Pendleton was chargeable, it was a representative of Hardin Burnley. And by the order of the 3d of September 1811, Hardin Burnley's representatives were discharged from all claim.

Harrison for the legatees. When this case was formerly in this court, there was no occasion to revive the appeal against the representative of Zachariah Burnley. Though the decree against Alexander Shepherd was by the name of administrator de bonis non, this was mere descriptio personæ; the decree was personal against 116 him. *The question then is, whether an erroneous proceeding by counsel in this court, in reviving against Taylor, can amount to a release of Shepherd from the decree? That decree was surely binding on the estate of Shepherd in the hands of his administrator. But it is said, the affirmance by this court was after the death of Shepherd, without any revival of the appeal against his representative. It is a complete answer to this objection, that it had been agreed the suit should not abate by the death of either party. Such an agreement has been held to be binding. Garlington v. Clutton, 1 Call 520. But suppose there was error in the mode of proceeding in this court, was its decree a mere nullity? It is the business of the appellant to prosecute his appeal with effect; and upon the death of Alexander Shepherd, if his administrator wished to get rid of that decree, and a revival was necessary, it was his business to revive. If the decree of this court was a nullity, still the decree of the court below remains in full force. But both are valid, and the assets of Alexander Shepherd bound. Even if there had been any erroneous proceedings, it was proper to file a supplemental bill to get rid of such erroneous proceedings, and obtain the benefit of the decree. This has been done, and the proceedings on the supplemental bill are regular.

Taylor had only a right to recover the unadministered assets. Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 51. There is nothing to shew that there were any assets unadministered, but abundant proof to shew that what he did recover was administered assets. The decree in favour of the legatees was itself an administration of the assets. They were then the property of Alexander Shepherd. And if his administrator afterwards assented to a decree in favour of Taylor, it was an assent to give up so much of Shepherd's individual property. At all events, this assent could not 117 affect the interests of the plaintiffs, who had a personal *decree against Shepherd. As it regards the plaintiffs, who were no parties to Taylor's suit, the whole proceedings in it were nullities. They have a right to pursue the assets of Shepherd until their claim is satisfied. And it is right it should be so. Taylor never could have recovered these assets, if Shepherd's administrator had made that defence which was in his power. He had only to reply the fact that a personal decree had been rendered against his decedent. Had that fact been stated, the county court of Orange would never have decreed against him.

In the case Ex parte Lyons, 2 Leigh 761, it was settled unanimously by the general court, that no court could grant administration de bonis non except the court which originally granted administration. And there is nothing in Fisher v. Bassett in conflict with this doctrine. Here, jurisdiction having been properly exercised in Orange, the court of Hanover had no jurisdiction to grant administration de bonis non, and its grant is not voidable, but void. It is questionable, to say the least, whether the sureties of Taylor are liable. At all events the plaintiffs are under no necessity to look to them first.

Lyons for Pendleton's administrators. The general court and the court of appeals have come to the same conclusion as it regards this cause. Neither has maintained that if administration be granted one day by an improper court, and the administrator dies the next, the proper court cannot then grant administration. The language of the decision in Ex parte Lyons, 2 Leigh 761, shews that the general court thought there must be a valid grant of administration by one court, to prevent another from granting administration de bonis non. And in Fisher v. Bassett, it was not considered by any of the judges that the exercise of jurisdiction by the improper court would prevent the exercise of it *by the proper court: the only difference of opinion between the judges was as to what should be done to restore the jurisdiction of the latter. There certainly was no difference of opinion on the proposition, that if Scott had then been dead, the grant of administration by the general court would have been valid.

Taylor for Darracott and Madison's administrator. If the court of Orange had jurisdiction to grant administration, the grant by the court of Hanover must, in the nature of things, be void. It would be extraordinary if, after a valid grant by one court, there could be a new grant by another court, because part of the estate remains unadministered. Originally the administrator was the bailiff of the ordinary, his mere agent to do what the ordinary might do in person; and there might be grant after grant, on the principle that an agency may be revoked and a new agent appointed. In the reign of Henry 8, the power of the ordinary in this respect was restrained; and in England since that time, there is no power, after one grant is made, to make another. So it is here. No instance is adduced in which it has been held, either in England or this country, that after a grant by one court or jurisdiction, administration de bonis non may be granted by another. No effort is known to have been made to obtain such a grant of administration de bonis non, except in Ex parte Lyons; and the application there was unanimously rejected. Such a grant must be extremely inconvenient, and there is no authority for it in the act of assembly, or any where else. Upon the death of the first administrator, the power results—leaps back to the hand that granted it; which may thereupon grant administration of the goods remaining unadministered. 1 Wms. on Ex'ors 292. The power, once rightfully exercised, results not to any and every authority which might originally have made the grant, but to that from which the *original grant proceeded.

It is said that the grant, being by a court of competent jurisdiction, must be valid. This takes for granted that Hanover court had jurisdiction. Let it be conceded that to some purposes every county and corporation court has jurisdiction in cases of probat and administration; yet a county or corporation court cannot have greater jurisdiction in such a case than the general court would have had. And the general court has said that it has none. Here, it is true, the grant is in the form of an original grant. But if it would not have been valid in the form of a grant de bonis non, it cannot be valid in a different form. The error in the form of the grant, cannot make that valid, which, if the record had spoken truly, would have had upon its face a death warrant. It is said also, that the question in this case has been decided in Fisher v. Bassett. But that is not so. For there the question as to the effect of the grant of the general court was not necessary to be decided. That case is certainly no authority to uphold the jurisdiction of the county court of Hanover; no authority to shew that after a grant by one court of original jurisdiction, which was valid, a grant by another of administration de bonis non is valid also.

Stanard for Shepherd's representatives. Is it competent for the sureties of William D. Taylor, in the face of their own bond, to question the authority conferred upon him, any more than he himself could question it? If they are entitled to make the objection in any form, are they entitled to make it in this form,—in a collateral proceeding? It is said that the grant to Taylor is void, and that all proceedings by him under it are null. On what ground is this to be maintained? Suppose the grant, on its face, had been of administration de bonis non: if the decision in Fisher v. Bassett ascertains any thing, it is that such a grant would have been voidable, 120 *not void. For the question as to jurisdiction to grant administration de bonis non, is not materially different from the question as to jurisdiction to grant original administration. In either case, if there is a subsisting valid grant by one court, there cannot regularly be a grant by another. And in each it must be shewn that there was a subsisting valid grant, to make the subsequent grant invalid. The only point on which the judges differed in Fisher v. Bassett was, as to the manner in which the authority may be revoked while there is a subsisting administrator. If the case was here presented of a grant to Taylor while the administrator to whom Orange court made the grant was alive, it would be the question upon which judges Tucker and Parker differed. But this is not the case. Here there was no party to summon, no party to cite. [Taylor. Upon the supposition that this was an application to Hanover court to grant administration de bonis non, the propriety of the grant by that court would depend upon the question whether Hanover court had itself made a previous grant.] Stanard. Still it would depend upon the question whether the previous grant was valid. [Allen, J. I understand mr. Taylor to contend that the grant of administration de bonis non is of itself a recognition of the validity of the previous grant.] Stanard. But in this case there was an application by Taylor for, and a grant to him of, original administration. And the question is, whether the grant is void. Suppose it had been made to appear at the time of Taylor's application, that Zachariah Burnley resided in Hanover, where he died, and that Hardin Burnley had by mistake procured a grant of administration from Orange court; might not the court of Hanover have made the grant? Could any other course have been pursued when the first grant had terminated by death? Surely it could not be necessary or proper to go to the court which had usurped jurisdiction. In 121 Lyons's case, *if the general court had been of opinion that the original grant was not valid, it would not have refused to make a new grant. If the mere circumstance that the judgment has not been in form revoked is a reason why no other court can grant administration, then the jurisdiction of every other court is ousted. For there is no mode of revoking the first administration, when the administrator is dead. [Allen, J. Suppose a grant by an improper court to one who dies, and then a grant by a proper court, after which administration de bonis non is granted by the court which first granted administration.] Stanard. Then the last grant, being made when there were rights subsisting under the grant by the proper court, would be void.

Supposing the grant to Taylor to be valid, he, qualifying as a full administrator, might recover any assets in the hands of the representative of a former administrator. There is no limitation upon his powers, except when he attempts to recover back what may have been appropriated by a former administrator in payment of debts. Taylor therefore had clear authority to receive from Shepherd, and his sureties must be bound. In this point of view, the question in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c. does not arise. But suppose Taylor had only authority to receive unadministered assets, are not the sureties bound for assets which he has received? They were claimed by Taylor as unadministered assets, and recovered by him as such. Does it lie in the mouth of Taylor, or in the mouths of his sureties, to say that these were not unadministered assets, against the admission on the record? If, when an administrator recovers a debt, his sureties cannot go into evidence to shew that it ought not to have been recovered, neither can the sureties in this case go into evidence to shew that this money ought not to have been recovered.

Shepherd's representatives ought in no event to be compelled to pay over a 122 second time the money they *have already paid to Taylor. Suppose there had been no decree against Alexander Shepherd, but he had denied pending the suit, and the plaintiffs had discontinued their suit as to his representatives and revived it against Taylor, and in that state of things Taylor had sued Shepherd's representatives and recovered the assets of Zachariah Burnley's estate; could Shepherd's estate be held liable to pay that money over to the plaintiffs? Surely not. The opinion intimated by judge Green in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 92, 3, so far as it goes, is against such liability. And Hefferman's adm'r &c. v. Grymes's adm'r &c., 2 Leigh 512, shews, that though a legal conversion of assets by the first administrator has taken place, a court of equity will still look at the real nature of the case, and hold the administrator de bonis non entitled to receive such assets, if there was no intent on the part of the first administrator to apply them to his own use. It has been argued that the decree against Alexander Shepherd, being personal, discharged the estate of Zachariah Burnley, and substituted a mere demand against Alexander Shepherd's estate. Suppose that after Shepherd's administrator had paid over to Taylor, the estate and representatives of Shepherd had become insolvent; will it be contended that the legatees would in such case have had no right to look to the estate of Zachariah Burnley in the hands of Taylor? But here the plaintiffs themselves, by their conduct in the suit, have been the cause, and the sole cause, of Shepherd's representatives parting with the money to Taylor. If the plaintiffs had revived their appeal against Shepherd's representatives, and prosecuted the claim against them, instead of discontinuing the pursuit of that estate, and leading the representatives to believe that they were discharged of accountability to the legatees, and accountable only to the administrator de bonis non, it is not to be conceived that 123 the payment would ever have been made to that administrator. *And now, after the acts of the plaintiffs have encouraged and the representatives of Shepherd to part with the assets in their hands to Taylor, it would be utterly at variance with every principle of equity to hold them liable. Let it be admitted that the discontinuance as to Shepherd's representatives was the result of an erroneous opinion respecting the law, still the estate of Shepherd ought not to suffer for a mistake committed by the plaintiffs in the management of their own suit.

Leigh for the legatees. If the decree of May 1818 had been acquiesced in, the plaintiffs might, and no doubt would, have commenced proceedings against Hardin Burnley's administrator, to recover the balance of their legacies after crediting what was decreed against Alexander Shepherd; and they were entitled to recover, if assets enough came to Hardin Burnley's hands to pay the balance. But Alexander Shepherd immediately appealed from the decree, and as the appeal brought up the question as to the extent of liability of Zachariah Burnley's estate, and so put in suspense the claim of the plaintiffs to recover the balance, they could not, in this state of things, proceed with effect against Hardin Burnley's estate. Pending the appeal, Alexander Shepherd died; but so far as the decree affected him personally, the appeal did not abate. This is shewn by the case of Garlington v. Clutton, cited by Mr. Harrison; Shepherd having agreed that no abatement should take place. In consequence of this agreement, his representatives were bound to take the same notice of the appeal as if process of scire facias had regularly issued against them to revive it.

If Zachariah Burnley received assets enough of John Burnley's estate to pay the legacies given by John, he became a debtor to the legatees. If Hardin Burnley received estate to *pay the debt of Zachariah Burnley to the legatees, Hardin Burnley was their debtor for the legacies, and the debt was of the first dignity against his intestate's estate. If Hardin Burnley's representatives, or any of them in succession, received assets enough of Hardin Burnley's estate to pay the legacies, they each in succession became debtor to the legatees, and the debt was of the first dignity against Hardin Burnley's estate.

And if Alexander Shepherd, as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, received assets of Zachariah Burnley's estate, he became a debtor to the legatees to the extent of those assets. These propositions are unquestionably correct; and it is just as unquestionable that Alexander Shepherd, as such administrator de bonis non, did receive assets, and that Henry Pendleton, as administrator de bonis non of Hardin Burnley, received abundant assets. Nor is it any objection to the proposition, that they suppose Hardin Burnley was administrator of Zachariah Burnley, and Alexander Shepherd administrator de bonis non. If it could now be shewn that administration was irregularly granted on Zachariah Burnley's estate, first to Hardin Burnley and afterwards to Alexander Shepherd, this would be of no avail to the representatives of Shepherd, because there was a decree against him which has been affirmed, and even if that decree were erroneous, his representative cannot be permitted now to question it. Nor would it avail the representatives of Pendleton; because Hardin Burnley had received assets of Zachariah Burnley's estate, converted them, and become a debtor to the legatees; and though the grant of administration to Hardin Burnley were void, though he were regarded as an executor in his own wrong, yet he would be liable to the legatees in the same manner as a rightful executor, his executor or administrator would be chargeable in the same manner as he might have been, (1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 104, § 66, p. 390,) and the debt due from him would, *by force of the statute of Virginia, be a debt of the first dignity. Sherman v. Christian and others, 6 Rand. 49. But in truth there is no reason to doubt the jurisdiction of the court of Orange—no ground to say that its grants were irregular. And though they had been irregular, they would not have been void, but voidable only upon appeal or citation. Seeing then that Alexander Shepherd and

Henry Pendleton owed the legatees these debts, the question is whether our debtors without our knowledge or consent, by means of a decree in a proceeding to which we are no parties or privies, can shift the debt they owe us from themselves to another person, and either deprive us of all recourse against them, or compel us, in spite of ourselves, to resort to that other person in the first instance.

If Taylor was not administrator—if the grant to him was merely void, it is the same thing as if Shepherd's administrator and Pendleton had paid to any third person without pretence of right. It is said that Taylor was full administrator. There was, it is true, a blunder in the form of the grant; but they were not deceived by it. Taylor claimed as administrator de bonis non; and there were previous administrations, so that he could only be administrator de bonis non. But take it that the grant to Taylor was only voidable, not void, or even that he was a rightful administrator, and let us see whether this will affect the liabilities of the parties.

I. As to the payment by William Shepherd administrator of Alexander Shepherd to Taylor, of money which had been decreed to us. Is it possible that he could rightfully pay money, actually decreed to us against his decedent, to any body else, so as to exempt himself from liability to us? It is objected that the appellees have affirmed the propriety of his payment to Taylor, for they claim money which Alexander Shepherd as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley had received *of John M. Sheppard the representative of the previous administrator. The money which Alexander Shepherd received was assets of Zachariah Burnley's estate in his hands, no matter how he got it. We had the right to claim it of him, or, if he failed to pay, then of John M. Sheppard. Where A. owes a debt to B. and pays it to C., B. may sue A. for the debt, or may sue C. for money had and received. If the proceeding be in equity, and both parties before the court, the court may decree against A. the original debtor, and give him a decree over against C.; or, if there be no doubt of the solvency of C., may decree directly against him. It is farther objected that William Shepherd was decreed to pay the money by the court of Orange. But what was the character of that decree? We were not parties to it; and William Shepherd knew that the money had been decreed to us. He was bound to know the fact, and that we claimed against him,—bound to know all the circumstances. Yet, it is said, he acted in good faith and without collusion. He did not act without favouritism. Taylor had in equity no pretext of right to recover this money, but on the ground that it was necessary for debts. There was no debt but that due to us. Yet our claim was resisted, and the money paid to Taylor, that he might get a commission on the amount, or for some other reason equally insufficient.

II. As to the payment by Henry Pendleton. He also consented to a decree in favour of Taylor, with knowledge of our claim to the money, and of there being no other debt against Zachariah Burnley's estate. He paid to Taylor, in order that Taylor might account to us. He had no right to practice this favouritism; no right to give Taylor a commission. And his representatives are not entitled to exemption from liability by any thing in judge Green's opinion in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 92, 3. All that a suit could do would be to give notice of the claim.

127 And if Pendleton knew of the claim, he is as little entitled to the benefit of the exception as if there had been a suit.

We insist then, upon the authority of Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c. that notwithstanding the payments to Taylor, and even though he were a rightful administrator, the representatives both of Pendleton and Shepherd remain liable to the legatees.

C. Johnson in reply. It is contended that the grant of administration to Taylor was void, because granted by the county court of Hanover, when the prior grants of administration were by the county court of Orange; and Ex parte Lyons, 2 Leigh 761, is relied upon. That case merely decides that the court which granted the original administration is the proper court to which the application should be made for administration de bonis non. It does not decide that a grant de bonis non, when the administration is vacant, is a nullity if made by a court different from that which granted the first administration. Suppose that the general court had in fact granted the administration asked for in the case Ex parte Lyons; had judged erroneously as to its own jurisdiction: could it be pretended that such grant by the general court would be void, and the sureties of the grantee not bound for his due administration? The case of Fisher v. Bassett and others settles the law of the subject, and it would be supererogatory to argue in support of that decision, especially as the present court is composed of only the same number of judges that sat in that case. It is referred to and commented upon in 3 Rob. Pract. 423-28, and from what is there said, as well as from the recollection of those who took part in the case, we know it was elaborately discussed and maturely considered. Regarding Fisher v. Bassett and others as authority, we need only enquire what is established by it. It proves that the grants by the county court of Orange to Hardin

Burnley and Alexander Shepherd
128 *were valid grants, until avoided in a regular way on appeal or citation.

These grants were never avoided, but they ceased by the death of the grantees. And when the county court of Hanover was applied to by Taylor for letters of administration, that court was called upon to consider and decide whether the facts were such as to found its jurisdiction to make the grant; and in granting the letters, it did decide (as Mr. Stanard has strongly and clearly shewn) that very question. The judgment of Hanover court is precisely within the reason and principle of Fisher v. Bassett and others, and even if capable of being avoided, is valid until so avoided. If the grant by Hanover court had been in terms a grant of administration de bonis non, it would still not have been void; for a grant of administration de bonis non never shews on its face when or where the former grant was made, and the inference from every grant de bonis non is regularly that the former administration was granted by the same court. The only form of a grant of administration de bonis non which could with any plausibility be regarded as a nullity, would be one shewing on its face that a different court had granted the first administration. But that is not shewn on the face of the grant to Taylor by the court of Hanover, nor does the grant even profess to be a grant of administration de bonis non. Even if it were conceded that the grant of administration to Taylor was by a court which had not jurisdiction, it would by no means follow that his sureties are not bound for his due administration of the assets. Such consequences would result from holding that sureties for an administration are discharged by a defect of jurisdiction in the court which makes the grant, that it would seem better to apply the doctrine of estoppel, and hold them precluded from denying that the party for whom they are bound was administrator. If in this case the sureties of Taylor cannot 129 deny that he was administrator, they cannot be heard to deny that the money which he received as administrator was assets of Zachariah Burnley's estate.

Upon the question whether the payments by William Shepherd as administrator of Alexander Shepherd, and by Henry Pendleton as administrator of Hardin Burnley, were valid payments as against the legatees, Johnson sustained and enforced the views presented by Patton and Stanard.

ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, that as the court of Orange county had general jurisdiction to grant administration when a proper state of facts existed; whether the court erred or not, in determining that the facts were proved upon which the power to grant administration in the particular case depended, is not to be enquired into collaterally. Until such orders or grants were reversed or revoked, they conferred on the grantees all the powers of rightful administrators. The court is further of opinion, that when the grants expired by the death of the grantees, and the estate was unrepresented, it became the duty of some court to appoint an administrator: that if the first appointment had been made by a court having no jurisdiction, such appointment did not oust the jurisdiction the proper court; but that when the first appointment had been revoked or the order reversed, or when the grant expired by the death of the grantee, and there was no conflicting right in existence, it was competent for the court which in the first instance might have rightfully exercised jurisdiction, to grant administration. Whether the particular state of facts existed which would have authorized such court to grant administration originally, was a matter to be enquired into and decided by the court; and the decision, if erroneous, would be 130 voidable only, *and not void. The court is therefore of opinion that the grant of administration made by the court of Hanover to William D. Taylor on the estate of Zachariah Burnley, when there was no conflicting administration in existence, and which has not been reversed or revoked, is to be held valid, and the said William D. Taylor and the sureties in his official bond are responsible for his acts.

The court is further of opinion that where, as in this case, the administrator sues for and recovers money, debts or effects as the assets of the estate, he must account for them; and his sureties, who have covenanted for his faithful administration of them, are liable if he fails so to account. The court is therefore of opinion that the said administrator Taylor and his sureties were liable to the appellees, for the assets received of the representative of Hardin Burnley's estate and the representative of Alexander Shepherd's estate.

The court is further of opinion that as the administrator de bonis non cannot compel the representative of a former administrator to account for the converted assets, it would have been competent for the appellees, if the assets of Zachariah Burnley had been converted by his first administrator Hardin Burnley, to proceed against his representative for satisfaction. But as the appellees did not proceed against such representative, but, after the death of said Hardin Burnley, dismissed his representative from the suit, and revived the same against the administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, it was lawful and proper for the representative of Hardin to transfer and pay over to the representative of Zachariah Burnley for the time being, against whom the appellees were proceeding, the unapplied assets of Zachariah Burnley; and that such payment, made (as in the present case) in good faith and under the sanction of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete protection to 131 the *representatives of Hardin Burnley's estate for all sum so paid over to Alexander Shepherd and William D. Taylor, the succeeding administrators of Zachariah Burnley.

The court is further of opinion, that as the matter in controversy in the original cause was as to the extent of liability of the estate of Zachariah Burnley on account of the assets of John Burnley received by him, it would not have been proper for the representative of Alexander Shepherd, who held in his hands the admitted unapplied assets which his intestate had received from Hardin Burnley's representative, to pay over those assets to the appellees until the appeal had been disposed of; as, if the decree had been reversed, he would in that event have been responsible to the proper distributees of Zachariah Burnley for the amount. The court is further of opinion that though the appellees had obtained a decree against said Alexander Shepherd as administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, such decree was personal, only in respect to the assets admitted to be in his hands, and which it was nowhere alleged that he had converted or wasted. That when such unapplied assets came to the hands of his administrator, however the rule might be at law, in equity they should be treated as the unadministered assets of Zachariah Burnley: and that when the administrator of Alexander Shepherd, in pursuance of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, paid over and transferred to the representative of the said Zachariah Burnley such assets, such payment, if made in good faith, should protect the estate of Alexander Shepherd from the claim of the appellees. That in this case no collusion or bad faith is imputed or proved; but on the contrary, the course of the appellees throughout indicated to all concerned, that they looked to the representative of Zachariah Burnley for the time being, and to him alone, for satisfaction of their claim. They 132 *had instituted their suit against Zachariah Burnley: on his death, they revived it against Hardin Burnley his administrator: on his death, they dismissed the representative of Hardin Burnley from the cause, and revived it against Alexander Shepherd administrator de bonis non of Zachariah Burnley, who thereupon proceeded to collect from the representative of Hardin Burnley the assets of Zachariah Burnley: and on the death Alexander Shepherd, they revived against William D. Taylor administrator of Zachariah Burnley, who proceeded to collect the assets from his predecessors in the administration. Under such circumstances it would be against equity to compel the representatives of Alexander Shepherd again to pay the amount.

The court is therefore of opinion that the bill should have been dismissed as to the representatives of Alexander Shepherd, but without costs. That the bill should have been dismissed as to the representatives of Hardin Burnley, but without costs, unless the appellees had desired an account of the administration of Hardin Burnley on Zachariah Burnley's estate, for the purpose of shewing that a greater amount of assets of the said Zachariah Burnley had come to the hands of Hardin Burnley, than had been paid over to the said Alexander Shepherd and William D. Taylor, his successors in the administration on Zachariah Burnley's estate: and that the appellees are still entitled to such an account, if desired. That a decree should have been rendered against William D. Taylor and his sureties in the administration bond, or their representatives, for the amount of assets received by said Taylor of Alexander Shepherd's representative and Hardin Burnley's representative, together with any other assets of Zachariah Burnley which came to the hands of Taylor: and that leave should have been given the appellees to amend their bill, and make any other person or persons *parties, who may have improperly received from said Taylor the assets of said Zachariah Burnley's estate.

It is therefore considered that the said decree be in all things reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, to revive and make the proper parties, and to be proceeded in according to the principle of this decree.

*Note by the reporter. Since the payments were made, the validity of which was discussed in this case, an act of assembly has been passed to authorize an administrator de bonis non to receive assets from the executor or administrator of a prior executor or administrator. The date of the act is the 6th of April 1839, and it will be found in the session acts of that year, p. 44, ch. 70.

(Absent CABELL, P., and STANARD,* J.)

Deeds of Trust—To Secure Creditors—Conversion*—

Contribution after Death of Grantor between Realty and Personalty—Case at Bar.—In 1810 a deed of trust was made, whereby it was witnessed, that for the purpose of securing to the grantor's creditors their debts, and to make provision for the support, education and future settlement of his children, he conveyed his whole estate in trust for the payment of his debts, and for that purpose the trustees were empowered to sell from time to time such parts of the premises as to them might seem fit, or authorized to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, in such manner as might by them be deemed most beneficial and advantageous to all the parties interested; and out of the rents and profits, they were to support the grantor and his wife, and their family, during the joint lives of the grantor and his wife, and the survivor of them during the life of the survivor; and then the estate was in trust for such children of the grantor as he might leave at his death. After making this deed, the grantor died the same year (1810), leaving a widow, and three children by her. In 1811, the acting trustee sold a portion of the real property, and the proceeds were *applied towards the discharge of the debts. In 1814 one of the children died, whereby her interest in remainder in the whole estate passed to her mother and the two other children. In 1815 another child died, whereby his like interest (embracing that acquired through the child that had first died) passed to his mother and the surviving child. And in 1816 the widow died, whereby the interests in the remainder which she had so acquired, passed, as to the realty, to her surviving child, and as to the personalty, to her second husband, who survived her and became her administrator. At the period of the widow's death, part of the real and part of the personal estate conveyed was undisposed of by the trustee; and thereafter he disposed of part of each to satisfy debts. Held, 1. the conversion in 1811, of part of the realty into personalty, being within the authority and discretion of the trustee, and made at a time when there was no conflict, but an identity of interest, amongst those entitled to the estate, cannot, by reason of circumstances thereafter arising, furnish any equity for a reimbursement of the realty out of the personalty, or for contribution in favour of the former against the latter. 2. That though, upon the widow's death, the succession to the real fell into a different channel from the personal property, yet as the authority and discretion of the trustee in regard to sales of the property, whether real or personal, continued as before, no equity could arise between the realty and personalty for reimbursement of one to the other, neither being primarily, but the whole estate indiscriminately, subjected to payment of the debts by the provisions of the trust deed; which, and not the principles governing the administration of decedents' estates, must give the rule upon the subject. But 3. that an equity of a different nature did, however, arise out of the provisions of the trust deed, so soon as the succession to the realty and the personalty so fell into different channels; and it was simply this, that the owners of the realty and personalty should contribute to the burthen of paying the debts remaining unsatisfied at the widow's death, in proportion to the value of their respective interests: and the exercise by the trustee of the authority and discretion vested in him, should not have the effect of disturbing the due apportionment of that burthen amongst those several interests.

Ralph Wormley the first died in 1806, having by his will devised and bequeathed a large real and personal estate to his son Ralph, subject however to the payment of debts.

On the 8th of August 1810, the testator's son Ralph (who will be called hereafter Ralph the *second) made a deed of trust to John Tayloe and John T. Lomax, whereby it was witnessed, "that for the purpose of better securing to the creditors of the said Ralph Wormley the payment of their just debts, and at the same time to make adequate provision for the support, maintenance, education and future settlement of the children of the said Ralph," and for the consideration of five dollars paid to him by Taylor and Lomax, he conveyed to them the estate so devised and bequeathed to him as aforesaid, "and all property, estate, rights, credits, goods and chattels whatsoever, and wheresoever being, of him the said Ralph," upon the following trusts, that is to say, "in trust for the payment of just and lawful debts of the said Ralph; and for that purpose the said John Tayloe and John Tayloe

*He had been counsel for the appellants.

†See monographic note on "Conversion and Reconversion" appended to Vaughan v. Jones, 23 Gratt. 44.

Lomax are fully authorized and empowered to sell, from time to time, such parts of the premises as to them may seem fit, or authorized to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, in such manner as may by them be deemed most beneficial and advantageous to all the parties interested; and out of the rents, issues and profits of the said estates hereby conveyed, to support and maintain the said Ralph and his wife Eliza, and their family, during the joint lives of the said Ralph and Eliza, and the survivor of the said Ralph and Eliza during the life of such survivor; and from and after their death, then in trust for such child or children of him the said Ralph as he may leave at his death, and their heirs forever; and in default of such issue, in trust for such person or persons as he the said Ralph may, by last will and testament in writing, appoint; or in default of such appointment, then to the right heirs and distributees of him the said Ralph Wormley. And for the better performance of the trusts herein before mentioned, the said Ralph Wormley has constituted and does hereby constitute them the said John Tayloe and John 136 Tayloe Lomax, and *the survivor of them, his true and lawful attorneys irrevocable, for him and in his name to sue for and recover, and give acquittances for, all debts, dues and demands which the said Ralph may now have owing, or which may hereafter be accruing, unto him the said Ralph; to implead and be impleaded, and to do every other lawful matter or thing touching the trust herein before created, which he the said Ralph might lawfully do by himself."

Ralph Wormley the second, after making this deed, died in the latter part of 1810, survived by his wife Eliza, and three children, Elizabeth, John and Ralph the third, all of whom were by his said wife. The child Elizabeth died in 1814, and John in 1815. Afterwards, in October 1815, the widow Eliza married Carter Braxton. She died in 1816, leaving her husband Braxton and her son Ralph surviving her, and no other descendant. In 1824 this son (Ralph the third) died an infant, intestate and unmarried, whereby his estate became divisible into two moities, one for his paternal and the other for his maternal kindred.

In 1828 a bill was filed in the superior court of chancery at Fredericksburg, by the said paternal and maternal kindred, setting forth, that Lomax alone took upon himself the burthen of the execution of the trust; that at various times he sold considerable real and personal estate, and received rents and hires, and had paid off the debts of Ralph the second; that in a suit in the said court in the name of Ward and others, creditors of said Ralph the second, against Tayloe and others, the accounts of said Lomax as trustee had from time to time been settled by a commissioner and allowed, and the complainants, having examined the same, were content therewith; that the real estate left consists of a valuable tract of land called Rosegill, in Middlesex, and the personal estate left consistent of about 23 slaves, some stock, and a balance 137 of funds in the *hands of the trustee, arising from sales of real and personal estate, rents of land, and hires of slaves; and the complainants claim that the whole of the said real and personal estate, not required for the payment of debts, should be divided and distributed amongst them. They state, however, that Carter Braxton, as administrator of his wife, claims to share in the personal estate; and he is made a defendant, as well as Lomax the surviving trustee.

The answer of Lomax admitted, that the entire agency of the trust had devolved upon him (except as to the sale of one slave and the disbursement of the proceeds), and that he had from time to time settled accounts of his trust, in the suits by the creditors of Ralph the second against the trustees, all of which were consolidated in the name of Ward v. Tayloe; and the respondent expressed his belief that there would be a considerable surplus of estate of Ralph the second, after the payment of the creditors. He prayed, however, if the court made a decree for a division of the estate, that it would make provision for an adequate indemnification of himself and his cotrustee against the liabilities to which they were exposed.

Braxton, in his answer, said, that on the death of the infant Elizabeth, her mother became entitled to one third of the estate, that is, to one ninth of the estate of Ralph the second; and on the death of the infant John, his mother became entitled to one half of his estate, that is, to two other 138 ninths of the estate of Ralph the second; and thus, at the time of the death of Mrs. Braxton, the portion to which she was entitled of the estate of Ralph the second was one third thereof. He stated that the only real estate sold since the deaths of Elizabeth and John was a farm called The Cottage, which was sold for about 3000 dollars; while the personal estate sold since their deaths amounted to about 12000 *dollars. And he insisted that the heirs of Ralph Wormley the third had no right to have the real estate relieved and reimbursed by the personal, (because of the palpable difference between the case of an executor and of a trustee,) but on the contrary, when the real and personal estates descended and passed to different parties, the trustees ought, and in equity would be compelled, to draw ratably on the two funds, the real and the personal, for the payment of debts; or, if this principle be not sanctioned, that the court should decree the respondent one third of the slaves and money remaining in the hands of the trustees.

The court of chancery, in 1828, decreed a division of the tract of land called Rosegill among the heirs of Ralph the third, making provision for the indemnity of the trustees against any debts which might afterwards be demanded against either Ralph the first or Ralph the second; and the court also directed certain accounts, to enable it to decree in respect to the personalty. The cause was afterwards removed to the circuit court of Stafford, and subsequently to Essex.

The report of the commissioner shewed, that there was brought into the accounts reported in Ward v. Tayloe, and applied towards the discharge of the debts of Ralph the second, the sum of 9172 dollars 41 cents, which was the proceeds of a tract of land called Pianketank, sold by the trustees in 1811. And then the report proceeded as follows:

“After the deaths of Elizabeth and John, the following sums were received from the realty:

1815. Sales of wheat to Burke.....	256	10
1816. Net proceeds of barley and corn of 1815, shipped to Baltimore in January and sold in June..	934	46
Net proceeds of corn shipped to messrs. Donald & son.....	813	95
139 *Corn furnished mrs. Braxton.	82	50
C. M. Braxton, sales of barley..	7	20
Do. lot of corn.....	40	00
1817. Sale of Cottage to A. New.....	2982	50
Meadow to Nicholson.....	240	00
Upland to Z. Braxton.....	516	03
	3738	53
Tobacco to Nicholson.....	408	78
Crops January 1817.....	2181	55
Rent of land from 1st Jan'y 1818 to 1828, inclusive, is 11 years, estimated at $300.....	3300	00
	$11443	07

And if interest be added, it would make upwards of 20,000 dollars which the realty had contributed towards the payment of debts up to 1st May 1835; a sum greatly exceeding all the trust subject in the hands of the trustee, viz.

Bonds &c. outstanding, after deducting decree of Carter v. Wormley.....	5165	78
Slaves, in 1822 estimated at 2419 dollars 50 cents, (the commissioner has no warrant for the supposition, but,) if doubled in value, would make but.....	6839	00

It appeared that the sum of 5165 dollars 78 cents, above mentioned, consisted exclusively of a residue of the hires of the slaves which had accrued from the 1st of January 1829 to the 1st of January 1835. At the time of the decree in 1828, the proceedings in the suits between the creditors of Ralph Wormley and his trustees, together with the papers filed and the accounts taken in those suits, were, by consent of parties, referred to as a part of the record in this 140 suit, and the *court at that time confirmed those accounts. Hence the account returned in this case by the commissioner, of the transactions of the trustee, commenced with the balance due on the first of September 1828 according to a previous report, and no accounts of the trustee prior to that time were inserted in the record of this case.

In the progress of the cause an amended bill was filed, making the personal representatives of Elizabeth, John and Ralph the third, parties defendants. This amended bill, however, set forth that they all died infants and not at all indebted.

On the 26th of April 1837, the circuit court of Essex, declaring its opinion to be that the money and slaves of the trust fund in the hands of the defendant Lomar should be distributed as the personal estate of the deceased infants Elizabeth, John and Ralph Wormley, directed a division of the slaves, and decreed to the defendant Braxton, as administrator of his wife Elizabeth, one third thereof, and one third of the said sum of 5165 dollars 78 cents; and to the distributees of Ralph Wormley the third, the other two thirds.

From this decree, on the petition of the complainants, an appeal was allowed. The view taken in the petition was, that by the report of the commissioner, the aggregate amount of the personal estate in the hands of the trustee appeared to be far short of what had come to the hands of the trustee from the real estate, since the deaths of the two children of Ralph the second, and indeed since the death of their mother, his widow. And it was insisted that the decree was erroneous,

1st. Because it is a matter of plain equity, that the conversion of the estates of infants, after their deaths and the devolution of their rights on their heirs, which after events ascertain to be unnecessary, does not extinguish or impair their rights therein, so as to alter

141 *their rights of succession; but there was a plain resulting trust to Ralph the surviving child, in the proceeds of the converted property; and consequently, in respect to the balance of 5165 dollars 78 cents, of a fund of upwards of 20,000 dollars resulting from the real estate, that stands in place of so much real estate of Ralph the third, and passed on his death to his heirs and distributees.

2ndly, Because, by principles analogous to the foregoing, (as the personal was the natural fund for the payment of debts,) the trustee and administrator of Ralph the second ought to have applied the slaves to that object; and if, for inconvenience, he has, by this power as trustee, applied the real estate of the heir to that object, the slaves ought, in a question between the real and personal representatives, to stand in the place of the land and have the same destination as the land would, or at least, in favour of the heir, be charged with a sum equal to that which had been taken from the real estate.

Stanard for appellants. If it was the purpose of any party to insist that what the commissioner has reported to have arisen from real estate did not so arise, there ought to have been an exception to the report on this ground. But the report is without exception, and must be considered correct. So considering it, the consequence follows, that what now remains in the hands of the trustee should pass as real estate. For the rule is well established, that where a conversion is not made until after the death of the party making a trust, the surplus remaining after satisfying the purposes of the trust that he has created, and which would go to him if alive, is an interest in real estate, which passes as such to his heirs or devisees. Emblyn v. Freeman, Prec. in Ch. 541; Roper v. Radcliffe, 10 Mod. 230; Digby v. Legard, 2 Dick. 500; Ackroyd v. Smithson and others, 1 Brown's Ch. Rep. 503. These cases shew that where a conversion of lands is authorized for particular purposes, and the land is converted to a larger amount than is necessary for those purposes, the surplus money will descend as land. The surplus here must pass as land on another ground. Equity will not permit the real estate of infants to be so converted into personalty, as to interfere with the course of descent. 1 Lomax's Digest 203; 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 108, § 21, p. 410.

II. Since the death of Mrs. Braxton, real estate has been applied to pay debts which are chargeable as well upon the realty as the personalty. What were the rights of the parties at her death? Suppose, upon that even, Ralph the third had filed a bill claiming an account of the trust subject, and it had then appeared that there were debts chargeable upon the trust subject, and that this subject consisted partly of real estate and partly of personalty. Surely Ralph would have been entitled to require that the personalty should be applied to pay the debts, unless, by the act of a party competent to do it, the personalty had been exonerated from its primary liability for the payment of debts. This primary liability of the personalty results from the creditor's having a capacity to subject it primarily, while there are no means in his power to subject the real estate so long as there is personal property. But whether this or any other principle be the foundation of the rule, it is enough that the rule is established. The rule is not affected by the circumstance of there being a charge of debts upon the real estate as well as the personalty: to prevent its application, it must appear that there was a purpose not only to charge the realty, but to discharge the personalty. The cases, it is true, in which the doctrine has been principally discussed, are cases arising on wills. 1 Roper on Legacies 463; Samwell v. Wake, 1 Brown's Ch. Rep. 144; Duke of 143 Ancaster v. Mayer & others, Id. 454. And it may be said, this is not a case arising under a devise, but under a deed.

But if the intention is to govern in the one case, it should govern in the other. It is in vain to say that the trustees had power to sell by the terms of the deed: there is the same power under a devise. But the power is not allowed to be so exercised as to affect the rights of others. Parties whose rights the testator did not contemplate affecting, shall not be affected. If, at the death of Mrs. Braxton, the decision upon a bill by the heir would have been such as has been supposed, then the subsequent acts of the trustees cannot change the rights of the parties. The case of an heir paying a bond debt, who is entitled to be reimbursed out of the personal assets, and the case of the heir or devisee of a mortgagor paying off the mortgage, who is entitled to like reimbursement, are both familiar, and the principle of those cases applies to this. What is the discretion in the trustees? A discretion to sell for the payment of debts, and limited to this purpose. Can it be held that this authorizes them to change the nature of the subject at their pleasure? In what respect does this differ from a case of rights devolved by the law; such a case, for example, as Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'x &c., 4 Leigh 410, where slaves were sold to raise a fund for the payment of debts, and it turned out afterwards that the funds were not wanting? The case will be exactly the same, if we suppose slaves to be sold, and funds afterwards to come to hand from other personalty, which might have been applied to the payment of debts.

But if, at the death of Mrs. Braxton, the right of her personal representative be not to one third of the personal estate charged with the whole debts, the charge must at least be of a ratable proportion of the debts, according to the amount due and the value of the respective estates at the time the rights devolve.

Where land is conveyed by a deed of trust or mortgage to secure a debt, and, the debt not being paid, there is a surplus arising from the proceeds of sale, that surplus, not being disposed of by the deed, goes of course to the representatives of the grantor; and whether to his real or his personal representatives, depends upon the nature of the subject at the time of the grantor's death. If, when he died, the land had been sold, and the surplus was in the hands of the trustees in money, that surplus would necessarily go to his personal representative. If, when he died, the land had not been sold, and he had an interest in the land subject to the debt, an interest entitling him to redeem on paying the debt, that interest passes to his heir or devisee. Then if the land be sold in the lifetime of the heir or devisee, and at the time of the death of the heir or devisee there is a surplus in the hands of the trustees in money, it necessarily goes to the personal representative of the heir or devisee. Wright v. Rose, 2 Sim. and Stu.

323; 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 477; Evans &c. v. Kingsberry &c., 2 Rand. 120. The circumstance that more than enough happens to be sold gives no equity, as between the heir and personal representative, to consider this surplus of money as land, but their rights depend upon the state of the subject at the time those rights accrue. The Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors &c., 5 Munf. 125. Upon the death of the party entitled to a surplus arising from a previous sale of lands, that surplus, being then a personal subject, goes to his personal representative; and if such party was entitled to rents and profits which had accrued from the lands before his death, those rents and profits are also a personal subject, which goes to his personal representative. Levet v. Needham, 2 Vern. 138.

If, in such a case as has been supposed, a case in which the conveyance was of 145 real estate alone for the *simple purpose of paying debts, the surplus would go from the party entitled to his personal representative, a fortiori it must be the case here, where the grantor has blended his real and personal estate together, and conveyed the whole, without distinction, for the payment of his debts, for the support and maintenance of himself and his wife and family, and for the benefit of his children when the husband and wife should be dead. This case is much in favour of the right of the personal representative, than the case of Flanagan v. Flanagan, decided by lord Camden, a statement of which is contained in Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Brown's Ch. Rep. 500, 501. There it was provided, that the debts were to be paid in the first place out of the personal estate, as far as it would extend, and in the next place by a sale of the real estate or a sufficient part thereof. Whereas here the trustees are fully authorized and empowered to sell such part of the estate, whether real or personal, as to them might seem fit. They might sell real estate first, or personal estate first, or such part of one and such part of the other as to them might seem fit. There, too, the power to sell was a limited power to raise so much money as should be sufficient to pay the debts and legacies; and after payment thereof, the real estate unsold, and the surplus proceeds of the part sold, were devised to the testator's father and brother. Whereas here, besides the power to raise by sale so much money as should be sufficient to pay the debts, the trustees are authorized and empowered to dispose of the estate, or any part thereof, in such manner as might by them be deemed most beneficial and advantageous to all the parties interested. And there, though the question was between the heir and personal representative in respect to the surplus arising from a sale decreed after the ancestor's death, under an idea that a previous sale was insufficient, which (it appeared 146 afterwards) was in fact *sufficient, the court nevertheless determined (there being no fraud) that the second sale could not be considered as improperly made, and the money must go to the personal representative. Lord Rosslyn, in adverting to this decision, says, it shews the court thought there was no equity between the representatives, but that they must take their respective rights as they find them. Oxenden v. Lord Compton, 2 Ves. jun. 77, 8; S. C. 4 Brown's Ch. Rep. 239; Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. jun. 176; Lord Compton v. Oxenden, 2 Ves. jun. 265; S. C. 4 Brown's Ch. Rep. 403. A distinction may be supposed to exist between Flanagan v. Flanagan and this case, upon the ground that the surplus there arose from a sale made under a decree of court. But is there any material difference between such a sale, and a sale under the power given by this deed? The trustees who acted here were a court chosen by that party under whom all interested claim, and who could give as much power and authority as could be conferred by a decree. And he has given such power. When, for the purpose of paying his just and lawful debts, they deem it proper to sell any part of the property, or when they dispose of any part of it because they deem it beneficial and advantageous to all interested, whether the part sold or disposed of be real or personal, their opinion, supposing they act without fraud, must bind all claiming under the deed, and the sale must be a valid sale. No injunction could be awarded to prevent the sale of any part of the property which the trustees saw fit to sell, if there were debts to be paid, or the sale was deemed by them beneficial and advantageous to those interested. And if in such a case no injunction could be awarded to prevent the sale, it must be impossible to hold afterwards that it was improperly made. And unless a court can say that the sale was improperly made, the surplus must go to the personal representative of the party who, at the time of the sale, is entitled to that surplus.

147 *The conversion from land into money being made in a regular and proper manner, the heir is not entitled to come into equity to reconvert the property, in order to give it a descendible quality. If he were, it would be contrary to all analogy. Where money is transferred with directions that it shall be laid out in land, but the court comes to the conclusion that the character of land is not by the grantor imperatively fixed to the property, but that an option is given to parties to retain the property in money or vest it in land, the moment the conclusion is arrived at that there was such option, that moment it is ascertained that the property will go to the real or the personal representative, according to its state at the death of the party entitled. Wheldale v. Partridge, 5 Ves. 388; S. C. 8 Ves. 227. When the fund is money, and it is claimed that the owner has made it land, it must appear that he intended it at all events to be turned into land and descend as such. If this was not his fixed purpose; if there be any uncertainty as to his purpose; if there be any option to permit it to remain in the one form or be converted into the other, it does not become land until that option is exercised and the conversion made. On the other hand, where the fund is land, and there is an option to permit it to remain in that form or be turned into money, when that option is exercised and the conversion made, it becomes money, and passes to the personal representative.

The case of Walter v. Maunde, 19 Ves. 424, is very apposite to this. The will in that case (the provisions of which are stated in Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27), gave the whole estate to trustees, for the payment of debts, funeral expenses and legacies, and then to dispose of the residue for the use and benefit of the testator's relations and kindred, as the trustees in their discretion should think proper. The testator left it to their discretion to sell the same or such part thereof as they 148 *might think proper, and to convey the same in such manner and form as they might think proper, wholly or only partly converting the estate into money for the purpose of division, as they might think proper. The trustees died before distribution; and then the heir claimed the fund, upon the ground that there was no longer any person authorized to distribute it. It was decided in 16 Ves. 27, that the court of chancery might make the distribution; and the manner of distribution was decided upon by the chancellor in 19 Ves. 427, 8. "Whatever the trustees did," says lord Eldon, "towards and in a due execution of their power, with a view to the execution of the trust which is now disappointed, the court will also take to be property of the same nature and quality as it is found. Whatever therefore was converted into personal estate in the due execution of the trust, must be taken as personal estate." These principles are further sustained by the case of Smith v. Claxton &c., 4 Madd. C. R. 484, and Dixon v. Dawson, 2 Sim. & Stu. 327; 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 485.

Considering it clear that upon the death of Mrs. Braxton, her rights in whatever was then real estate passed to her real representative, and in whatever was then personal estate to her personal representative, the true question in this case is, whether the real representative had a right at that time to require that the personal estate should be applied to pay the debts, in exoneration of the real estate? Upon this question, the cases relied upon on the other side are all cases of the administration of the assets of decedents' estates. But we have no such case here. Ralph Wormley the second, at the time of his death, had no assets whatever which could pass from him to his executor or administrator. His whole estate, real as well as personal, had been transferred by a conveyance made in his lifetime. And the case is

149 the *assets of his estate, than it would have been if the conveyance, instead of being by Ralph Wormley, had been by another person, of the property of that other upon the same trusts that are declared in this deed, and that person had continued alive to this time. We certainly can have here no question of marshalling assets, in the sense in which that term has hitherto been used. In all cases of the administration of assets of a decedent, whether testator or intestate, and whether under the will or under the law, the rights of the parties are fixed at the time the will takes effect or the death occurs. To that period the court looks in fixing their rights, no matter how long afterwards it may be that it has to decide upon them. How will such a principle apply here? Could any cestui que trust say, at the date of the deed, that the personal estate must be exclusively applied, and the real estate not at all, to the payment of debts? And if this could not be done, then it must be contended that the rights conferred by the deed are not to be ascertained from the deed, but depend upon subsequent events. Can this be so? Upon the deaths of Elizabeth and John, could either Mrs. Braxton or the guardian of Ralph have obtained the decree of a court controlling the discretion conferred upon the trustees by the deed? Surely not. The court must have said, it was competent to the grantor to put the trustees in his place, and make their action binding upon all claiming under him; and their authority to sell such part of the estate as to them might seem fit, was not, by the terms of the deed, limited to the lives of Elizabeth and John.

It seems impossible to hold that at the death of Mrs. Braxton, her third of the personal estate was charged with the whole debts then remaining. On the other hand, there may be difficulty in saying that after that time, when different parties were interested in the realty from him who succeeded to the personalty, the trustees still 150 had the arbitrary right to sell; for the debts remaining *due, such part of the estate either real or personal as to them might seem fit. A more equitable principle seems to be that suggested in the alternative presented by Mr. Stanard, when concluding his argument; to wit, that the court should say, that there being at the death of Mrs. Braxton a certain amount of debts due, chargeable alike on the whole estate, and the real estate going to her son and the personal to her husband, an account should be taken of the value of each kind of estate then remaining, and the debts made to fall in ratable proportions upon each. [Stanard. I do not go for charging the debts ratably.] Robinson. You contend, I know, that the personal estate remaining when Mrs. Braxton died should bear all the debts; but if you should fail in this, then it was suggested by you that the two kinds of estate ought to be charged with ratable proportions of the debts. There is great force in this view of the subject; and if the power of sale is to be considered as existing after

mrs. Braxton's death only for the payment of debts, it is difficult to come to any other conclusion. For as the rights to the realty and two thirds of the personalty were then concentrated in Ralph Wormley, and the right to the other third of the personalty was then in the administrator of mrs. Braxton, there ought to be a right in them to pay off the debts, and there must be some correct principle on which this could be done; and no rule seems so fair as that of ratable proportions according to the value of the estate then falling to each. Long v. Short, 1 P. Wms. 403; 2 Vern. 756; Headley v. Redhead, Coop. 50. It may be said that these were cases of the administration of assets; but there is nothing in the principle of contribution which should confine it to cases of that sort, or prevent it from being applied to a case like this.

If the decree be reversed, an enquiry will be necessary to ascertain the value of each kind of estate existing at the time the rights were severed, and the amount 151 *of debts due at that time. For it is apparent on the face of the commissioner's report, that his statement of the sums made from the realty after the death of the infants is not to be relied on. The proceeds of wheat, barley, corn, tobacco and other crops are put down as sums received from the realty, though they must have arisen as much from the slaves as from the land. The land would not have produced the crops unless the slaves had worked it.

Braxton said, he was desirous of ending this litigation, and would not ask a reversal of the decree; but if it should be reversed, and the principle of ratable contribution just mentioned should be adopted, he was satisfied that principle would give him much more than the decree of the court below.

Patton in reply. The argument of mr. Stanard and the authorities cited by him have sufficiently established, as a general proposition, that a man's personal property is primarily bound for the payment of debts, from which nothing will relieve it but express exemption, or plain and manifest intention so to exempt it. This principle has not been controverted, in cases of the administration of assets. Is not this case one of that character? Concede that upon the death of Ralph the second, who had conveyed away his estate, there were no assets to be administered; was it so upon the deaths of his children Elizabeth and John? Clearly not. Upon their deaths, their shares descended and passed, not under the deed, but under the statute of descents and the statute of distributions. And if there had been an administration on the estate of either, and a suit by the administrator to recover his share of the personalty, he could have recovered nothing until all the debts were paid. As it regards the conflicting rights of the real and personal representatives of Elizabeth

152 *and John, the case being one of descent and distribution, their personal estate must exonerate their real estate. So upon the death of mrs. Braxton, her personal representative was entitled to nothing as against her real representative, until all the debts charged upon her estate had been paid out of the personalty. Supposing the case can be looked at in this point of view, as one of descent and distribution, the proposition does not appear to be controverted.

[Robinson. If not controverted, it was because the matter was not before presented in this point of view. But it will not aid the other side at all to consider this a case of the administration of assets, either of the estates of Elizabeth and John Wormley, or of mrs. Braxton. Let us suppose that either of them had had personal estate other than that derived under the deed from Ralph the second; nothing can be more plain than that such personal estate would not have been bound to exonerate the estate derived under that deed (though it were altogether realty) from the debts of Ralph the second. The exoneration of real estate out of the personal estate of a decedent is confined to cases where the debts are the proper debts of that decedent,—debts of his own contracting. This is a well established principle, acted upon in the case of The Duke of Ancaster v. Mayer and others, 1 Brown's Ch. Rep. 454, 464, (which mr. Stanard cited for another purpose) and in numerous other cases. Lawson v. Hudson, 1 Brown's Ch. Rep. 58; 3 Brown's Parl. Cas. p. 424 of Tomlin's edi.; Evelyn v. Evelyn, 2 P. Wms. 664, and cases there collected by mr. Cox in his note. In Scott v. Beecher and wife, 5 Madd. Ch. Rep. 96, (am. edi. 65,) a copyhold estate was mortgaged, and the mortgagor not only devised to his widow the copyhold estate, but bequeathed to her his personal estate, which was sufficient to pay all his debts, including the mortgage. She qualified as executrix, and afterwards died

153 without having *paid off the mortgage, but leaving outstanding personal assets of her husband's estate sufficient to pay it off. In a contest after her death (which produced a severance of rights), it was held that her heir had no equity to have this mortgage paid off out of the mortgagor's personal estate. It thus appears that if the deed of trust of Ralph the second had been upon real estate alone, the subsequent deaths of Elizabeth and John, or of mrs. Braxton, could give no right to her heirs to have the debts secured by the deed paid off out of the personal estate, even though that personal estate was derived from the party who contracted the debts. And the circumstance of personal estate being conveyed by the deed, alone with real estate, can only authorize each kind of estate to be subjected to debts according to the terms of the deed; which have already been considered.]

Patton. In the cases just cited by mr. Robinson, the real estate was primarily and indeed exclusively bound. In our case, it is not exclusively bound: and the debts are due by the same person from whom both the real and personal fund are derived. My argument is, that the contest being between the heirs and personal representatives of Elizabeth and John Wormley, and the estate real and personal being derived from Ralph the second, the personal representatives of Elizabeth and John had no right to any part of the personal property as assets of their estates, until all the debts of Ralph the second, charged by him upon that personal property, were discharged. It is true, he had charged his real estate also. But the real estate was neither exclusively nor primarily charged with the debts by him. And it is that feature in this case which distinguishes it, clearly and plainly, from all the cases cited by Mr. Robinson, and brings it more nearly within the influence of The Earle of Belvedere v. Rochfort, 5 Brown's Par. Cas. p. 299 of Tomlin's edi.

154 *No matter what may be the interpretation of the deed of Ralph the second, as to the discretion and power of the trustees to sell either real or personal property to pay debts, that power and discretion was given in reference only to the rights of his children and grantees, as to whom, in their lifetime, it was a matter of no consequence whether the real or personal estate was sold, as they were to have all that was left, whether real or personal. When, however, new rights and inconsistent interests grew up by their deaths, the deed could not operate to leave it to the trustees, in the exercise of a discretion for the benefit of the children, to defeat those rights and interests. As to the heirs and representatives of the grantees, the law threw on them the estates real and personal, subject to the charge for the payment of debts. As between them, the case is similar to a devise for the payment of debts and legacies, where, so far as the creditors are concerned, both real and personal estates are equally responsible, but as to the representatives themselves, the natural and primary obligation of the personal estate recurs. This argument is applicable, supposing Mr. Robinson's interpretation of the deed to be the true one.

But we do not admit that interpretation. We insist that the deed had no other effect than to give a power to sell the real estate, if necessary, for the payment of debts; that this power was only conferred to insure to the creditors full satisfaction, and was not intended to disturb the primary and natural obligation of the personal estate to pay the debts; and that if the trustees, for the more speedy and convenient payment of the debts, chose to sell the real estate for that purpose after the deaths of Elizabeth and John, their doing so could not affect or impair the rights of the infant heir (Ralph the third) to be reimbursed out of the personal estate. In equity, the trustees, after the deaths of Elizabeth and John, were quasi guardians of the

of his ancestor (Ralph the second), when there was ample personal estate to pay them, and especially when the effect was to throw the whole burden on the real estate, and to give one third of the amount, out of his estate, to the personal representatives.

Stanard. Much stress seemed to be laid on the case of Scott v. Beecher and wife. This case will be found to be a hasty decision of the vicechancellor, rendered upon slight argument, in support of which no authorities are cited; and the position broadly assumed in it is not tenable. For the widow, as residuary legatee of John Tyson, took his estate subject to the payment of his debts, and among others the bond secured by the mortgage; and there can be no doubt that had the mortgagee chosen to proceed at law upon the bond, instead of resorting to the mortgage, he might have had satisfaction out of the personal estate of the mortgagor in the hands of his executrix. The case admitted of a decision on another ground; viz. that the widow having the absolute dominion over the whole subject, and being sui juris in all respects, her conduct evinced an election on her part to continue the mortgage as a charge upon the real estate: and in the face of such election by the party under whom both claimed, her heir had no equity as against her personal representative. But that ground would not apply to a case like this, arising between the real and personal representatives of parties not sui juris, not clothed with any dominion over the subject, and not competent in law or in fact to manifest any intention or make any election whatever. Unless the decision in Scott v. Beecher and wife can be placed on this ground, it is inconsistent with the case of The Earl of Belvedere v. Rochfort. And if there be an inconsistency between the two, at least as much consideration is due to a decree

156 *in chancery affirmed in the house of lords, as to a hasty decision of a vice-chancellor.

It is somewhat remarkable that though Mr. Robinson seemed to think that this case has nothing to do with the doctrines in cases arising under wills or relating to the administration of assets, the only two cases which he has adduced to support his new theory of contribution, in favour of which he seems willing to abandon the decree of the court below, are both cases arising under wills and relating to the administration of assets. No case, it is believed, can be found amongst the decisions of this court, in which it has been held that where a man by his will gives a slave or a horse to A. and a tract of land to B., the legatee of the chattel can claim contribution from the devisee of the land. But whatever may be the rule as to such a case, nothing is better settled than that a general or pecuniary legatee, or a residuary legatee can never call on the devisee of the land for contribution. As between them, the personal estate must always be first applied to the payment of debts, even though the legacy should thereby altogether fail. Clifton v. Burt, 1 P. Wms. 678; Harewood v. Child, cited in Cas. temp. Talb. 204, and approved by lord Hardwicke in Inchiquin v. French, Amb. 33; Tait v. Lord Northwick, 4 Ves. 816. And mrs. Braxton's becoming entitled to one third of the unas-157 *certained residuum of the personal estate of Ralph the second that might remain after the payment of his debts, does not place her in the relation of a specific but of a general or residuary legatee.

BALDWIN, J. The court is of the following opinion: The effect of the deed executed in 1810 by Ralph Wormley the second and his wife to trustees, conveying to them all his property, real and personal, for the purposes therein mentioned, was to create an equitable estate therein in himself and wife during their joint lives 157 *and the life of the survivor, with remainder to such children as he should leave at the time of his death; which estate was subject to the payment of his debts, with a full authority to the trustees to sell for the purpose the property conveyed, or any part thereof, whether real or personal, according to their discretion, and apply the proceeds to the discharge of the debts. By the death of the grantor Wormley in 1810, the remainder became vested in his three children, Elizabeth, John and Ralph the third, but did not take effect in possession until the death of the widow. By the death of Elizabeth in 1814, her interest in remainder in the whole property, real and personal, passed to her mother the widow, and to John and Ralph the third her brothers; and by the death of John in 1815, his like interest, embracing that which he had acquired by the death of Elizabeth, passed to his mother the widow, and Ralph the third his brother. And by the death of the widow in 1816, the interests in the remainder which she had acquired by the deaths of her children John and Elizabeth, passed, as to the realty, to her only surviving child Ralph the third, and as to the personalty, to Carter M. Braxton, her surviving second husband and administrator. In 1811, the acting trustee sold a portion of the real property to the amount of 9172 dollars 41 cents, and the proceeds have been applied towards the discharge of the debts. This was a conversion, within the authority and discretion of the trustee, of so much of the realty into personalty; and being made at a time when there was no conflict, but an identity of interest amongst those entitled to the estate, it cannot, by reason of circumstances thereafter arising, furnish any equity for a reimbursement of the realty out of the personalty, or for contribution in favour of the former against the latter. The surplus income of the estate, real and personal, beyond the maintenance of the family, which accrued prior to the death of the widow, has also been

tion of the respective amounts derived in that way from the realty and personalty. Nor would such information be at all material, the widow being entitled to the profits of the whole estate, subject to the payment of debts, during her life, for the maintenances of herself and family. It follows from these considerations, that upon the questions involved in this cause, it is unnecessary to look back beyond the death of the widow in 1816, to ascertain the relative payments theretofore made out of the realty and personalty, towards the discharge of the debts. And any equity between the parties must arise out of the means respectively furnished for that purpose by the realty and personalty, since that period; when the succession to the real fell into a different channel from that of the personal property; Ralph the third then becoming the owner of the whole of the former and two thirds of the latter, and the defendant Braxton, in right of his deceased wife, of the remaining third of the latter. After that period, the authority and discretion of the trustee in regard to sales of the property, whether real or personal, continued as before, and no equity could arise between the realty and personalty for reimbursement of one to the other, neither being primarily, but the whole estate indiscriminately, subjected to payment of the debts by the provisions of the trust deed; which, and not the principles governing the administration of decedents' estates, must give the rule upon the subject. An equity of a different nature did, however, arise out of the provisions of the trust deed, so soon as the succession to the realty and the personalty practically fell into different channels: and it was simply this, that the owners of the realty and personalty should contribute to the burthen of paying the debts remaining unsatisfied at the widow's death, in proportion to the value of their 159 respective interests; and that the exercise by the trustee *of the authority and discretion vested in him should not have the effect of disturbing the due apportionment of that burthen amongst those several interests. It appears that after full payment of the debts charged upon the estate, there remained of trust moneys, besides the slaves, in the hands of the trustee at the date of the chancellor's decree of 1837, for distribution, the principal sum of 5165 dollars 78 cents, consisting exclusively of a residue of the hires of the slaves which had accrued from the 1st of January 1829 to the 1st of January 1835. It further appears that in the year 1817, the trustee sold other parts of the real property, to the amount of 3738 dollars 53 cents, which has been applied to the payment of debts, still leaving the tract of land called Rosegill, of which partition was directed by the chancellor's decree of 1828, amongst the heirs of Ralph Wormley the third, who died in the year 1824. If the plaintiffs, as heirs and distributees of Ralph the third, have any equity against the defendant Braxton's distributive third of the personal property, it must be founded on the fact that the said sum of 3738 dollars 53 cents, applied from the realty towards the payment of the debts, together with the rents and profits of the realty which may have been so applied since Mrs. Braxton's death, exceeds the due proportion which ought to have been contributed from the real property and Ralph the third's distributive two thirds of the personal property, compared with what ought to have been contributed by the defendant Braxton's one third of the latter, having due regard to the value of each interest. That the fact is so is hardly probable, and it ought to have been made appear by the plaintiffs. The record before us does not contain the accounts of the trustee prior to the 1st of September 1828; and of course does not furnish the means of ascertaining the rents and profits of the lands and the hires of the slaves, and the proceeds of sales (if any) of slaves and other personal property, which 160 *were applied to the payment of debts from the time of Mrs. Braxton's death until the 1st of September 1828. For the accounts of the trustee between those periods, reference, it would seem, was had in the court below to a settlement by a master commissioner, and the other papers in certain suits brought by creditors of the estate, and which by the chancellor's decree of 1828 were, with the consent of the parties, directed to be made parts of the record of the present suit. The papers and proceedings in those suits have not been copied into the record before us, though they probably contain the evidence upon which the chancellor held, by his decree of 1837, that the money and slaves remaining of the trust fund in the hands of the trustee should be distributed as the personal estate of the deceased infants Elizabeth, John and Ralph Wormley, and which distribution was thereby accordingly decreed. If copies of those papers and proceedings could have availed the appellants any thing in their purpose of shewing the said decree to be erroneous, they ought to have suggested a diminution of the record, and brought them up by certiorari. But inasmuch as said papers and proceedings were probably confined to the trust transactions, without furnishing comparative estimates at the proper period, of the value of the lands on the one hand, and of the slaves and other personal property on the other, it would perhaps have been more regular for the chancellor to have directed an account, in the present suit, of the whole trust subject and transactions. Wherefore, though this court perceives no error in the decree for which the same ought to be reversed, and though the appellee Braxton states that he is content therewith, and desires no further account; yet if it is desired by the appellants, and they are willing to incur the risk of a readjustment of the accounts upon the principles above declared, this court will amend the said decree by directing the same.

161 [Stanard. I cannot take the responsibility of calling for any new account. Let the decree be affirmed.]

PER CURIAM. The appellants, by their counsel, now declining such an amendment of the decree as was suggested in the opinion of this court, the decree is affirmed with costs, and the cause remanded for the further proceedings contemplated by the decree of the circuit court.

Floyd v. Harrison and Others.

July, 1848, Lewisburg.

Mortgages—Redemption†—Case at Bar.—A deed is made, whereby, after reciting that F. the grantor hath sold to H. the grantee, for the sum of 200 dollars, certain real and personal estate, it is witnessed that the grantor, in consideration of that sum, conveys the same to the grantee; and then the deed concludes as follows: "It is agreed and fairly understood by and between the said F. and H. that in case the said H. or his heirs or assigns shall not be able to make the aforesaid 200 dollars out of the estate herein before conveyed, that then the said F. shall refund the same to the said H. or his heirs or assigns, with lawful interest thereon from this date till paid, or such part of the said 200 dollars as the said H. shall not be able to realize as aforesaid." Under the authority of this deed, the grantee sells and conveys the estate, and his grantee again sells and conveys the same. After which, to wit, about ten years after the date of the first mentioned deed, the grantor in that deed files a bill in equity to redeem the estate conveyed, on paying whatever may be due of the 200 dollars, with interest. HOLD, the bill cannot be sustained. ALLEN, J., dissented considering the case within the principle of Chowning v. Cox *and others, 1 Rand. 306, recognized more recently in Breckenridge v. Auld and others, 1 Rob. 148. The two other judges who sat in the case (STANARD and BALDWIN) considered it not within the principle of those cases.

Same—Whether Mortgagee May Sell under Power Given by Mortgage.—The case of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, is a departure from the doctrine, now well settled in England and recognized in New York, that a mortgagee may sell the property after forfeiture, under a power given for that purpose in the mortgage deed: per BALDWIN, J.—The doctrine so settled in England and recognized in New York seems to have been wholly overlooked by counsel and court in the argument and decision of Chowning v. Cox. Though this consideration may not warrant the reversal of that decision, it is most cogent to limit its authority to the particular case then in judgment. Per STANARD, J.

*They were absent the whole of this term, having been prevented from attending by indisposition.

Same.—The grounds on which STANARD, J., concurred in the decree in Breckenridge v. Auld and others, 1 Rob. 148, stated by him in his opinion in this case.

On the 27th of November 1816, a deed was made between Gabriel J. Floyd, then of the town of Louisville in the county of Jefferson and state of Kentucky, of the one part, and Charles L. Harrison of the same town of the other part, whereby,—after reciting that Benjamin Johnston senior died intestate, leaving eight children, to wit, Susanna Johnston who intermarried with Davis Floyd, Ann C. Johnston who intermarried with John F. Gray, Robert Johnston, and five others, of whom each child became entitled to one eighth part of his estate; and after further reciting that the said Robert Johnston and Ann C. Gray had died intestate and without issue, whereby the said Susanna Floyd became entitled to one seventh part of the said Robert Johnston's, and one seventh part of the said Ann C. Gray's part of the estate of the said Benjamin Johnston senior; and after further reciting that the said Susanna Floyd had died, having first had issue, to wit, the said Gabriel J. Floyd and Charles D. Floyd, whereby the said Gabriel J. became entitled to one moiety of his mother's interest in the estates of the said

Benjamin Johnston senior deceased
163 *and the said Robert Johnston and Ann C. Gray deceased; and after a further reciting that "the said Gabriel J. Floyd hath this day sold to the said Charles L. Harrison, for and in consideration of the sum of 200 dollars, all his interest of, in and to all the estate, both real and personal, of the said Benjamin Johnston senior deceased and Robert Johnston and Ann C. Gray deceased, to which he is now or may hereafter be entitled as one of the heirs of his said mother Susanna Floyd deceased, lying and being, or owing, within the states of Virginia and Kentucky," it was witnessed that the said Gabriel J. Floyd, for and in consideration of the premises, and of the aforesaid sum of 200 dollars to him in hand paid, conveyed unto the said Charles L. Harrison "all his the said Gabriel J. Floyd's interest as heir as afore mentioned, of, in and unto all lots, parts of lots and lands within the states of Virginia and Kentucky, claimed and owned by the heirs of the said Benjamin Johnston senior deceased, and also all the right, title and interest which he may become entitled to hereafter by descent, and also all his right, title, interest and claim in and to bonds, notes, bills, judgments and executions which he is or may be entitled to by descent, which are now due and owing to the estate of the said Benjamin senior deceased and Robert and Nancy deceased, or which may hereafter become due and owing as aforesaid." Then followed the habendum clause, and a warranty by the grantor against himself and all persons claiming under him. After which came the following clause:

"And it is agreed and fairly understood by and between the said Gabriel J. Floyd and Charles L. Harrison, that in case the said Harrison or his heirs or assigns shall not be able to make the aforesaid 200 dollars out of the estate herein before conveyed, that then the said Floyd shall refund the same to the said Harrison or his heirs or assigns, with lawful interest thereon from this date till paid, or 164 *such part of the said 200 dollars as the said Harrison shall not be able to realize as aforesaid."

On the 16th of July 1823, a deed was made from Charles L. Harrison (by James Harrison his attorney) to John and James M'Lure, whereby, after reciting various conveyances to the said Charles from persons interested in the estate of the said Benjamin Johnston deceased, embracing the conveyance from Floyd as well as others, Harrison, for the consideration of 550 dollars, conveyed unto John and James M'Lure "all the lands or land claims, or part or parts of tracts of land, now owned, claimed or possessed by the said Charles L. Harrison by reason of said conveyances made as aforesaid, in either of said states of Virginia and Kentucky, also all debts or demands which the said Charles has against any person or persons, derived by said purchases of the aforesaid shares or parts of the said estate of said Benjamin Johnston; to their only proper use, benefit and behoof."

The rights of John and James M'Lure under this deed were conveyed by them, on the 30th of October 1826, to John Gibson for the consideration of 800 dollars.

After all these conveyances, a deed was made on the first of November 1826, between Charles L. Harrison and Gabriel J. Floyd, whereby the former conveyed unto the latter, for the nominal consideration of one dollar, all the right, title, claim and interest of said Harrison, held and then owned by him by virtue of the deed made to him by said Floyd, of, in and to lands in the states of Kentucky and Virginia.

The greater part of the bill was taken up with explaining the state of the 165 title derived from Benjamin *Johnston the elder; and exhibits were also filed with it, explanatory of the title. It will suffice, as to this matter, to say (in the language of one of the judges composing the majority of this court) that the title in its origin, according to the plaintiff's statement of it in his bill, appeared extremely objectionable, and the interests claimed under it were, at the date of his deed to Harrison, for the most part, if not altogether, in action instead of possession.

The bill states that on the 27th of September 1816, the complainant was indebted to Harrison in the sum of 200 dollars; mentions that the estates conveyed by the deed of that date were of great value; and charges that the deed was intended as a mortgage, and given in the form it was, to enable Harrison to make sales and conveyances to raise the sum aforesaid; that Harrison so understood the deed; and that after selling portions of the property to the amount of the debt and charges, or nearly so, he, on the 1st of November 1826, made to the complainant a reconveyance of all the right and title acquired by him. The bill mentions the deed from Harrison to M'Lures, and states that at the time of that conveyance, Harrison was fully paid, and that the complainant, at the time of settling with Harrison, acquitting him, and receiving the reconveyance, had no knowledge or notice of the said deed to M'Lures. The bill also mentions the conveyance from M'Lures to Gibson, and charges that Gibson holds the property in his own name for the use and benefit of William F. Peterson, who pretends to be acting as attorney in fact, and in that capacity has sold to, or otherwise interested in the business, Charles Allison, whom he has put in possession of part of the property. The prayer of the bill is for a release to the complainant of the legal title; or, if a balance of the debt shall be found yet due, that he may be permitted to redeem.

166 *John M'Lure put in a plea and answer, pleading that he was a purchaser without notice, and answering that the plaintiff had notice of the deed of 1823 to John and James M'Lure, before he took his reconveyance from Harrison in 1826; that the plaintiff had disclaimed title to the land in controversy in 1827, and had nevertheless sold his interest in it to David Pugh, for whose benefit this suit was prosecuted.

Gibson answered to the same effect.

Peterson answered, disclaiming interest. The subpoena was returned executed upon James M'Lure and Charles Allison, but they did not answer. Harrison was proceeded against as an absent defendant.

Depositions were taken on behalf of the defendants, to prove that the complainant was perfectly aware of the conveyance from Harrison to the M'Lures when he obtained a reconveyance from Harrison to himself, and that he took that reconveyance under an idea that, to the extent of the lands in Brooke county, he could overreach the M'Lures and those claiming under them, by getting the reconveyance recorded in that county before the conveyance to the M'Lures was recorded there.

On behalf of the complainant, the deposition of John Edie was taken. Being asked what he supposed to be the value of a share, or the one sixth part, of such of the lands of Benjamin Johnston senior in Brooke county as were not sold by him in his lifetime, he answered, "that he is of opinion that the share in Brooke is of the value of 4000 dollars; that is, the one sixth of the unsold lands of Benjamin Johnston senior in the county of Brooke." In answer to another question, he explained his opinion to be, that the share inherited by Susanna Floyd from her father, brother and sister, "if none of it had been sold by her husband, would have been worth 4000 dollars in the year 1827." He stated that he was acquainted with the parts of her share sold by her husband Davis Floyd, 167 and was of opinion that *in 1827 the said parts were worth 2000 dollars, "leaving the share of each of her sons in 1827 worth 1000 dollars." He spoke of the lands in Brooke county only.

But the deed before mentioned of the 16th of July 1823, from Harrison to John and James M'Lure, conveyed, for the consideration of 550 dollars, not only what had been conveyed by Floyd to Harrison, but the share of Gabriel J. Johnston a son of Benjamin Johnston senior, the share of John Harrison who intermarried with Mary a daughter of the said Benjamin, and the interest of Benjamin Johnston junior, another son, in the share of his sister Ann C. Gray.

The cause was removed by certiorari to the circuit court of Brooke, and on the 13th of October 1832 came on to be heard before that court, when it was decreed that the plaintiff's bill be dismissed as to the defendants John M'Lure, James M'Lure, William F. Peterson, John Gibson and Charles Allison; that they recover of the plaintiff their costs; and that if the counsel for the plaintiff desire the same, it be referred to a commissioner to state an account between the plaintiff and the defendant Harrison. But this account the plaintiff, by his counsel, waived.

From this decree an appeal was allowed.

G. N. Johnson for appellant. The deed of November 1816 is a mortgage, intended to be coupled with a power of sale. The transaction was not a sale to Harrison; else why was the vendee to sell the land again from time to time, until the sum of 200 dollars with interest was raised? It was not a sale, because there was no equality in the bargain. Harrison was, upon that supposition, to get 200 dollars with interest, at all events, and as much more as he might make out of the sales of land of indefinite and constantly increasing value, part of which was worth 1000 or 2000 dollars.

168 It *was not a sale, because the vendee had precisely such rights in the property as an ordinary mortgagee would have, with the nugatory addition of the invalid power to sell, attempted to be conferred; a power, too, not inserted in absolute deeds, and indicating rather fiduciary than absolute ownership. Nothing was wanting to make this a mortgage in form, but the express reservation of an equity of redemption. But it is held universally, that whatever be the form, every conveyance of land as a security for the repayment of money to the grantee is a mortgage. See 1 Powell on Mortg. 115, 116, note (H), and p. 4, note (3); Hughes and others v. Edwards and wife, 9 Wheat. 489; Conway's ex'ors v. Alexander, 7 Cranch

218; also 4 Kent's Comm. 142; 1 Lomax's Dig. 315, 321. It is so held, in spite of express agreements that the estate shall not be redeemable. See 1 Powell on Mortg. 116, note (H), above cited, and the cases there mentioned. In the case of Clay and others v. Willis, 1 Barn. & Cress. 364, 8 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 103, as in this case, there was no right of redemption reserved, and there was a power of sale; and the court considered the deed a mortgage. The existence of a covenant binding the grantor personally, is looked upon as a very strong, if not a conclusive evidence that the deed is a mortgage. See Coote on Mortg. 22, 3, and case there cited of Howard v. Harris, 2 Ch. Cas. 147; Conway's ex'ors v. Alexander, 7 Cranch 218; 1 Lomax's Dig. 321, and cases cited in note (6). Again, it is held that "mortgages are mutual;" that is, where one of the parties receives the benefits of a mortgage from the transaction, the court will hold the deed to be a mortgage, in favour of the other party; so that if it gives the grantee the power of getting his money and interest back at all events, by means of a covenant to repay or otherwise, the grantor will be allowed to redeem the land upon repayment of the money with interest. Coote on Mortg. 33; 1 Powell on Mortg. 335, *and note (R); Howard v. Harris, 2 Ch. Cas. 147. The circumstance that the grantee has not an immediate remedy upon the personal covenant, although the grantor may have the immediate right to redeem, is not material. See Coote on Mortg. 33, 34. The mutuality need not run quatuor pedibus. The great principle upon which courts of equity originally interposed, and moulded ancient mortgages to their present state, was this, that it was inequitable that a creditor should obtain a collateral or additional advantage, through the necessities of his debtor, beyond principal and interest. See Coote on Mortg. 21. In Bonham v. Newcomb, 1 Vern. 214, 232, the risk of loss to the grantee was relied upon to shew that the transaction was a sale, not a mortgage. Courts will not allow a mortgagee to accompany his bargain by any agreement by which a collateral and undue advantage may be gained. Coote on Mortg. 26, citing Jennings & others v. Ward & others, 2 Vern. 520. Wherever, in doubtful cases, the courts have construed the transaction to be a sale, it will be found that the bargain was fair and equal. See the class of cases mentioned by Coote, p. 28. The gross inadequacy of the consideration is another strong proof that the transaction was a mortgage. Wharf v. Howell and wife, 5 Binn. 499; Conway's ex'ors v. Alexander, 7 Cranch 218; 1 Powell on Mortg. 125, note (P).

Gibson, the holder, claims to be a purchaser without notice of Floyd's equity: but that defence is manifestly inapplicable to the case. For the deed from Floyd to Harrison, importing a mortgage, discloses the equity upon its face, and each subsequent deed in the chain of title refers to that which preceded it. The case of Graff and others v. Castleman &c., 5 Rand. 195, determined that notice of a deed was to be presumed against a purchaser, under circumstances less strong than exist here. If Gibson really believed his title to be indefeasible, it was his own fault or misfortune. The principle is, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage." Powell on Mortg. 116, note (H). The risk whether a mortgage is redeemable or not, rests with the purchaser. Hansard v. Hardy, 18 Ves. 455.

George H. Lee for appellees. The deed from the appellant to Harrison was not, nor was it intended to be, a mortgage, but was in fact and was intended to be an absolute conveyance of an undivided interest in an estate of uncertain title, extent and value; the grantee requiring (in consequence of the doubt whether or no the interest granted was of any value), and the grantor giving, a guarantee that the grantee should, when he came to dispose of it, be able to realize the amount of the purchase money, or that he (the grantor) would make good the deficiency. The question whether a conveyance is to be considered a mortgage or otherwise, depends upon all the circumstances of the contract, and is not confined to the mere written evidence of it. Robertson v. Campbell &c., 2 Call 421. For the traits of a mortgage, as distinguished from a conditional sale, see Thompson v. Davenport &c., 1 Wash. 125, Chapman's adm'x v. Turner, 1 Call 280, Leavell v. Robinson, 2 Leigh 161, and Conway's ex'or v. Alexander, 7 Cranch 218. In the last case, land was conveyed to trustees, in trust to convey the same to A. in case B. should fail to repay, on a certain day, certain money advanced by A., with interest. B. failed to pay the money on the day limited, and the trustees conveyed the land to A.; and it was held that B. had no equity of redemption.

But if the deed is to be construed as in the nature of a mortgage, yet it was made and intended, and the particular form used was adopted, not with a view to authorize the grantor to demand a reconveyance upon paying the consideration he had received, but for the very purpose of enabling the grantee to make sale of the subject, and with the understanding that he should *do so. And a mortgage with such power to sell is good, and the sale under it effectual. In Taylor's adm'rs &c. v. Chowning, 3 Leigh 654, such a sale was sustained. The practice in New York is to permit such sales. Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. R. 184. And the modern english doctrine is the same way.

The exercise of the power conferred by the deed (and expressly intended to be exercised), by the sale to the M'Lures, ought not now, after the lapse of time since the execution of the deed, and especially considering the conduct and declarations of the appellant, and the other circumstances of the case, to be disturbed or questioned. In Roberts's adm'r v. Cooke, 1 Rand. 121, judge Cabell relied much upon the acquiescence of Roberts. Here the acts and conduct of the appellant are such as should prevent a court of equity from giving him its assistance.

G. N. Johnson in reply. The new english practice was creeping into use in that country, under the protection of some of the eminent conveyancers, especially mr. Coventry, when it was powerfully shaken, if not overthrown, by the strong objection to it manifested by lord Eldon in Roberts v. Bozon, in 1825. He appears to have heard of the new practice then for the first time. See Coventry's note, 1 Powell on Mortg. p. 9. There could not be a stronger demonstration of the evils of the new practice, than is afforded by the laboured apology of mr. Coventry for them. In this court, however, it ought to be sufficient to refer to its own adjudications in the cases of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, and Breckenridge v. Auld and others, 1 Rob. 148.

If the deed is to be construed as a sale of the land at the price of 200 dollars, with a guarantee that the land should produce in the market at least that sum with its interest, leaving to the purchaser the full benefit of whatever surplus might be 172 procured, then the transaction *would be obviously usurious. It is well settled doctrine, that wherever the contract assures to him who advances money a return of his whole principal and interest, at all events, and gives to him a chance only of farther profit, this chance is regarded as a premium over and above the lawful interest, and will make the contract usurious. Ord on Usury 70; Gibson v. Fristoe and others, 1 Call 76, 81; Smith v. Nicholas &c., 8 Leigh 349.

BALDWIN, J. The justice of this case is clearly against the plaintiff. He makes a conveyance, for a valuable consideration, of his interest in certain lands and choses in action, without any limitation upon his grantee's power of alienation; lies by for a number of years, without asserting any claim to the property, and till after successive sales and conveyances thereof to bona fide purchasers; then, with full notice of the fact, obtains a reconveyance from his grantee, fraudulently made by him to defeat his own purchasers; and now seeks to recover back the subject, upon the allegation that the deed was intended merely as a mortgage. If the plaintiff is entitled to relief under such circumstances, it ought to be very clearly established.

The deed in question, if a mortgage, certainly departs very widely from the usual form of such instruments. It contains no unconditional covenant for repayment of the consideration, nor any acknowledgment of a subsisting indebtedness; no covenant on the part of the grantee for a reconveyance, nor any condition upon which the estate is to be avoided; no reservation, in any shape or form, of a power of redemption on the part of the grantor, nor of a right, for any period, to the possession and enjoyment of the property, which passed with the title to the grantee; while the authority of the latter to sell or otherwise dispose of the subject, ad libitum, is recognized by a necessary implication. In short the instrument, after a recital 173 of the *grantor's title and the sale of his interest to the grantee for the sum of 200 dollars, is in the common form of a deed of bargain and sale, except that it contains a guarantee of the value of the property conveyed, not absolute but contingent; the terms of the guarantee evidently contemplating a sale or sales of the subject by the grantee, without his being able to realize the price paid by him, with its interest; in which event only it is stipulated that the grantor shall make good the deficiency. But there is no obligation to sell imposed upon the grantee; and according to the terms of the contract, he was at liberty to retain the property itself, or the proceeds of sales, as his own, without accountability. This guarantee, however, rendered the contract unequal, inasmuch as it guarded the grantee, during the solvency of the grantor, against the hazard of loss, while it left him the chance of gain by an increase in the value of the property. A guarantee of value is unusual in sales of real estate, though not so in sales of personal choses in action; in regard to which the law, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, implies such a guarantee; and therefore if the purchaser of a bond is unable, by the use of due diligence, to make the money out of the obligor, he is entitled to reimbursement from the assignor, of the consideration paid, with its interest. This inequality in the contract did not render it the less a sale, if so intended by the parties, as its language imports. Under what circumstances, if any, an action of covenant would have lain upon the guarantee, or whether under any it would have been enforced by a court of equity, are matters foreign to the enquiry. It was not a stipulation for the benefit of the grantor, but for an additional advantage to the grantee; and whether valid or invalid, could not affect his title as purchaser.

The cause, however, is not to be determined by the mere form of the contract, but by the intention of the 174 *parties, to be gathered not only from the terms of the instrument, but also from extrinsic circumstances. The propriety of resorting in such cases to evidence aliunde, results from the nature of the question; for otherwise a mortgage might be converted into a sale, or a sale into a mortgage, by fraud, accident, or mistake. But the present case is not embarrassed by the enquiry whether the transaction was intended as a mortgage or as a conditional sale; an enquiry frequently of much perplexity and nicety; the difficulty arising out of the circumstance that both the one and the other are estates upon condition, and the condition of the like character in both, so far as its performance goes to defeat an estate granted, by repayment of the consideration; and the essential distinction being, that in the event of nonperformance, the estate in the former case is forfeited at law but not in equity, and in the latter both at law and in equity. Here the question is not between a mortgage and a conditional sale, but between a mortgage and an absolute sale: for if the transaction was in fact a sale, there is no room for the idea, nor is it pretended, that it was upon any condition whatever. And on that question, it seems to me impossible to hold this instrument a mortgage upon its face, without maintaining that the harshness, or inequality, or (if you please) unlawfulness of a provision in a contract of sale, is to have the effect, not of rendering abortive the provision itself, or of avoiding the entire contract, but of changing it into another contract of a wholly different nature. How can we undertake to pronounce this deed a mortgage by its very terms, in the absence of any condition or provision to defeat the absolute title conveyed to the grantee?

But though the deed is not a mortgage upon its face, the clause of guarantee may very properly be relied on, in connexion with other evidence, for the purpose of ascertaining what was the real character of the *transaction as contemplated by the parties; for upon that question of fact, we are to look to all the circumstances of the case; and it is an important consideration, which in a doubtful case might have a decisive influence, that the grantee is assured against the risk of loss, to the full amount of his principal money and interest. Upon such a question, authoritative rules can do little more than ascertain the abstract distinction between a sale and a mortgage: beyond that, they are guides rather to the investigation than the adjudication; the fact of intent being a common sense deduction from all the evidence, by a sound discrimination of the weight of circumstances, and a just combination of the whole. Still the imperfection of human testimony requires us to bear in mind, that the intrinsic import and legal effect of the instrument itself are not to be lightly disregarded; that there is a prima facie presumption of its expressing truly the agreement of the parties; and that though it may be difficult, if not inexpedient, to prescribe the limits of extrinsic testimony, it ought to be of such a nature as to furnish some reason for the necessity of its introduction. This is usually found in the unskilfulness or carelessness of the scrivener; the ignorance of the parties; the misplaced and abused confidence of one of them; the relation existing between, or the relative condition of, the parties, subjecting one of them to the power or undue influence of the other; or, in a word, in whatever may be fairly referred to fraud, accident, or mistake. And when, upon the whole case, it appears that the conveyance was executed to secure a loan or a pre-existing debt, objections arising out of the informality or imperfections of the instrument must be made to yield to the substantial merits of the cause; and so must even express stipulations tending to defeat, or restrain, or clog the equity of redemption, and thus give a collateral or additional advantage to the creditor, beyond his principal money and interest.

176 *When we examine the plaintiff's bill, we find it stating broadly, that the deed was intended as a mortgage to secure a debt due from him to Harrison the grantee, with a power to the latter to make sales and conveyances of the property, to an extent sufficient to discharge the sum due. It makes no pretence that the instrument does not express truly the agreement of the parties. On the contrary, it treats the paper as a mortgage upon its face, so understood and acted upon by the parties; as evidence of which it alleges that the defendant Harrison, after making sales to the amount of the debt and charges, or nearly so, reconveyed the subject to the plaintiff. There is no complaint against Harrison in the bill, except that, before the reconveyance to the plaintiff, he sold and conveyed the property to the defendants John and James M'Lure; of which sale and conveyance, the plaintiff falsely charges that he had no notice at the time of the reconveyance. And when we come to look into the proofs in the cause, we find nothing to warrant the belief that the contract between the parties was in any wise different from that evidenced by the deed. There is no proof that the consideration of the conveyance was a loan of money, or a pre-existing debt; nor of an agreement to reconvey or surrender the property, or account for its value or the proceeds of sales, in any event whatever. The actual reconveyance, so far from interpreting the original contract favourably for the plaintiff, shews, under the circumstances, a combination between the parties to defraud the vendees of Harrison. It appears from the evidence to have been procured by the plaintiff under the delusive notion that it would enable him to claim such of the lands as lie in Brooke county, in the character of a purchaser from his own grantee, without legal (though with actual) notice of the previous sale to the M'Lures, the deed to them not having been recorded in that county. This, and his other conduct already noticed, are irreconcilable

177 *with the idea of a consciousness on his part that he stood in the relation of mortgagor. The pretension that the consideration of the deed to Harrison has been reimbursed to him, otherwise that by his sale to the M'Lures, seems to be wholly unfounded. Nor is any light thrown upon the question by the testimony on the part of the plaintiff, to prove the inadequacy of that consideration upon a contract of sale. It consists of the opinion of a single witness as to value, without reference to the period of the sale, or the state of the title; and is of little weight compared with the prices at which that, and other interests in the common subject, were sold, first to the M'Lures, and afterwards by them to the defendant Gibson; which will be found, upon calculation, not to exceed per share the consideration received by the plaintiff. In fact, the value of the subject sold would seem to have been altogether uncertain and precarious; the title in its origin, according to the plaintiff's own statement of it in his bill, appearing extremely objectionable, and the interests claimed under it, for the most part, if not altogether, in action instead of possession. In such a state of things, the value must have been merely speculative; and a purchaser, though he may have been willing to risk the title by taking a deed with special warranty, might prudently require a guarantee that if he did not make, he should not lose any thing by his speculation, beyond the labour and expense of pursuing it unprofitably. And in point of fact it has turned out, that instead of gaining, he has lost by the contract.

But whatever may be the force of the circumstances aliunde, they cannot affect the subsequent purchasers without notice; and none is pretended by the bill, nor established by the proofs, beyond that furnished by the face of the instrument. Of this defence they, the only substantial defendants, (the plaintiff having declined an account against the defendant 178 Harrison) have availed *themselves in due form of pleading; so that at last the cause must turn upon the intrinsic import and effect of the deed in question.

If the clause of guarantee could be so construed as to give the plaintiff an equity of redemption, it would at the same time so modify that equity, as to defeat the plaintiff's unjust demand against the bona fide purchasers, under the power of conversion acknowledged by himself to have been conferred by the instrument. Regarding the paper as a mortgage, there being no time limited for the payment of the debt, the grantor might redeem at any time; but then, when he comes to redeem, he must exercise his right in a way adapted to the actual condition of the subject: if before a sale by the grantee, he is entitled to a reconveyance of the property; if after, to the proceeds in the hands of the grantee, subject to the payment of the debt; and the vendees are in no wise bound to see to the application of the purchase money. In truth, they are substantially purchasers from the mortgagor himself, through his duly constituted agent; and it would be a grievous iniquity, if the principal, after a sale under his lawful authority, could turn round and reclaim the property from the innocent purchasers.

It is contended, however, on the part of the plaintiff, that the power of sale vested in the grantee is void, under the authority of Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306. That case is a departure from the English doctrine, now well settled, (1 Lomax's Dig. 322; Coote on Mortg. 128,) that a mortgagee may sell the property after forfeiture, under a power given for that purpose in the mortgage deed; a doctrine recognized in New York, and the practice there regulated by statute. 4 Kent's Comm. 141. In Chowning v. Cox &c. it was decided, for reasons lucidly and cogently stated, that the mortgagee could not thus, by his own act, foreclose the equity of redemption. But 179 that decision has no *application to the case before us. Here there was no forfeiture, and no foreclosure: no forfeiture, because the right of redemption was not limited in point of time; and no foreclosure, because the sale was not made to enforce a forfeiture. It was made by the mortgagee, not in that character,—not as a creditor coercing the payment of his debt, but as a trustee appointed to possess, control, manage, and dispose of the estate, with unlimited discretion, not merely for his own benefit, but for that of the grantor likewise. There are no considerations of justice or policy against the exercise of such a power, in which the grantor must be considered as giving his tacit concurrence; as much so as if he were present at the sale, and acquiescing therein; which, according to Taylor's adm'rs &c. v. Chowning, 3 Leigh 654, (the supplement to Chowning v. Cox &c.) renders a sale by the mortgagee valid, though made by way of foreclosure. It would hardly be doubted, I presume, that a debtor may by power of attorney authorize a creditor to sell his land, receive the purchase money, retain the amount of the debt, and account for the residue; and that a conveyance of the title and surrender of possession, for the better exercise of the power, would be unobjectionable. A trust is not incompatible with a mortgage security. A mortgagee in possession is a trustee, with authority to receive, and accountable for, the rents and profits. He may purchase the subject from the mortgagor, and, a fortiori, sell it by his permission to another. If the possession of the mortgagee is conferred by the contract, and no time is limited for the payment of the debt, the security bears a considerable resemblance to the vivum vadium of the common law, and also to the Welsh mortgage; in both of which there is no forfeiture and no foreclosure; and in the latter of which, if not in the former also, there may be a redemption at any time. Coote on Mortg. 9,

180 207, 517. In such a security, *there is no reason why the mortgagee may not be empowered, in addition to or in lieu of the profits, to apply the capital itself, from time to time, to the extinguishment of the debt; and for that purpose to convert it from land into money.

Thus, whether the transaction is to be regarded as a sale or as a mortgage, the plaintiff is entitled to no relief against the derivative purchasers; and if entitled to any against his grantee alone, he has waived it by declining an account. In my opinion, therefore, the circuit court did right in dismissing the plaintiff's bill.

ALLEN, J. The principal question in this case will depend upon the construction of the deed of 1816. The extrinsic circumstances in evidence furnish but little aid in determining whether it is to be construed as a mortgage or an absolute sale. The deed is in the ordinary form of an absolute conveyance, conveying to the grantee the various interests described; and then comes the clause which gives rise to the difficulty. "It is agreed and understood by and between the said G. J. Floyd and C. L. Harrison, that in case the said Harrison or his heirs or assigns shall not be able to make the aforesaid sum of 200 dollars out of the estate hereinbefore conveyed, that then the said Floyd shall refund the same to the said Harrison or his heirs or assigns, with lawful interest from this date till paid, or such part of the said 200 dollars as the said Harrison shall not be able to realize as aforesaid." In the absence of all proof to the contrary, it seems to me that the terms here used import a loan of money, and nothing more. The consideration mentioned in the deed is to be refunded, with interest from the date of the agreement. It is clear that the parties did not contemplate any beneficial occupation of the premises by the grantee; for in that event the profits, it is to be presumed, would have equalled the interest.

181 The parties contemplated *an immediate sale, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the sum advanced; and there was a personal covenant to refund the money with interest, or such part of it as might not be realized by the sale. Under this covenant, it seems to me there could be no doubt, that if Harrison had applied to a court of equity to foreclose the deed as a mortgage, and upon a sale of the property the amount had not been realized, he would have been entitled to a personal decree for the residue, the deed itself reciting and embodying an express agreement to refund. The absence of a covenant to pay the money will not make it the less a mortgage, if it appears that the conveyance was originally intended as a security for the payment of money. 1 Powell on Mortg. 119 a. note (K), and the cases there cited. But where, as in this case, there is such a covenant contained in the conveyance, it is difficult to conceive how the instrument can be construed to be any thing more than a security. In the case of Howard v. Harris, 2 Chan. Cas. 147, the judge, in decreeing redemption, added, that he did so the rather because the defendant had a covenant for the repayment of his money, and therefore he had it in his power to have made it a mortgage at any time. The same construction, it seems to me, must be given to this instrument. The parties not contemplating a beneficial occupation of the premises, but a sale to raise the money, and the grantor having covenanted to repay with interest from the date, he could not have denied his liability for the debt. This distinguishes the case from Conway's ex'ors v. Alexander, 7 Cranch 218. In that case there was no covenant to repay, nor any evidence of a loan; and the chief justice observed, that an action at law could not have been maintained for the recovery of the money, and if, to a bill praying a sale, and a decree for so much as might remain due, the grantor had answered that this was a sale and not a mortgage, clear proof must *have been produced to justify a decree against him. If the grantee, then, could have treated this as a mortgage, the rule that a mortgage cannot be a mortgage on one side only, but must be mutual, applies, and governs the case. And this rule operates, though the rights of the parties may be in other respects different: as in the case cited in Talbot v. Braddyl, 1 Vern. 395,—if A. lend upon a mortgage, with a proviso to redeem on payment of a certain sum at the end of two years, there one side cannot foreclose till the end of the two years, but the mortgagor may come before and redeem. And so e converso, though the grantee here could not proceed on the personal covenant until after a sale, the grantor could at any time redeem before a sale, upon paying the amount secured. The contract, viewed as an absolute sale, would be most unequal and oppressive. Under that construction, the grantee could either retain the property and reap the profits without account, or, whenever he thought proper, proceed to sell. He was sure of his advance with interest, under any circumstances, and entitled to all he might make in addition. And the grantor, in the mean time, could take no step to relieve himself. If the property were depreciating, he could neither redeem it nor enforce a sale. For whenever it is conceded that he had a right to relieve himself from this contingent liability by requiring a sale, the deed loses its character of an absolute sale, and can only be viewed as a security. If the conveyance in its inception was a mortgage, the absence of a provision for redemption cannot affect it. Where it is doubtful whether an absolute or conditional sale, or a mortgage, was intended, the want of such a provision is a circumstance entitled to proper consideration. But where the instrument was intended as a security, the absence of a provision to redeem, or express stipulations to prevent it, will not change its character. 1 Powell on Mortg. 119 a.

183 *If the deed in its inception was a mortgage, the power to sell, according to Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306, is invalid, and the right of redemption is not barred as against the defendants, purchasers with notice; for the deeds under which they held disclosed the right of the original grantor. The doctrine in Chowning v. Cox &c. may be inconvenient, and an unnecessary interference with the rights of adult parties. But the case has been recognized since as law, and very recently in Breckenridge v. Auld & others, 1 Rob. 148. I am not disposed, when we have but a bare court, to disturb it. The distinction taken between this case and that, seems to me to be unsubstantial. Whether the sale be made to enforce the forfeiture after the day of payment is passed, or to raise the money in pursuance of a power conferred in the instrument, it equally militates against the principle which lies at the foundation of the rule,—the power of the creditor over his debtor, and the incompatibility of a due exercise of the powers and duties of a trustee, with the relation of creditor.

I think, therefore, that the decree is erroneous and should be reversed.

STANARD, J. I concur unreservedly in the conclusion of my brother Baldwin, that the decree of the circuit court, denying, under the circumstances of the case, the aid of equity to the plaintiff below against the purchaser of the land, ought to be affirmed.

Some interesting questions have been earnestly and elaborately discussed, the resolution of which is not essential to the conclusion in which I have averred my concurrence. I have, however, considered those questions, and proceed briefly to state the opinions deliberately formed, or at least to which I strongly incline.

We have no information or proof of the transactions between the parties, that 184 induced the execution of the *deed from Floyd to Harrison, nor of the consideration of the deed, other than that which is furnished by the instrument itself. The deed has not a single distinct lineament of a mortgage. The final covenant, that the subject conveyed was of a given value, and if that value should not be realized, the grantor would make good the deficiency, is the only matter from which it is attempted to be implied that the conveyance was a mere security for money, and consequently that the title of the grantee was defeasible, and substantially that of a mortgagee. This implication rests for its validity on the assumption that the consideration of the deed was a debt due Harrison from Floyd, or money advanced to the latter by the former, to the amount of 200 dollars. Now, though 200 dollars is stated to be the consideration of the conveyance, it does not follow that that was the consideration, much less that it was in numero the amount of a previous debt from Floyd to Harrison, or of money then advanced. The transaction might, in perfect consistency with the deed, have been an exchange of property, the consideration from Harrison being other property; or the consideration might have been a collateral duty to him from Floyds.

The subject conveyed to Harrison was in all probability most precarious, or at least so deemed by the parties, and they might fairly stipulate, to avert total loss from Harrison, that to a certain extent its productiveness should be guaranteed by Floyd. If such was the nature of the transaction, every semblance of a mortgage is obliterated.

The deed is an absolute one, the result of an actual sale, in which, in place of a general warranty of the vendor, is substituted a guarantee of value to a limited amount, on a consideration which may have exceeded the amount of the guarantee, though short of the possible amount that might be realized from the subject 185 conveyed. In this view of the *case, it was a contract of hazard as to value beyond 200 dollars. The deed contains nothing that forbids us from taking this view of it. The conduct of the parties evinces that they so regarded the transaction. For a period of more than ten years, during which Harrison was dealing with the property as his own, no claim or act of Floyd brought in question the title of Harrison. The first movement of Floyd after the lapse of more than ten years, is one not proceeding on the ground of rights reserved by or implied from his deed to Harrison, but one impliedly renouncing such rights, and by a fraudulent confederacy with Harrison, seeking to place Harrison's reconveyance to him in advance of the conveyances made by Harrison to others. The acts of the parties reflect back on the original deed, and justify a court of equity (at least when relief is sought by confederates in fraud) in measuring and limiting their claims as they have measured and limited them by their own acts, and forbearing to give activity and effect to an equity which those acts shew was not contemplated by the parties.

But the most interesting question that has been discussed is on the postulate that the deed from Floyd conveyed but a defeasible interest to Harrison, with a power to him to sell: and the question is whether, such being assumed as the plain effect of the deed, Harrison could sell any part of the real subject conveyed, and by his sale and conveyance fairly made, passed to his vendee an indefeasible estate. On the part of the appellant it is insisted, that such sale and conveyance would have still left in Floyd an equity of redemption, and that as to him the estate of Harrison's grantee would continue to be defeasible. For this proposition the case of Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306, is relied on. I do not mean in this place to bring in question the authority of that case, having strict regard to its particular circumstances, and the 186 limitations on its doctrine *deducible from the sequel to that case, reported in 3 Leigh 654. It may however be remarked in passing, that that case was argued and decided without any reference to or notice of the decisions of the courts of Westminster and New York, on the general question respecting the efficacy of a power in a mortgage deed, authorizing the mortgagee, in particular contingencies, to sell the land, and pass an indefeasible estate to the vendee. That such sale with such effect may be made under such power, is the established doctrine of the english courts, and of the court of equity in New York; and that doctrine, as so sanctioned, seems to have been wholly overlooked by counsel and court in the argument and decision of the case of Chowning v. Cox &c. These considerations, though they may not warrant the reversal of the decision in the case of Chowning v. Cox &c. are most cogent to limit its authority to the particular case then in judgment, and forbid the application of general remarks used in that case, or argumentative expansions of general principles inferred from it, to other cases as within the reason of that case.

The case of Chowning v. Cox &c. coupled with that of Taylor's adm'rs &c. v. Chowning, presented the following traits. A conveyance was made by a debtor to a creditor to secure the payment of a debt, and with power to the creditor as trustee, in default of the payment of the debt at a specified time, to make sale of the land, discharge the debt, and pay the surplus to the debtor. Before the sale was made, the parties got involved in litigation, and the debtor, resisting the right of the creditor to sell, had obtained an injunction to prevent the sale. The parties remaining in this antagonistic position, the injunction was dissolved, and the sale was made in invitum as respected the debtor. So far the case appeared when the original cause was brought to judgment: and the court then decided that the trustee was but mortgagee, and 187 that, his sale notwithstanding, *the debtor's equity of redemption was extant. The decision of the court was applied to a case in which, ostensibly, the sale was made by a party who was but mortgagee, against the assent and in spite of the active resistance of the debtor, while there were matters in litigation between them which might influence the extent of the debt chargeable on the land. The power to sell was claimed by virtue of a provision in the deed, by which that power was to arise in the event of the default of the mortgagor. Now, looking to the original principle on which courts of equity have interposed and reduced that which had become absolute in law to a defeasible estate, it is ascertained that it was to relieve against a forfeiture. That forfeiture, in the ordinary mortgage, accrued to the mortgagee by rendering his estate at law absolute. Courts of equity interposed to avert this forfeiture, which made the estate at law absolute in the mortgagee; and it soon became a canon of that court that no stipulation between the parties, where the conveyance was a mere security for money, should extinguish this equity. Proceeding on these principles, it was certainly plausible to treat the stipulation for power to dispose of the land to another, free from the equity of redemption, to arise on a subsequent default of the mortgagor, as partaking of the nature of a forfeiture; and as the parties could not stipulate that an absolute estate should vest and abide in the mortgagee on any future default of the mortgagor, such stipulation could not be effectual to enable the mortgagee, as a consequence of any such default by the mortgagor, to pass an indefeasible estate to a third person. On this principle the court of equity might, in apparent consistency with the principle of its original interference, have interfered to relieve against the mitigated forfeiture of a power in the mortgagee to sell, and extinguish the equity of redemption, on the subsequent default of the mort-188 gator. On this principle *I think the case of Chowning v. Cox &c. must rest. Beyond it, I do not deem it authority; and even to that extent, it is confronted by the adjudications of the english and New York courts.

The effort of the counsel for the appellant has been to extract from the case of Chowning v. Cox &c. (in which he is countenanced by some of the general expressions of the court) this general principle, that a power to sell and convey real estate, free from an equity of redemption in the party who by conveyance creates the power, cannot be exercised effectually, if the party to whom the power is given is entitled as creditor or incumbrancer to the proceeds of the sale, in whole or in part. To that extent the case of Chowning v. Cox &c. is not authority; and as I humbly conceive, if the general reasons of the court cover such a principle, they do not consist with well established doctrines. My opinion is, that according to established doctrines, a creditor may act as trustee for his debtor, and the debtor may impart to a trustee, though that trustee be his creditor, a power to convey an indefeasible estate on a fair and bona fide sale to a third person, notwithstanding the whole or part of the proceeds may come to the creditor; at least when such power is exercised without any distinct effort by the debtor to recal the power, on grounds that ostensibly jeopard an honest and fair exercise of it. And this conforms to multiform and unquestioned transactions of society, embracing interests numerous and important. Property is conveyed in trust for the payment of debts and the support of the family of the grantor, with power to keep it together, to expend money in improvements, and to sell at discretion to pay debts, and the charges of keeping and improving the property and supporting the family. The trustee makes large advances before sale, and can get reimbursement by sale only. The power of sale is exercised, and years afterwards it is 189 *ascertained that the sale was so made (and that too at a fair and full price) by the trustee, to reimburse what is honestly due him. Yet if the principle attempted to be extracted from Chowning v. Cox &c. be sound, law and equity must regard the sale as unavailing to give an indefeasible title; the power of the trustee would be defeated and annulled by the fact that he was interested in the sale, and the purchaser under him would be but a mortgagee. A testator by his will devises to his executor his real estate, in trust to sell at his discretion for the payment of debts, and the executor happens to be a creditor, (a case probably of frequent occurrence). Has it ever been surmised that the interest of the executor as creditor disables him from executing the trust under the will, so as to convey on a fair sale an indefeasible estate in the property sold? A large part of the business of society is transacted by agency, the agent to whom the power of sale is confided being creditor for advances, or other dealings of the party who confides his property with him for sale. Has it ever been supposed that under such sales the purchaser takes but a defeasible estate, if the agent be the creditor of the owner, and the sale be made to provide the means of paying his debt? When a conveyance is made in trust, with general power in the trustee to sell and convey an absolute estate, assent is given in the most formal manner to the sale that may be made by the trustee, he and his vendee acting bona fide. In the case of Taylor's adm'rs &c. v. Chowning, 3 Leigh 654, the sale was sustained, though made under a power given to a mortgagee, to arise on a subsequent default of the mortgagor; on the ground of the acquiescence of the mortgagor in the exercise of the power of sale, implied from the fact of knowledge of the sale, and his forbearance to interpose any objection at the sale to the exercise of the power. Was this evidence of acquiescence stronger than that afforded by the 190 solemn *creation of a general trust to be exercised by making a sale, and the continued declaration of the purpose to have the power so exercised, which the unquestioned continuance of the trust imported? If the proof by parol, that the creator of the power knows that it is about to be executed and forbears to interpose an objection to its exercise, be adequate to secure to the purchaser under the power an indefeasible estate, must not his solemn declaration under hand and seal, unretracted, of his assent to the creation and exercise of the power, give equal security to the purchaser?

I take this occasion to state what in substance I orally stated from the bench, in expressing my concurrence in the decree that was entered in the case of Breckenridge v. Auld & others, but which I inadvertently failed to reduce to writing, and to have published as part of the report of that case.

My concurrence in the decree in that case was in no degree influenced by the case of Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306. In that case Auld, who sold to Strider, had an absolute deed from Breckenridge, who had no interest in the land but that arising from a secret trust between him and Auld. The deed to Auld was absolute, for the purpose of enabling him to make sale of the land. Such being the situation of the title, Auld, as the fee simple owner, made sale of the land to Strider by a contract entirely fair on the part of Strider, and Strider took possession. In this state of things, Breckenridge made known and asserted his title under the secret trust. Had Strider insisted on his purchase, my unhesitating opinion was that it ought not to have been invalidated in deference to the claim of Breckenridge under his secret trust, and that so far as Strider was concerned, Breckenridge was as much bound as if he himself had made the sale. The case of Chowning v. Cox &c. in its utmost latitude, was unavailing to defeat a fair purchase from one held out to the 191 world as the *fee simple owner, and so held out for the very purpose of making the sale. But in that case Strider, so far from insisting on his purchase, was a plaintiff before the court below, asking a rescission of the contract. Breckenridge also asked for a rescission; and as to Auld, as between him and Breckenridge, he was but an incumbrancer, having no substantial interest in the question whether the land remained Breckenridge's, charged with his incumbrance, or Strider's, subject to the same charge. So far then as respected the question whether the sale to Strider should be sustained, both the parties having substantial interest in that question concurred in asking that the sale should be rescinded: and on that ground only, I concurred in the decree rescinding the contract.

Decree affirmed.

192 *Hendricks & Others v. Compton's Ex'or.

July, 1843, Lewisburg.

Laches—Injunction to Judgment—Neglect to Make Defence at Law.*—An obligation given on the retainer of counsel to defend the obligor on a charge of forgery, is assigned by the counsel, and judgment is obtained thereupon by the assignees, on which judgment execution issues, under which a forthcoming bond is taken, and judgment is rendered thereupon. After these proceedings, without any defence having been made at law, and without any excuse for not making it, an injunction is obtained on the ground that the obligor was induced to employ the obligee, by the menace that if he did not, the obligee would act as counsel against him in aid of the prosecution. HELD, the injunction should be dissolved and the bill dismissed: for if in law such a contract was valid, a court of equity has no right to absolve the party from it; and if in law the contract was invalid, the defence should have been made in that forum.

On the 26th of February 1824, John Compton junior exhibited his bill to the county court of Tazewell, setting forth, that on the 1st of December 1821, he executed his obligation under seal to John Linton, for 100 dollars; that at the time of executing the same, he was under an arrest upon the charge of forging a bill of sale; that Linton advised the prosecution against the complainant, and the complainant has reason to believe that the prosecution would not have been instituted against him, if it had not been for Linton; that after the complainant was arrested, Linton informed him there would be no attorney for the commonwealth at the called court, and said he would be damned if he did not appear at the called court and prosecute the complainant, unless the complainant employed him; and that the complainant became alarmed, and executed his obligation to Linton. The complainant represents that 193 Linton told him a falsehood, for he (Linton) knew *that the attorney for the commonwealth would be at the called court; states that at the time he executed the obligation to Linton, he was unacquainted with him, but his friends advised him that it was not safe to rest his defence in the hands of Linton, and he was therefore compelled to employ other counsel, who are justly entitled to their fees, because they did not act the same dishonourable part; and farther states that Linton did in fact go before the justice of the peace, before whom the complainant was examined upon the charge aforesaid, and asked questions against him; that the complainant asked the justice to continue his examination until the next day, in order that he might procure a material witness, and Linton informed the justice he had no such right. These actings and doings of Linton, the complainant insist, are fraudulent and unjust, and contrary to equity and good conscience. The prayer of the bill is that Hendricks & Byars the assignees of Linton, and the said Linton, may be made defendants, and be enjoined from all proceedings on the judgment on the forthcoming bond, obtained against the complainant and his sureties.

The answer of Linton states, that he was employed in a suit between Compton and one Powers, for some slaves; that at the trial the bill of sale mentioned in the complainant's bill was used, and it was alleged to be a forgery; that the court decided against the plaintiff; and that the same evening (as well as the respondent recollects), he saw the plaintiff on trial for the supposed forgery. The respondent states, that he might then have asked questions to explain the matter, and might have given his opinion to the justice upon any question that might then have arisen; that the justice sent the complainant on to an examining court, and the complainant was put under a guard at the house where respondent then boarded; that on the application of the complainant, an agree-

194 *him and the respondent, that respondent would appear at the called court for fifty dollars; that the next day Compton, becoming alarmed by the remarks of several persons, came to respondent and asked him for his opinion; that respondent gave it as his opinion that he would unquestionably be acquitted at the called court; that Compton asked respondent what he would take if he was cleared, with the understanding that otherwise nothing was to be paid; that respondent agreed, if he would double the amount, to make that contract with him; and that it was agreed upon between them, and a new obligation executed with that condition. The respondent states that he then returned to the court which he had been attending, but quitted it while yet in session, and attended the called court, and in good faith discharged his duty as counsel; that young mr. Compton, or a gentleman who was about to marry complainant's daughter, came on to the county, and employed Charles C. Johnston esq. and endeavoured to employ Benjamin Estill, at the sum of 200 dollars; that after the called court was over, respondent went with complainant to the house of Thomas Perry, where they then settled; that respondent then either took a new instrument, or the condition was torn off by consent, he does not recollect which; and that Compton the same night executed to respondent another note, perhaps of 10 dollars, to prosecute a suit against the prosecutor; a proof that he had not at that time the opinion of respondent which he now professes.

Hendricks & Byars in their answer, (after excepting to the bill upon the ground that there is no equity in it,) say, that being assignees merely of Linton, they know nothing of the contract between the complainant and Linton, or of the attending circumstances, of their own knowledge; that all their knowledge of these matters is derived from Linton, to whose answer they refer. They add, that before bringing suit at law, their agent wrote to 195 *the complainant once, perhaps twice, asking if he had any defence to make against the payment of the obligation; and never receiving any answer, they supposed the complainant had no defence.

Thomas Perry, a witness to the obligation, deposed that it was executed in consideration that Linton should defend the complainant against a prosecution for forgery, and the condition was torn off in the presence of Compton, Linton observing that the condition was now of no account. Linton, he says, frequently observed, before it was executed, and in the presence of the plaintiff, that if the plaintiff did not employ him, he (Linton) would prosecute him and send him to the penitentiary; or words to that amount. "Linton, as this deponent believes, was drinking, and going on in his usual way." Being asked, "Did the plaintiff appear to be alarmed at the threats of Linton?" he answered, "He appeared to be agitated, either from such threats or from his peculiar situation."

James M'Neil deposed, that he recollected "hearing Linton say to Compton, that if he (Compton) did not employ him, he (Linton) would send him to the penitentiary, or words to that amount; and that he (Linton) would prosecute said Compton, if he did not employ him."

David M'Comas deposed, that Linton was busy in starting the prosecution against Compton for forgery, by telling Powers that he ought to prosecute him. Deponent has an indistinct recollection that Linton had something to say against Compton on his examination before the justice. He further recollects that Compton asked the justice for a continuance of his case, in order to procure some evidence; and a doubt arising with the justice whether he ought to grant a continuance, the justice called upon deponent for his opinion, (he being the attorney for the commonwealth,) and Linton asked him to say that a continuance could not be granted, in 196 *order to alarm Compton, that he Linton might obtain a fee; or words to that amount. He well recollects that Linton appeared for Compton at the called court.

William Wynn deposed, that he recollected hearing Linton tell Compton he was determined to appear against him at the called court, whether he should be employed or not, and would send him to the penitentiary, unless Compton employed him; that his threats on that occasion were well calculated to alarm any man who knew not Linton, and was so peculiarly circumstanced as Compton was.

Pending the suit the complainant died, and it was revived in the name of his executor.

On the 2d of August 1838, the cause having been pending in the county court more than a year, was, under the act of February 12, 1838, (Sess. Acts of 1838, ch. 64, p. 61,) removed, on the motion of the defendants, to the circuit superior court of the county.

On the 25th of April 1839, the cause came on before that court. And that court decreed that the injunction be made perpetual, and that the defendants pay to the plaintiff his costs.

From this decree an appeal was allowed.

Patton for appellants. The injunction ought to have been dissolved and the bill dismissed. 1. The only plausible ground in favour of the decree is, that the obligation was extorted by Linton's threats of appearing to prosecute unless he was employed to defend, and that the obligation was therefore given under duress. Now, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the menace, if seriously made, amounted to duress, it is clear that it invalidated the obligation at law, and could have been proved under a plea of non est factum, either general or special. This being so, there is no ground for relief in equity, without a sufficient excuse alleged and 197 *at law. Faulkner's adm'x v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125; Cabell's ex'ors v. Roberts's adm'rs, Id. 580; Haden v. Garden, 7 Leigh 157. In this case no excuse is offered, nor any reason assigned, for not making the defence at law. But 2, the threat, supposing it proved in its most indefensible terms and spirit, does not amount to duress. Compton was not in the custody of Linton. The threat was, that he would do that which the law required should be done by some counsel, and from which no injury could result to Compton. If innocent, he would probably be acquitted, no matter who prosecuted him; if guilty, it was no threat from which he was entitled to be protected, that he would be visited with punishment. 3. It is not pretended that the consideration of the bond was that Linton should refrain from prosecuting; and if it were, a court of equity would not relieve a party from an obligation given on such consideration. The consideration of the bond was in terms (it is distinctly admitted in the bill) that Linton, a lawyer, should give his aid in defending Compton from a criminal prosecution. This was a valid, legal consideration. However censurable, in a moral point of view, may have been the attorney's conduct in holding out to Compton the inducement to employ him which he is represented to have held out, and although his course was not such as comports with the delicacy and scrupulous honour which the members of the profession should and generally do observe, it is nevertheless submitted that such conduct cannot vitiate the obligation given for the retainer, in the hands of bona fide assignees, and after the professional assistance had been faithfully rendered and successfully exerted. It is alike against law and reason, that upon any such grounds a party should be absolved from the obligation to pay, for services actually rendered, the compensation stipulated to be given for them.

198 *The decree is at all events erroneous (even upon the principles of the court below) in not giving the appellants a decree over against Linton.

There was no counsel for the appellee.

STANARD, J. The injunction in this case was sought and obtained by the testator of the appellee, to a judgment on an obligation given on the retainer of counsel to defend the party on a charge of forgery. The ground on which it was sought was not that such an obligation, on such a consideration, was by law invalid, for that would be untenable; nor that the service had not been rendered, for it confessedly was; but that the obligor was induced to employ the obligee by the menace, that if he did not, the obligee would act as counsel against him in aid of the prosecution. That the conduct imputed to the obligee is a gross violation of professional delicacy, propriety, and even morality, no one with just perceptions of professional selfrespect and duty would controvert. Whether, however, it would amount to such coercion, duress or extortion, as to invalidate the contract for compensation for the services thus in a manner imposed on the party, is a question purely legal, and proper for the adjudication of a court of law, on being presented to that forum as a defence to a suit for the compensation. Without considering that question in this case, it suffices to say, that if the law would not sustain such defence, in other words if in law such a contract was valid, a court of equity has no right to absolve the party from it; and if in law the contract was invalid, the defence should have been made in that forum. In this case no excuse is suggested, or even intimated, much less proved, for not making the defence at law. On the contrary, after the obligation passed into the hands of assignees, 199 who, for *aught that appears, are honest claimants for value, judgment at law is suffered to pass in their favour without an attempt at such defence; and it is only after the party, being pressed by execution, has delayed it by a forthcoming bond, and is again pressed by execution on the bond, that this defence is brought forward in a court of equity against these assignees. It is not fit that the aid of that court should be given to a party asking it on such grounds and under such circumstances; especially as it appears that after the service was rendered, and when the party was free from the influence of a pending prosecution, and of the apprehended aid that the obligee might give to it, he ratified the contract for the compensation by making it unconditional.

My opinion therefore is, that the injunction ought not to have been granted; and that the decree perpetuating it is erroneous, and ought to be reversed with costs, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed, with costs to the appellants in the county and superior courts.

The other judges concurring, decree entered accordingly.

200 *Syrus and Others v. Allison.

July, 1848, Lewisburg.

Ejectment*—Demise of Insolvent Debtor.—Where a person taken in execution is discharged as an insolvent debtor, the estate in lands belonging to him at the time of such discharge is, by the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 134, § 34, p. 538, so completely vested in the sheriff of the county wherein such lands lie, that an ejectment for such lands cannot afterwards be maintained on the demise of the insolvent debtor, while the execution remains unsatisfied.

This was a supersedeas to a judgment of the circuit court of Cabell, in an action of ejectment for lands in that county. The declaration was filed in April 1838, and contained two counts; the first upon the demise of William Allison, the second upon the demise of Stephen Wilson. Thomas Syrus, George P. Brumfield and Willis M'Keand were admitted defendants, and pleaded the general issue. At the trial a special verdict was returned, which found that William Allison, one of the lessors, was discharged from custody on the 27th of June 1826, under the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, by the warrant of two justices of the peace, and then and there rendered a schedule, containing no estate of any kind; "that he has acquired no title, or seisin, or right of possession to the land in controversy, by possession or any otherwise howsoever, since he took the insolvent debtor's oath as aforesaid, but that his only title or right was acquired before that time;" that upon taking the oath aforesaid, the said William Allison made no conveyance of the land in controversy to the sheriff; and that the execution described in the warrant and schedule still remains due and wholly unpaid. (The execu-201 tion appeared by the *warrant and schedule to have been at the suit of William Anderson for the benefit of John Laidley.) If, upon these facts, the court should be of opinion that the suit for the land could be sustained upon the demise of William Allison, then the jury found for the plaintiff, on that demise, the land laid down in the plat of the surveyor (returned in the cause) within certain described lines, and one cent damages. But if the court should be of opinion that the action could not be sustained upon the demise of the said Allison for the said land before described, ("and to which the said Allison has not acquired any right or title whatever as aforesaid, since taking the insolvent debtor's oath as aforesaid") then they found for the defendants. As to the demise laid in the declaration in the name of Stephen Wilson, and all the residue of the land in the declaration mentioned, they found for the defendants.

On the 2d of October 1839, the court pronounced its opinion that the law on the special verdict was for the plaintiff, and entered judgment that the plaintiff recover against the defendants his term to come in the lands mentioned in the declaration as demised by Allison, and described as aforesaid, together with the damages assessed and the costs of suit; "subject however to sale by the sheriff of Cabell county who was in office on the 27th June 1826, for the satisfaction of the judgment creditor at whose suit the said William Allison took the oath of insolvency, as found in the verdict."

B. H. Smith for plaintiffs in error. It is plain that the judgment must be reversed; for the verdict, while it ascertains that Allison acquired no title to the land since he took the insolvent debtor's oath, does not find that he had any title before that period. But a reversal on this ground would merely lead to a new trial; whereas there is another ground on which the court should give judgment that the plain-

202 tiff in ejectment *take nothing. From the time that Allison was discharged as an insolvent debtor, he had no estate in the lands in controversy: all the estate which he had therein before that discharge, became, from the time of the discharge, vested in the sheriff of the county wherein the lands lie. 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 134, § 34, p. 538; Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 735; 1 Rob. Pract. 554, 5. The recent decision in Dunn v. Price, 11 Leigh 203, is not in conflict with Shirley v. Long; at least not as it regards the present case. Ejectment can only be sustained upon a legal title. Adams on Ejectment 32, 33, and notes. In Hopkins &c. v. Ward &c., 6 Munf. 38, it was held that the cestui que trust might maintain ejectment upon a demise in his own name. But there, though the land was conveyed to a trustee, the trustee had by his deed declared the land to be in trust for the benefit of another; and by the statute, the possession of the trustee in such a case is transferred to the person entitled to the use, as perfectly as if he had been enfeoffed with livery of seisin. 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 99, § 29, p. 370. And though in that case the land was subject to a charge created on it in favour of the trustee, yet the purposes of the trust had been satisfied as to the trustee, and a release of this charge might well have been presumed. Whereas, in the present case, it is expressly found that the amount of the execution still remains wholly unpaid, and there is no ground on which a conveyance can be presumed from the sheriff to the insolvent debtor. The facts of this case as effectually preclude such presumption, as they did in Hodsdon v. Staple, 2 T. R. 684, where the unsatisfied term outstanding in trustees barred the recovery of the heir at law, though he claimed subject to the charge. Allison had, at most, but an equity of redemption; and there is no case in which the holder of such a mere equity can maintain ejectment. See Adams on Ejectment 32, 3, and 81-8. *After a mortgage is forfeited, ejectment cannot be maintained by the mortgagor. There can be no reason in the present case for departing from the general rule which requires a legal title to maintain the action: there is no principle, nor any consideration of policy, which calls for such departure.

No counsel argued the case for defendant in error.

STANARD, J. The special verdict in this case expressly finds that the lessor of the plaintiff has acquired no title whatever to the land in controversy since he took the oath of insolvency, and does not distinctly find that he had title before. Though I think it highly probable that there was satisfactory proof of such previous title, (for unless there was, the enquiry into the effect of the oath of insolvency, and of the discharge of the insolvent, was useless, and a special verdict unsuited to the case) and that the jury intended to find that fact as a part of the case, yet the strict rules which govern the construction of such verdicts seem to forbid that a fact, indispensable to make any case for the lessor of the plaintiff, should be supplied by implication. Without that fact, the lessor of the plaintiff could not recover, though his oath and discharge as an insolvent left in him a right that would support an ejectment for land owned by him at the time of taking the oath. If then such an action could be supported notwithstanding the oath of insolvency, the special verdict would probably be deemed imperfect, and the proper disposition of the case would be a reversal of the judgment of the court, and the award of a venire de novo. Should it, however, be the opinion of this court, that the effect of the oath and discharge of the lessor of the plaintiff as an insolvent, is to transfer his title in lands to the sheriff of the county in which they may be situate, so as to 204 disable him, at least *while the debt remains unsatisfied, to maintain an action of ejectment on his previous title, in such case the fact of such previous title becomes immaterial, a venire de novo to supply it becomes useless, and the special verdict in this case contains matter sufficient on which final judgment can be rendered.

Does then the legal title of the insolvent, in lands owned by him at the time he takes the oath and is discharged, pass from him and vest in the sheriff of the county in which the lands are situate; and can the insolvent maintain ejectment for such lands on his demise, while the debt under the execution, for which he took the oath and was discharged, remains unsatisfied? The express words of the statute furnish an affirmative answer to the first member of the interrogatory; and from it, a negative answer to the second member seems to be a necessary consequence. The statute declares that all the estate and interest that the insolvent has, and can lawfully depart withal, shall vest in the sheriff of the county in which the lands may be. It is not a qualified or equitable title, or a right in the nature of a lien, that the law declares shall be vested in the sheriff, but all the estate and interest therein of the insolvent. Such being the explicit declaration of the statute, there is no room for a constructive doubt of the intention of the legislature, incompatible with the language of that declaration, or impairing its force. The only question that could arise would be the competency of the statute, by such a provision, to work the transfer of the title from the insolvent to the sheriff. On this there can be no doubt. The same legislative power which gives to a deed sealed and delivered the effect of transferring the title of the party sealing and delivering, to his grantee, or which gives to the conveyance of a commissioner of the court of chancery the effect of transferring the title of parties to the suit in which the decree appointing the commissioner is rendered, is 205 *competent to transfer the title of the insolvent, as a consequence of his oath and discharge as such.

This naked question has not (as far as I know) been distinctly adjudicated by the court of appeals. But in the case of Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 735, the language of the judges is consonant with the opinion now expressed. And from the opinions of judge Carr and president Tucker, and the general concurrence of the other judges, in the case of Ruffners v. Lewis's ex'ors &c., 7 Leigh 720, it seems that such was the opinion of the whole court. The cases of Stoever v. Stoever, 9 Serg. & Rawle 434, and Ross &c. v. M'Junkin &c., 14 Id. 364, (for a reference to which I am indebted to my brother Allen) shew that a similar decision has been made by the courts of Pennsylvania, as to the effect on an insolvent's title and right of action, of his assignment and discharge under the insolvent laws of that state.

The opinion of the court is, that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and judgment on the special verdict entered for the plaintiffs in error.

206 *Smith v. Hunt and Others.

July, 1843, Lewisburg.

Foreign Attachment*—Plea by Assignee That Debtor is a Resident.—In a suit in equity in the circuit court of Russell, against an absent debtor having lands within the commonwealth, after a valuation of the lands had been made and returned, two persons filed petitions, setting forth that they had purchased the lands from the debtor and received conveyances of the same, and praying to be made defendants. The court ordered the plaintiff to amend his bill and make them parties, which was accordingly done. Whereupon they filed a plea alleging, that at the time the subpoena was sued out, the debtor was a resident of the county of Russell and state of Virginia, subject to the process of the common law courts of said county, and possessed of personalty sufficient to discharge the debts due by him to the plaintiff. To this plea the plaintiff demurred. HELD, the demurrer should be sustained: for the petition is only a part of the case for the purpose of having the petitioners made defendants; and so far as the record discloses, they may have been mere strangers, having no right to intermeddle. Whether the debtor was nonresident or not, was a question foreign to them, until by their answers they had shewn they had an interest in the controversy.

In this case several questions of law were argued by G. N. Johnson for the appellant, and B. R. Johnston for the appellees, upon which the court deemed it unnecessary to express an opinion. The decision of the court turned upon a question of practice; and so far as is material to understand that question, the case is sufficiently stated in the following opinion.

ALLEN, J. On the 24th of September 1835, the appellant instituted a suit in chancery against Hunt in the circuit court of Russell county, by suing out his subpoena. The subpoena, it appears from the record, is lost. On the 4th of January 1836, the plaintiff filed his bill, 207 *which was in the nature of a foreign attachment, seeking to charge the lands of the defendant as an absent debtor. The defendant Hunt has never appeared, and at a subsequent period an order of publication was taken against him; whether upon any, or, if any, a proper affidavit, it is not necessary to enquire in the present condition of the cause. An order of valuation was also taken out and executed. Afterwards, on the 20th September 1836, White and Jackson filed their petitions, alleging that they were purchasers of the lands of Hunt sought to be charged, and had received conveyances of the same, and asking to be made defendants to defend their rights. An amended bill was thereupon filed, by direction of the court, making them defendants. On the 19th of April 1837, the defendants White and Jackson filed their plea in abatement, in which, without averring or in any manner shewing that they had any interest in the subject, they allege that the original defendant Hunt was, at the date of the subpoena, a resident of the county of Russell and state of Virginia, subject to the process of the common law courts of said county, and possessed of personalty sufficient to discharge the debts due by him to the complainant. To this plea the complainant replied generally, and the cause was continued, with leave to the complainant to amend his bill. At the October rules 1837 the amended bill was filed, alleging that the claims of White and Jackson were fraudulent. At the April term 1838, the complainant, upon leave, withdrew his replication to the plea, and demurred. His demurrer was overruled, and he again replied. A jury was sworn to try the issue; and after some proceedings (certainly very irregular, but not necessary to be detailed) the jury was discharged, the defendants had leave to withdraw their plea, and the cause was sent to the rules. At the August rules 1838, the defendants

White and Jackson again pleaded in 208 abatement, that *Hunt was a resident at the date of the subpoena, and that the subpoena was executed on him. At the April term, the complainant objected to the filing of the plea. His objections were overruled. He thereupon replied; and a jury was sworn, which found that Hunt was a resident of the county of Russell until the 9th of October 1835. The cause was then placed on the docket; and coming on for hearing upon the bills and verdict, the court, being of opinion that it had no jurisdiction, dismissed the bill with costs.

The whole proceeding, it seems to me, after the order making the petitioners White and Jackson defendants, was irregular. Whether Hunt was a nonresident or not was a question foreign to them, until by their answers they had shewn that they had an interest in the controversy. So far as this record discloses, they may have been mere strangers, having no right to intermeddle. Their petition is only a part of the case for the purpose of their being made defendants. If they had shewn by their answers and the proofs, that they were bona fide purchasers of the land before the filing of the bill but after the date of the subpoena, it might then have been necessary to determine, upon enquiry into the nature of the subpoena and endorsement, or in the absence of any proof touching it, at what time the lien of the plaintiff attached; whether at the date of the subpoena, or the filing of the bill.* But as the case has proceeded, the plaintiff, though he may have had the clear right, taking either period, to subject the land to his debt, has been turned out of court at the instance of defendants who may never have had any claim to the land. I think, therefore, that the court should have sustained the demurrer to the first 209 *plea, and should have disallowed the second; and that for this reason the decree should be reversed, the pleas rejected, and all the proceedings under them set aside, and the cause remanded with leave to the defendants to answer, and for such other proceedings as may be deemed necessary to mature the cause for hearing and final decree upon the original and amended bills.

The other judges concurring, a decree was entered accordingly.

chise from the public, the use of the ferry with its appurtenant landings and outlets, and the fact of such disturbance, are all that need be established. Nor is it material whether the disturbance is by invading the plaintiff's right to the exclusive transportation and tolls, or by obstructing or impairing his navigation, or by destroying or injuring the landings and outlets. Per BALDWIN, J.

Same—Same—Declaration—Injury to Reversion.—A declaration in case by the owner of a ferry for the disturbance of his franchise, contains two counts, each of which is demurred to. The first count sets forth, in substance, that the plaintiff was possessed of a legally established ferry; that there were good and convenient roads, ways and landings for the use of the same; and that there was, and of right ought to have been, a free and uninterrupted passage for the water flowing in and down the river, so as not to affect or injure the landings, ways or roads at the ferry: and it charges that the defendants wrongfully placed obstructions in the river near the ferry and land-210 ings, by which the current of the stream was checked and diverted, *and thrown from and upon the landings (in modes particularly described); thereby occasioning the plaintiff great labor and expense, destroying or injuring the roads and landings, rendering the embarkation and debarkation difficult, and preventing the transportation of persons and property. The second count is the same, except that, instead of alleging a possession of the ferry by the plaintiff, it avers his right to the reversion thereof, expectant upon the term of his tenant, in whom the possession, use and enjoyment are charged to be: and that the grievance complained of is to the prejudice of the plaintiff's reversionary estate. HELD, both counts are good on general demurrer: dissentiente ALLEN, J., who was of opinion as to the second count, that it not being for the accruing damages consequent upon the obstruction, but by the reversioner for an injury to the inheritance, it could not be sustained without an averment in it of possession of the landings, or of some right to their use.

In an action in the circuit court of Kanawha, the following declaration was filed at August rules 1838.

George H. Patrick complains of Daniel Ruffner and Lewis Ruffner in custody &c. of a plea of trespass on the case. For that whereas, before and at the time of committing the grievances hereinafter next mentioned, the said plaintiff was possessed of a legally established ferry from the east side of Elk river at the mouth thereof to the west side thereof, during which, and until the institution of this suit, said ferry was provided with flats, skiffs and other craft necessary for the transportation of all persons, wagons, carriages, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, or other thing whatsoever across the same: and whereas also, before and at the time of committing the grievances hereinafter next mentioned, there was a good and convenient road or way and landing on each side of said river, at the ferry aforesaid, for approaching to or departing from the same, as well as for embarking and debarking all persons, wagons, by the grant of the franchise. These, and the incidental means of enjoying them, were possessed by him only, and no one else has a right to complain of the particular grievance alleged, namely the disturbance of his franchise, by which he alone 217 has sustained damage, *in the diminution of his profits. In truth, according to the case made by the declaration, the public at large could in no wise be prejudiced, but by the inability to cross the ferry safely and conveniently; and that resulted merely from the disturbance of the plaintiff's franchise; an immediate injury to him, for which he is entitled to redress.

There could be nothing in the objection that the plaintiff does not directly allege that he was possessed of the landings and outlets. By shewing the use of them to be appurtenant to the ferry, he has asserted all the possession of which the subject was susceptible. If they were private property, that can avail the defendants nothing, unless they can prove that it belonged to them; which it will be competent for them to do on the trial of the cause. The plaintiff need not assert or prove that he was the owner of the soil: the use for the purposes of the ferry is enough against a wrongdoer; and is even enough against the owner, if the right to that use has been acquired from him, or from those under whom he claims title; which is a mere matter of evidence to repel the prima facie right apparent from the enjoyment. It is true that in Saville, p. 11, pl. 29, it is asserted that in every ferry the land on both sides of the water ought to belong to the owner of the ferry, for otherwise he could not land on the other side. But this idea is repudiated in Peter v. Kendal &c., 6 Barn. & Cress. 703, in which it was held that he need not have property in the soil on either side. And this doctrine is no invasion of the right of private property; for, while the grant of the franchise takes away the defence of exclusive ownership in another, it does not prevent the defendant from asserting it in himself. If the plaintiff were even the proprietor of the soil, it would not only be unnecessary, but perhaps improper, to aver it in the declaration; inasmuch as the gravamen of the action 218 is not an injury to the soil, *but to the incorporeal right of using it as an incident of the franchise.

So, too, if the landings and outlets were parts of an established highway, the use of them for the purposes of the ferry is all the possession which the plaintiff could assert or prove; and thus, in that aspect of the case, the only question really is whether, when a ferry is lawfully established on a public road, the grantee is entitled to the use of it for landings and outlets, as appurtenant to the ferry. And upon that question I can have no doubt, even as against the owner of the soil over which the road, as a public easement, passes; though the question is not presented by the declaration, and can only arise upon the proofs. The ownership of the soil, it is true, is subject only to the public easement; but the delegation by the public of the use of that easement to the grantee of the franchise, for the purposes of exclusive transportation and tolls, is a part of the grant, and not at all incompatible with the reserved rights of the owner of the soil; who can no more obstruct the travel and carriage across, than to and from the water; and if he does so by any means, it is at one and the same time a grievance to the grantee and the public, for which each is entitled to the appropriate remedy. When the ferry is a connecting link of a public highway, to say that the grantee has no right to land or receive freight in the highway on the banks of the stream, without the consent of the owner of the soil, would be a most subtle and unreasonable proposition, and wholly at war with our statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 238, p. 261, 262, authorizing the county courts to establish ferries on public roads through water courses; the 1st section of which applies to cases where the applicant is the owner of the lands on both sides, and the 3d section extends the authority to those in which he is the owner on one side only:

which last section is obviously founded 219 upon the right of the *commonwealth to delegate the use of the easement to the grantee of the ferry, for the purposes thereof; and both sections necessarily refer the question of qualification by riparian ownership to the decision of the county court, whose grant can only be annulled by a regular proceeding for that purpose, though it cannot affect injuriously the rights of property in others. That the grantee would have no such right against the owner of the soil, where a landing place of the ferry happens to intersect a highway, is countenanced by the cases of Chambers v. Furey, 1 Yeates' R. 167, and Cooper v. Smith, 9 Serg. & Rawle 26; but even that idea is repelled by Bayley, J., in Peter v. Kendal &c. above cited, and by chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 421, note d.

As already suggested, the defendants cannot, upon these demurrers, assert a title in themselves, or deny that of the plaintiff. The declaration charges, in effect, a lawful possession of the franchise, and a wrongful disturbance thereof by the defendants; all which is admitted by the demurrers. Moreover, the validity of the franchise cannot be questioned by the defendants in any stage of this collateral action, otherwise than by shewing a title in themselves paramount to that granted by the public. This can only be done by plea or proofs. If the landings be not in a public highway, and the defendants shew a right to the soil, the plaintiff may meet that defence by replying or proving a right to the use of them for the purposes of the ferry, derived from the defendants, or from their ancestors or predecessors. If the landings be in a public highway, it is out of the power of the defendants to shew a paramount title; for they can have no right to a franchise themselves. That can only be obtained from the public, in consideration of public duties in reference thereto to be performed by the grantee, for the breach or neglect of which he is liable to prosecution and *punishment.

However strong, therefore, the possible claim of the defendants to the grant of a ferry, it cannot be set up against the grant to the plaintiff or those under whom he claims: and even if the latter was obtained by a fraudulent or false suggestion, it cannot be impeached collaterally; the only remedy, if any, being by scire facias in the name of the commonwealth to repeal the grant. Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. R. 373; 2 Kent's Comm. 312; Slee v. Bloom, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 381, 7 Bac. Ar. 137; Scire Facias C. 3. No injustice is done by this doctrine to the owner of the soil over which a public road passes; for what injury does he sustain by the use of the public easement for the passage through, any more than to and from, the watercourse? It is not like the case of riparian ownership upon a navigable stream, where the public easement consists merely in its navigation; which, as the law is now settled (3 Kent's Comm. 425, 426,) gives no right to the community to land upon its banks, and interfere with the wharfage, or other exclusive enjoyment of the owner.

For these reasons, I cannot perceive the propriety of denying the plaintiff a trial before a jury upon the merits of his cause. The structure of his declaration is not such as would in any wise exonerate him from establishing by proofs a good cause of action, or debar the defendants from any lawful defence. And even if the action could be regarded as brought for a common nuisance, the declaration shews a special damage to the plaintiff, of a direct and serious nature; and whether affecting his corporeal or incorporeal hereditament,—his actual possession, or mere use and enjoyment,—his right as a member of the community, or as the owner of a franchise,—is, in that view, wholly immaterial. Nor is a general demurrer sustainable, if the plaintiff has made out a good case, however informally and immethodically.

It seems to me, however, that *there is no good objection to the declaration, whether of form or of substance; but that, on the contrary, it has been drawn with technical skill and precision.

My opinion is, that the judgment of the circuit court is erroneous in sustaining instead of overruling the demurrers, and ought to be reversed.

ALLEN, J. The first count of the declaration avers that the plaintiff was possessed of a legally established ferry; that there was a road or landing on each side of the river for approaching the ferry; and that the defendants had injured and obstructed these landings, whereby the plaintiff had been subjected to inconvenience and expense. The second count sets out a possession by the lessee of the plaintiff; describes the injury to the landings as in the first count; and concludes with averring that such injury is to the prejudice of the plaintiff's rights as reversioner. It is not averred directly in either count, that the plaintiff was possessed of or entitled to the use of the landings, except so far as such possession or use may be held to be incident to the franchise itself.

A ferry, we are informed, is in respect of the landings, and not of the water (Saville, p. 11, pl. 29); and as a consequence, that the land on both sides ought to belong to the owner of the ferry. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Chambers v. Furey, 1 Yeates 167, and in Cooper v. Smith, 9 Serg. & Rawle 26, recognized the doctrine laid down in Saville as good law, and held that the dedication of land for a public highway gave no right to others to use it without the consent of the owner, for the purpose of landing or receiving freight; that the dedication to the public was for the purpose of passage only, and, subject to that easement, the fee remained in the owner. This, it seems to me, is the true doctrine, notwithstanding the dictum in Peter v. Kendal &c., 6 Barn. & Cress. 703. That was an *action for a disturbance to a ferry by setting up another boat. To the objection that it was not averred that the plaintiff was the owner of the landings, it was replied, that ownership was not required: that the ferry owner must have the right to land, and it was sufficient if the landing was in a public road; or there might have been a grant or reservation of that right. The right to the landings was not there the subject of controversy; the injury complained of did not affect them, and it was not necessary to consider or determine under what circumstances the owner of the ferry might use the road.

A ferry is a valuable franchise created by law. The franchise consists in the right to demand a stipulated compensation for a particular service. Ferries are usually found on public roads; and the public having the right of passage, there can be no question that any individual, in the exercise of this right, may transport himself and property across the stream, and use the road as a landing, and that the owner cannot obstruct him. But it does not follow that he can convert this personal right into a source of emolument, and at his own pleasure use the road as a landing for a ferry. The franchise to exact the tolls is annexed to the land, is private property, and the owner cannot be deprived of it against his consent, without just compensation.

The right of individuals to wharves, landings &c. in cities, referred to in the cases cited from Yeates and Serg. & Rawle, illustrates the doctrine. The dedication of land as a street or road does not affect the right of the owner to this species of property. There is no incompatibility between the private right and the public easement.

Our own statute seems to treat the ferry as being in respect of the landings. The owner of the land on both sides, or on one side, of the stream through which a public road passes, is authorized to apply for the establishment of a ferry. The law, 223 it is true, "contains no provision for condemning the land on the opposite side, where the person applying is the owner on but one side; but this probably was an inadvertent omission. The law clearly did not proceed upon the supposition, that when a public road was established, the rights of the owner of the soil, as to this subject, were extinguished, and that it would be competent to confer the franchise on a stranger, having no interest, absolute or qualified, in the soil. If I am correct in these views, it follows that where a direct injury is done to the landings, and the declaration proceeds for the recovery of damages for such wrong, there should be an averment of possession, or of some right to the use of the landings; some averment to put the plaintiff to the proof of his right upon the trial. If the allegation that the plaintiff is possessed of the ferry comprehends the landings as appurtenant, proof of the establishment of the ferry would suffice, and the defendant might be subjected to a double recovery for the same act; to the owner of the fee for the trespass, and to the ferry owner, who may have had a mere license to use the landing, or no other right than that of any individual in the public road.

For these reasons, I think the second count was bad. The injury alleged is to the inheritance, and consists of damage to the landings, not of the loss consequent upon the obstruction; for the reversioner had no claim on that ground. The injury is set out, and is described to be an injury to the landings. Whether the injury as averred would permanently affect the inheritance or not, is a question of fact for the jury: but the declaration should have averred some right to or interest in the subject itself.

The first count however, it seems to me, was good, and the demurrer should have been overruled. That count, after setting out the injury to the landings, avers, that 224 in consequence of this act, the plaintiff was put to "expense; persons being deterred from the use of the ferry, &c. This I think a sufficient averment of special damage arising from the public nuisance in injuring and obstructing the public road. And in a proceeding for this consequential damage to the ferry, the case of Peter v. Kendal &c. is an authority shewing that it was not necessary to aver possession of the landings. For this purpose, and where the injury goes to the enjoyment of the franchise, the grant would be sufficient as against the wrongdoer, and no question could arise as to the right to the landings. I am of opinion, therefore, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to this count, and that for this cause the judgment should be reversed.

STANARD, J. The court below having sustained a general demurrer to the declaration, the only question for this court is, whether the declaration and each count of it be so radically defective, either for want of right of action in the plaintiff, or for substantial defects in setting forth that right, as to justify the judgment sustaining the demurrer.

The first count distinctly affirms the plaintiff's possession of a lawfully established ferry, and charges certain wilful acts of the defendants, which, it is averred, consequentially impair the profits of the ferry, and subject the plaintiff to other special damage, of expense and labour in repairing the injuries (caused by the acts imputed to the defendants) to the landings used with and appurtenant to the ferry.

The averments are full and sufficient to shew a right of action, if an action can be supported by the owner of a ferry for injuries, mediate or immediate, to the landings, which diminish the profits of the ferry, and subject the owner to labour and expense in the use of his franchise.

The franchise is a right, by prescription or grant, to charge and receive toll 225 for transporting by water, from "landing to landing, persons or property.

The passage is generally across a water-course, to and from public ways on either side thereof and leading thereto, and the ferry forms the connecting link between the landings, and is substantially a continuance of the public highway. As the use of landings is indispensable to the exercise of the franchise, the right to use them is incident to the lawful ownership of the ferry; and the averment of such ownership involves the averment of a right to use the landings as appurtenant thereto. If the road to the water line on each side be a highway, the grant of the franchise, by necessary implication, passes the right to use the highways, as a necessary incident to the exercise of the franchise: if the roads be not highways, the owner of the ferry may be the owner of the soil where the landings are, or may have a right of way for the uses of his ferry from the owner of the soil: if neither of these rights exist, his title to the franchise is defective; and then the action would fail, not because the right to use the landings had not been sufficiently averred, but because the plaintiff had failed in the proof of it, by failing to prove the possession of a lawfully established ferry.

The right to use the landings is then in effect averred; and the only question is whether the acts of the defendants, and their consequences, as charged in the declaration, entitled the ferry owner to an action.

The acts and consequences are alleged to operate on a subject in which the plaintiff has a right of use, impairing the value of another right to which it is incident, and to the profitable enjoyment of which it is indispensable, and subjecting him to specific damage of labour and expense. I cannot doubt that this is an injury for the redress of which the plaintiff is entitled to his action. The right of passage on a highway is common to all citizens; and generally, for injuries to the highway, no private action can be sustained. But 226 *if any citizen, in the use of this common right, suffers special damage in his person or property from the obstruction or injury of another to the highway, he is entitled to redress by action against that other. Even though the damage consist merely of the inconvenience and expense consequent on the delay of his journey, he is entitled to his action. Rose v. Miles, 4 Mau. & Selw. 101; Greasly v. Codling &c., 2 Bingh. 263, 9 Eng. C. L. R. 407.

The second count is for an injury to the reversionary interest of the plaintiff in the ferry. In an action for the injury to such an interest, the declaration must expressly charge that the act complained of is to the injury of the reversion, unless the act charged be of such nature that it must be to the injury of the reversion. Jackson v. Pesked, 1 Mau. & Selw. 234. As a proper counterpart of this rule, the declaration is not good though it charges the act as an injury to the reversion, if the act charged cannot in its nature be considered as detrimental to the reversion; as for example, entering and taking the growing crops or fruits, to which the tenant would be entitled. The second count in this case charges that the act of the defendants, and its consequences, are injurious to the reversion. The only enquiry therefore, in deciding on the sufficiency of the count, is whether the act and its consequences, as charged, be of such a kind that they cannot be considered injurious to the reversion. The consequence imputed to the act is a destruction of the landing. This surely may be injurious to the right of using the landings, and that right we have seen is incident to the franchise of a lawfully established ferry, and is commensurate in duration with the franchise, and forms part of the reversionary interest therein, as well as of the actual tenancy thereof. The destruction of the landing certainly may be an injury to the reversion, by subjecting the owner to inconvenience

227 and *expense in the use of the franchise, diminishing present rents, and reducing the present value of the reversion. It is no answer to the action of the reversioner, that the injury may be temporary, and that before the reversioner falls in, and his title to the use and occupation of the ferry vests in possession, the landings may be restored or the injury to them removed. 1 Mau. & Selw. 234. That the owner of the soil where the landings are may have an action for the injury charged in the declaration to the landings, and that that ownership is not alleged to be in the plaintiff and may be in another, so that if this action be sustained the party may be made responsible in two actions brought by different persons, is not, I apprehend, a sufficient reason for denying the action to this plaintiff unless he be the owner of the soil. It is of frequent occurrence that a party is subjected to several actions for the same act. The same act may in its consequences operate on different rights, existing in different persons, in the subject affected by the act. Thus if a party cut a ditch across a public highway, and any citizen, in the use of the public highway, suffer special damage as a consequence of this nuisance, the party cutting the ditch is liable to an action of trespass at the suit of the owner of the soil; to an action on the case for the special damage, at the suit of the citizen who may have sustained it; and to an indictment for the nuisance. Other illustrations might be given.

My opinion therefore is, that however difficult it may be for the plaintiff to connect, by sufficient proof, the alleged consequences with the act charged on the defendants, and to make good the averment of damage to the reversion, and however small that damage may be, the second count shews a cause of action with certainty sufficient to render it good on general demurrer; and consequently that the demurrer in this case ought to have been overruled as to the second as well as the first count.

228 *The judgment of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed with costs: and this court proceeding to render such judgment as the court below ought to have given, it is considered that the demurrers of the defendants in error, to the declaration and each count thereof, be overruled. And the case is remanded for further proceeding, on a writ of enquiry to be awarded by the superior court, unless the said defendants should plead issuably to the action; and, should such plea or pleas be offered by the defendants, for the trial of the issue or issues that may be made upon such plea or pleas.

DEFINITION.

A ferry is an incorporeal hereditament acquired from the public, either by special act of the legislature, or by some other competent authority, under the provisions of a general law. It includes the exclusive privilege of transportation, for tolls, across a watercourse, and also the use, for that purpose, of the respective landings and their outlets. Patrick v. Ruffners, 2 Rob. 209, 40 Am. Dec. 740.

II. ESTABLISHMENT OF FERRIES.

1. JURISDICTION TO ESTABLISH.—Jurisdiction to establish ferries is conferred upon the county courts by ch. 64, Code 1873. When in a particular case such jurisdiction is acquired, the failure of the court in the progress of the case to comply with the statute in detail, may be error reviewable on appeal, but is no ground for collateral attack on the judgment. Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324.

This statute, however, does not authorize the county court to establish a ferry across a stream which forms one of the boundaries of the state. Zane v. Zane, 2 Va. Cas. 63.

2. PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH.

a. THE APPLICATION.—In an application to the county court to establish a ferry, the applicant should set forth in his petition that he owns the land either on one or both sides of the stream, and that a public road has been established through the land to the place where the ferry is sought to be established. Zane v. Zane, 2 Va. Cas. 63. See also, Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324.

b. PARTIES.—The court should permit any one to become a party to the proceeding, so as to give him a right to obtain a writ of error to the judgment, who has a peculiar interest in the controversy different from that of all other members of the community. For example, a proprietor of an old ferry in close proximity to the proposed ferry should be allowed to become a party contestant. But where a person's interest is only such interest as is common to all others in the community, he should not be allowed to become a party. Williamson v. Hays, 25 W. Va. 609.

c. FINDING OF JURY.

Finding of Jury Is Only Evidence of Necessity of Ferry.—Under the statute providing for the impanelling of a jury to say whether public convenience will result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, the finding of the jury is merely evidence; and the weight of it, under all the circumstances of the case, is a matter for the discretion of the court to which the finding of the jury is returned. Muire v. Smith, 2 Rob. 458.

Validity of Finding—Competency of Jurors.—The fact that a juror, upon a jury impanelled to say whether public convenience will result from the establishment of a ferry, was of the opinion, before he was sworn, that public convenience would result; that he had expressed this opinion, and that he had circulated a petition for the ferry, is not ground for quashing the finding of the jury, if the juror is otherwise qualified to render an impartial verdict. Muire v. Smith, 2 Rob. 458. And a person who signs a memorial to the legislature for the establishment of a ferry is not thereby rendered incompetent to act on the jury. Somerville v. Wimblish, 7 Gratt. 205.

3. CONDITIONS PRECEDENT TO ESTABLISHMENT.—Section 12, ch. 64, Code 1873, requires the person desiring to establish a ferry "to own or to have contracted for the use of land at the point at which he wishes to establish the same." This statute, however, is complied with where the lessee of the land, the owner of the equity of redemption therein, and the trustee holding the legal title unite in the application for the establishment of the ferry. Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324. See also, Zane v. Zane, 2 Va. Cas. 63.

4. AS CONDITION PRECEDENT TO ERECTING DAM.

Judgment Allowing Erection of Dam upon Providing a Ferry Presumed to Be Correct on Appeal.—In a case in which the judgment of the court giving leave to erect a dam provided that the applicant should keep a ferry boat at the crossing of a public road over the stream across which the dam was to be erected, it was held that, as such judgment was authorized by statute (2 Rev. Code 227, § 5), and as the county and circuit courts had held upon the evidence that a ferry boat at that place would sufficiently remedy any impediment to the crossing of the stream, the court of appeals would presume that they acted rightly, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Mairs v. Gallahue, 9 Gratt. 94.

Duties in Regard to Ferry Boat.—Where the right to erect a dam is made conditional upon the applicant's maintaining a ferry across a stream for the benefit of the public, the duty of keeping up the ferry boat is not merely personal to the grantee of the privilege of erecting the dam, but is a condition incident to the grant, and attaches to it in whosoever hands it passes. The kind of boat to be kept is such a one as the exigencies of the travel and trade on the road shall require. And it is the duty of the party required to keep up the ferry boat to ferry the public over the stream without charge. Mairs v. Gallahue, 9 Gratt. 94.

5. EFFECT OF ESTABLISHMENT.

Title Conferred by Franchise.—The establishment of a ferry confers upon the owner no title to any portion of the soil on the other side of the stream, and no easement therein except the incidental delegation of such as has been theretofore or may thereafter be acquired by the public as a highway. Somerville v. Wimblish, 7 Gratt. 205.

But the establishment of a ferry in a public road entitles the grantee to the use of the road for landings and outlets, as the use of the landings and their outlets is a part of the ferry franchise. Patrick v. Ruffners, 2 Rob. 209, 40 Am. Dec. 740; Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223.

As Ground for Dissolution of Injunction.—The establishment of a ferry at a point at which a person has been enjoined from operating an illegal ferry is sufficient ground for dissolution of the injunction, where the same person is licensed to conduct the second ferry. Hostler v. Marlowe, 44 W. Va. 707, 30 S. E. Rep. 146.

III. PROTECTION AFFORDED FERRIES.1. AGAINST RIVAL FERRIES AND BRIDGES.

Grant of Franchise Does Not Imply a Monopoly.—A monopoly will not be implied from the mere grant of a charter to a company to construct a work of public improvement, and to take the profits. To give such monopoly, there must be an express provision in the charter, whereby the legislature restrains itself from granting charters for rival and competing works. Hence, though a ferry has been established across a river, it is competent for the legislature to establish another ferry from the opposite side of the river, to pass along the same line used by the first; and the granting of this second charter is no invasion of the franchise of the owner of the first ferry. Somerville v. Wimbish, 7 Gratt. 205; Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe, etc., R. Co., 11 Leigh 42; Trent v. Cartersville Bridge Co., 11 Leigh 521; Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214; Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 34 W. Va. 155, 11 S. E. Rep. 1009; James River & K. Co. v. Thompson, 3 Gratt. 270.

West Virginia Statutory Provisions.—Formerly Code W. Va., § 6, ch. 44, provided that the board of supervisors, and after 1872 the county court, should not establish a ferry over a watercourse within half a mile of another ferry legally established except over the Ohio river. The obvious reason for granting this exclusive privilege to the proprietor of the ferry was that it was considered promotive of the public good, it being considered that there was not sufficient travel and transportation over any stream in that state to justify the establishment of two ferries so close to each other. By Acts 1882, ch. 150, § 6, this law was repealed, but in repealing it the legislature simply declared, that it ought not to be regarded as prejudicial to the public good in every case to establish two ferries over a stream within that distance of each other. It was considered, and very properly, that instead of prohibiting the establishment of a second ferry close to another over the same stream it should be left to the discretion of the county court, subject however to the review of the circuit court, to determine, whether the general public interest would be promoted in the particular case by the establishment of two ferries so close to each other over the same stream. Williamson v. Hays, 25 W. Va. 609. Under this act, the county has the authority to establish a ferry within half a mile of another ferry over any of the streams within the state, and without in any manner infringing upon the franchise of such existing ferry, or rendering the proprietor of the new ferry liable for damages on account thereof. Hostler v. Marlowe, 44 W. Va. 707, 30 S. E. Rep. 146.

Where Ferry Is Not Safe and Convenient.—In an action against a bridge company for erecting a bridge which injures the ferry property, it is proper to instruct the jury that if the landings of the ferry are not safe and convenient, and that by the expenditure of money they could be made safe and convenient, that they must find for the plaintiff such damages, as they may ascertain his franchise would sustain by reason of the erection and use of the bridge less the amount of the costs of making the landing safe and convenient. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223.

Against Collateral Attack on Franchise.—The validity of a ferry franchise cannot be collaterally questioned except by parties who can show a right paramount to that granted by the public. Patrick v. Ruffners, 2 Rob. 209, 40 Am. Dec. 740. But the franchise itself may be taken if the public convenience requires it and just compensation is made therefor. See James River & Kanawha Co. v. Thompson, 3 Gratt. 270, and monographic note on "Eminent Domain" appended thereto.

Province of Jury in Actions against Rival Concerns.—In ascertaining the amount of damages sustained by the owner of a ferry by the erection and operation of a bridge, the jury are to regard the franchise as permanent, and will not take into consideration the fact that the legislature may repeal the law creating the exclusive privilege of transportation across the river within half a mile of the ferry. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223.

The jury may take into consideration the revenues derived from the exercise of the ferry franchise, while the proprietor was landing his boat on the land of another, rather than on his own landings, even though he was a trespasser while making such landings. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223.

2. AGAINST PRIVATE FERRIES.—The owner of a public ferry cannot maintain any action against persons who use their own boats for passage or transportation of themselves, their families and property, and who do not hold themselves out to transport the general public. Trent v. Cartersville Bridge Co., 11 Leigh 521.

3. AGAINST EXCESSIVE TAXES.—A town incorporated under ch. 47, Code W. Va. cannot assess and collect wharfage from the proprietor of the ferry for the use of a ferry landing within its corporate limits; nor can it tax the ferries except as property and at the rate it may tax other property within its corporate limits. Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667.

IV. TRANSFER OF FRANCHISE.

Does Not Render It Irrepealable.—Where the ferry franchise has been conferred upon the corporation by the legislature, the sale of this franchise to another corporation does not render the franchise irrepealable, or deprive the legislature of its power to grant a rival franchise should it be deemed to the public interest so to do. Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 34 W. Va. 155, 11 S. E. Rep. 1009, affirmed in 188 U. S. 287.

Unauthorized Lease of Ferries.—In Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214, a lease, by the board of supervisors of Norfolk county and the city council of the city of Portsmouth, of the ferries in Norfolk county, was held void for the reason that the lease was unauthorized under the laws of this state.

V. PARTNERSHIP IN FRANCHISE.

While there may be a partnership in a ferry, yet as a ferry is not ordinarily the subject of partnership and trade, the terms of the contract by which it is made so, should be more clear than in cases in which the subject is one of ordinary trade and partnership. Thus in a case in which the owner of a public ferry leased it for two years, in consideration of $1,000 cash, and upon an agreement between the parties that if the net profits of the ferry did not yield the lessee $2,000 within the two years, he should hold over the term until the profits yielded the $2,000, and if the profits gave more than the $2,000 in the two years, the surplus should be equally divided between them, it was held that this contract did not constitute a partnership so as to render the lessor liable for losses occasioned by negligence in operating the ferry during the term of the tenancy. Bowyer v. Anderson, 2 Leigh 551.

VI. DISCONTINUANCE OF FERRIES.

Discontinuance a Penalty Imposed by Law.—The discontinuance of a ferry is a penalty which the law attaches to the failure of the ferry keeper to exercise his privilege of keeping up his ferry; it is not an offence, much less an indictable offence. Carter v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 354; Trent v. Cartersville Bridge Co., 11 Leigh 521.

Jurisdiction to Discontinue.—Under § 1380, Va. Code 1887, conferring on the court of the county "from" which any ferry is established the right to discontinue such ferry for failure to comply with the law, the county court of either of two counties between which a ferry is operated has jurisdiction to discontinue the ferry on a proper showing, subject to the concurrence of the other court. Sargeant v. Irving, 2 Va. Dec. 888.

Discontinuance for Nonuser.—Under §§ 28-4, ch. 287, Rev. Code 1819, where a public ferry has been disused for more than three years, though the franchise of the ferry owner has not been declared forfeited by quo warranto or other like proceedings, he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity, to prevent others from invading the franchise, which he has thus abandoned. And, in such case, it seems that he cannot maintain an action at law to vindicate his franchise. Trent v. Cartersville Bridge Co., 11 Leigh 521.

VII. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. ACTIONS FOR DISTURBING FERRIES.

Against Parties Obstructing River.—An action for disturbing a ferry may be maintained by the owner against persons who, by obstructions in the river, cause injuries mediate or immediate to the landings, thereby diminishing the profits of the ferry, and subjecting the owner to increased labor and expense in the use of his franchise. Patrick v. Ruffners, 2 Rob. 209, 40 Am. Dec. 740.

Declaration or Complaint.—In an action for the disturbance of a ferry, by injuring the landings and their outlets, the complaint need not set forth the means by which the ferry was legally established, or the derivation of the plaintiff's title thereto. Nor is it necessary to allege expressly that the plaintiff was possessed of the landings and outlets, or that he was owner of the soil; for if the complaint shows that they were used as appurtenances to the ferry this is sufficient. Patrick v. Ruffners, 2 Rob. 209, 40 Am. Dec. 740.

2. APPELLATE PRACTICE.—Where an application is made for the establishment of a ferry across a stream, over which a ferry has already been established, the owner may resist the establishment of the new ferry; and if, upon hearing the evidence, the court to which the application is presented refuses to establish a new ferry and the applicant thereupon obtains a writ of error to the circuit court, after moving to set aside the judgment as contrary to the law and evidence, and excepting to the action of the court in overruling said motion, the circuit court cannot properly act upon and determine the writ of error, unless the bill of exceptions certifies all of the evidence offered, or all of the facts proved before the county court, or unless all of the facts appear either expressly or by necessary implication in the bill of exceptions. Williamson v. Hays, 35 W. Va. 52, 12 S. E. Rep. 1092. See also, Williamson v. Hays, 25 W. Va. 609. See also, Mairs v. Gallahue, 9 Gratt. 94.

action against a constable and the sureties in his official bond, for failing to pay over debts entrusted to the constable and received by him from the debtors, the receipt of the constable for the debts, signed in his official character, is, according to the true construction of the act passed March 8, 1826, concerning constables and their sureties, prima facie evidence, as well against the sureties as against the constable, of the receipt of the money; provided six months have elapsed between the date of the receipt and the commencement of the action. Per ALLEN and BALDWIN, J. But the fact that the receipt of the constable was signed in his official character, must appear in some way on the face of the paper itself; if it do not, the party claiming under the receipt cannot obtain the benefit of the act by oral testimony of the character in which the receipt was signed. Per totam curiam.

This was an action of debt in the circuit court of Kanawha, in the name of the governor of the commonwealth, at the relation of the party claiming to be injured, against Henry E. Smith, and the sureties in the bond given by him the 12th of February 1838, for discharging the duties of constable in a particular district of Kanawha, for two years from that date. At the trial of the issue on the plea of conditions performed, the plaintiff, to sustain the issue on his part, gave in evidence the said bond, and two receipts; one of which commenced, "Received August 13, 1838, of R. Aug. Thompson, the following notes for collection," and, after the names of the debtors, with the dates and amounts of the notes, was signed "H. E. Smith;" and the other of which, after the names of other debtors, with the dates and amounts, was as follows: "Rec'd November 12, 1838, the above notes in addition for collection. H. E. Smith."

The plaintiff proved the signatures to the said receipts to be in the proper handwriting of the defendant Smith, and to have been subscribed by him in the presence of the witnesses; and also proved by oral evidence, that the claims or evidences of debts set out in the receipts were placed in the hands of the defendant Smith as constable, to be warranted on and collected by him as such constable, and were by him so received. On the part of the defendants it was contended, that as the official character of the defendant Smith was not appended to his signature and did not form a part thereof, the receipts aforesaid were not within the statute of the 8th of March 1826,* declaring constables' receipts signed in their official character to be prima facie evidence of the collection of the claims after six months, and that it was not competent to prove by oral evidence that the receipts were executed by him in his character of constable. Whereupon, on the motion of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury that the receipts were admissible evidence, although the word "constable" was not added to the name of the defendant Smith; that, to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the receipts as prima facie evidence under the said act, the jury must be satisfied that they were signed by Smith in his official capacity; but that it was competent to deduce the character in which the defendant Smith signed the receipts, from the purport of the receipts and the intrinsic evidence of the transaction, taken together with the whole testimony. To this opinion and instruction of the court, as well as to the admission of the receipts aforesaid in evidence, the defendants excepted. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, and judgment rendered thereupon. And to that judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

231 *The cause was submitted without argument, by B. H. Smith for the plaintiffs in error, and by Summers for the defendant in error.

ALLEN, J. The first clause of the act concerning constables and their securities, passed March the 8th 1826, provides, that "if any constable shall receive from any debtor the amount of any debt or claim, which may have been entrusted to or placed under the control of such constable to warrant for, and which might have been recovered by warrant, every such constable and his securities shall be liable to the creditor or plaintiff for the amount so collected, in the same manner as he or they would be for money collected by him under execution." This clause ascertains the liability of the officer and his sureties. They are made responsible for money collected on claims placed in the hands of the constable to collect in that character, whether the money was received under execution or not. The law is silent as to the evidence whereby the facts are to be proved, upon which the liability of the officer and his sureties depends. They may be proved as well by oral as written evidence. If a claim of the kind designated is placed in the officer's hands to collect as officer, though no receipt be taken, and he actually receives the money, the officer and his sureties are responsible.

But constables are frequently entrusted with the collection of many small claims; and the creditor would be subjected to much inconvenience, if required in every case to produce the evidence of the payment of each claim to the officer. To obviate this difficulty, the next clause of the act provided, that "in any proceeding against a constable for failing to pay money thus received, his receipt for the debt or claim, signed in his official character, shall be admitted by the court as prima facie evidence of the receipt of the money; provided six months shall have elapsed between its date and the commencement of the proceeding."

232 *The suit in this case is against the constable and his sureties. This last clause of the act speaks of a proceeding against the constable alone; and a question might arise whether the receipt described should have the effect of prima facie evidence against the sureties. The first clause makes both principal and sureties liable for money received by the principal. In whatever mode that fact is established, the sureties are responsible. The second clause was merely intended to furnish a convenient mode of proving the fact. As the constable and his sureties may be joined in the suit, it could not have been the intention of the legislature, that proof which, uncontradicted, would be conclusive against the constable to establish the receipt of the money, should not be evidence against the sureties, whose liability is a mere consequence of the establishment of that fact as against their principal. The proceeding, too, is for money thus collected; referring to the previous clause which made the sureties liable; and thereby shewing that a proceeding to recover from them, as well as the constable, money for which they had been so rendered responsible, was the proceeding contemplated.

But both clauses of the act keep in view the official character of the constable; with the object, no doubt, of protecting the sureties from liability for claims collected by the constable, not officially, but as the mere agent of his employer. The claims must be placed in his hands as constable, to be collected in that character by warrant, and must be such as could be recovered by warrant. And the receipt, if one is taken, to acquire the dignity of prima facie evidence of the receipt of the money, must be signed by him in his official character. Though not so signed, it would be admissible evidence to shew the delivery of the claims, but would not of itself be prima facie evidence of the 233 character in which the claims were received, or of the collection *of the money by the constable after six months. The creditor would be compelled to adduce other evidence of these facts. To guard the sureties against fraud or collusion, the receipt should shew on its face that it was executed at the time by the constable in his official character; and therefore, to entitle it to be received as prima facie evidence of the receipt of the money, the law requires it to be signed by the officer in his official character.

In the case under consideration, there is nothing on the face of the receipts to shew that they were signed by the constable in that character. The plaintiff proved by witnesses, that the claims were placed in the hands of the constable to warrant for, and were received by him in the character of constable. Upon this evidence, the court properly instructed the jury that the receipts were admissible, and that, to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of them as prima facie evidence under the act aforesaid, the jury must be satisfied that they were signed by the constable in his official character. The court however added, that it was competent to deduce the character in which he signed the receipts, from the purport of the receipts and the intrinsic evidence of the transaction, taken together with the whole testimony. The receipts, on their face, purport merely to be receipts from one man to another for certain debts to be collected. They do not purport to be executed by the party as constable.

The fact that he was constable being proved by other evidence, we may conjecture that he received these claims in that character. But in the absence of such proof of his official character, the receipts themselves furnish no intrinsic evidence of the character in which they were signed. The instruction therefore, though somewhat obscure, can mean only that the character in which he signed need not appear on the face of the receipts, but may be established by proof aliunde.

234 This would be substituting *the recollection of witnesses for the official signing required by the statute. In this, I think, the court erred. The character in which the receipts were signed should appear in some way on the face of the paper itself, and the defect could not be supplied by oral testimony, so as to make the receipts prima facie evidence under the law.

I think the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial of the issue, upon which such instruction is not to be repeated.

BALDWIN, J., concurred.

STANARD, J., said, he deemed it unnecessary to express an opinion upon the question whether the receipts of the constable for the debts, signed in his official character, is, under the act of March 8, 1826, prima facie evidence as well against the sureties as against the constable, of the receipt of the money. He concurred in the judgment of this court.

Judgment of circuit court reversed with costs, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for a new trial, on which the instruction given at the former trial is not to be repeated.

235 *Pauley v. Chapman.

August, 1848, Lewisburg.

Forcible Entry—Force Necessary. *—Case in which, on a complaint by a party under the statute in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 115, p. 455, that another had forcibly turned him out of possession of a tenement, the jury returned a special verdict finding the facts, and upon those facts the court considered that the entry was not "with strong hand or with multitude of people," and rendered judgment that the complaint be dismissed.

On the 4th of May 1839, Edward Chapman exhibited a complaint before a justice of the peace of the county of Logan, against Henry Pauley, for forcibly turning him out of possession of a tenement in that county. The complaint was made, and a warrant issued by the justice, in the form prescribed by the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 115, § 4, 5, 6, p. 455, 6. Two justices of the county attended at the courthouse on the day specified in the warrant, and constituted a court for the trial of the complaint. The case was, however, adjourned until the 21st of August 1839, when a jury was impanelled, and after being duly charged, returned a special verdict, which found, That on the 20th of November 1837, the plaintiff received a deed of that date, executed by John Joseph Besnoist, by John Laidley as his attorney in fact, to the said plaintiff, embracing the land in controversy; which deed was acknowledged by the said attorney in the office of Logan county court on the 21st of November 1837, and admitted to record. That the said plaintiff had three improvements on the lands embraced in the said deed, at the time the defendant entered as hereinafter mentioned. That in January 1838, the 236 defendant, with two hired hands, *entered upon part of the land embraced in the said deed, about a mile and three quarters from one of the said improvements of the plaintiff, and about three quarters of a mile from the nearest improvement. That the land on which the defendant entered was in native forest, and totally unimproved; and at the time of the entry of said defendant, no person was upon any portion of the land embraced in said deed, except the tenant of the plaintiff, with his family; which tenant occupied the improvement most remote from the place of entry of the defendant, and had occupied it for two years or more previous thereto. That the defendant and his hands cut down timber growing upon the land in controversy, at the place where he the defendant entered as aforesaid; built thereon a small cabin and covered the same with clapboards, put a floor in the house, and a door, fastened up said door, and then left the premises, which have continued uninhabited by the defendant or any other person. That while the defendant was building the house aforesaid, neither the plaintiff nor any other person was present, except the hands aforesaid; and that no other violence or force was committed by the defendant, than the cutting the timber, building the house, and fastening up the door aforesaid. That about a month before the entry aforesaid by the defendant, the said defendant went to the residence of the plaintiff, some three or four miles from the land in controversy, and proposed to purchase a portion of the land comprised in said deed, which lay below the land in controversy. That the plaintiff refused to sell the land which the defendant wished to purchase, but proposed selling him land lying above that he wished to purchase: when the defendant and plaintiff started to see the same.

If upon these facts the law should be for the plaintiff, then the jury found a verdict in the form prescribed for a verdict for the plaintiff on a complaint of forcible entry; and if the law should be for the defendant, then the jury found a verdict in the form prescribed for a verdict for the defendant on such complaint.

The county court, being of opinion that the law was for the defendant, rendered judgment against the plaintiff, and that the defendant recover of him his costs.

*See monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

The circuit court awarded a supersedeas, on the petition of the plaintiff Chapman; and on the 11th of May 1840, reversed the judgment of the county court with costs, and entered judgment that the plaintiff recover against the defendant his possession of the said tenement, and also his costs in the county court.

To the judgment of the circuit court, a supersedeas was awarded on the petition of the defendant Pauley.

B. H. Smith for the plaintiff in error. This complaint is founded upon that part of the statute which forbids an entry "with strong hand or with multitude of people," and gives a remedy to the party turned out of possession "by such forcible entry;" 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 115, § 2, p. 455. To sustain a complaint for forcible entry, the force must be actual, not constructive; otherwise the remedy given for an unlawful entry would be unnecessary. In every case of unlawful entry, force is implied. But there is an obvious distinction made by the statute between cases of actual and cases of constructive violence. In the latter, the defendant may shew a right of entry at the trial; but in cases of forcible entry, he is precluded from so doing. If a complaint for forcible entry can be sustained in a case in which there has been no actual force, the defendant ought to be permitted to shew a right of entry as a justification: otherwise, in all cases of peaceable entry, the plaintiffs will proceed as for a forcible entry, and thus preclude the defendants from shewing a right of entry; contrary to the intention of the statute. Rex v. Bathurst, Sayer 225, Rex v. Storr, 3 Burr. 1698, 238 and The King v. Wilson & others*, 8 T. R. 357, are authorities pertinent to the present case. See also 1 Hawkins 500, 501, 2.

The attorney general for defendant in error. Here the plaintiff was in actual possession of the land, he having three improvements on it, one of which at least was in possession of his tenant. The defendant entered in violation of the plaintiff's rights and without colour of title. This entry and ouster of the actual possession of the land, with the intention to hold the same against the will of the plaintiff, was a forcible entry, although without actual force at the time of the entry. Coke Litt. 257 a, 257 b, 3 Tho. Co. Lit. 80, 81, 545. The entry was also forcible, because with multitude of people. The expression in the act is "with strong hand or with multitude of people;" either constitutes a forcible entry. Three persons are sufficient to constitute a riot at common law, and the same number is sufficient to constitute a multitude under this act. The force need not be applied to persons; it is sufficient if applied to property. 3 Bac. Abr. p. 716 of Lond. edi. of 1832, Forcible Entry, B. A forcible entry into a house in the absence of all persons, is a forcible entry under the statute, 2 Rolle 2. And a disseisin accompanied with robbery of goods is a forcible entry. 2 Inst. 235. See also 1 Hawkins (edi. by Curwood) p. 510 et seq. Hawkins takes a distinction between acts of violence and circumstances of terror. Acts of violence to property, though unaccompanied with terror to the person, make the entry forcible. Rex v. Jopson &c., Sayer 27, 1 Wils. 325. In the present case, the acts of cutting timber and building a house were acts of violence and force. The cases of Rex v. Bathurst, Sayer 225, Rex v. Storr, 3 Burr. 1698, and The King v. Wilson & others, 8 T. R. 357, being prosecutions on behalf of the crown, it was necessary 239 that *there should be an offence against the public, as well as against the private right of the person injured. But our statute gives only a civil remedy. A breach of the public peace is not an ingredient in a case under it; and a less degree of force therefore seems to be sufficient. Where the dispossession is such, that there may be implied from the act a determination to effect it by force if necessary, or to resist by force a restoration of the possession, it should be held, under our statute, that there is a forcible entry.

Smith in reply. The authorities before cited establish these propositions: 1. That an entry without actual violence is not an entry with strong hand or multitude of people, where threats or weapons or numbers are not resorted to, to overawe the tenant in possession, and drive him from the premises. 2. That independently of the statute, where an entry was made with force, and the tenant forcibly turned out of an actual possession, an indictment lay at common law. 3. That where trespass was committed on the premises of another, but without actual force against the person of the possessor, and damage was done to the freehold by digging it up or cutting trees, or other injuries of like kind, an indictment would not lie at common law. It matters not whether, in the cases cited, the prosecutions were at common law or under the statute: whether the one or the other, they shew what is an entry with strong hand or multitude of people, and that such entry is not sustained by constructive force, but by actual violence, or by threats, weapons, putting in fear, or overawing by numbers. It is not enough that there be injury to personal property, or destruction of the soil, or the trees growing on it. The threats, violence and overawing must be to the party removed from the possession. Our legislature well knew that an indictment did not lie at common law 240 for unlawfully entering *on the land of another, and cutting and even carrying away timber, when they passed the act of the 14th of February 1823 for the punishment of such and other trespasses, and made them misdemeanours. Sess. Acts of 1822-3, ch. 34, p. 36; Supp. to Rev. Code, p. 280.

Here, Chapman had at most but a constructive possession of all beyond his enclosures. To say that he has been violently turned out of such a possession, at a time when he and his tenants, and all claiming connexion with him by title or kindred, were miles distant and wholly ignorant of the entry, is a strange idea.

PER CURIAM. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed with costs, and that of the county court affirmed.

*Pitzer v. Williams.

August, 1848, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Mills—Ad Quod Damnum—Application for—Ownership of Applicant—Notice*—To Whom Given—Proprietor.—A person owning real estate died intestate, leaving a widow and children; and dower not being assigned to the widow, she continued in the mansion house and the plantation thereto belonging. Under the act in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 235, § 1, p. 225, notice was given to the widow as the proprietor of the land, by a person desiring to build a machine useful to the public, and to abut his dam against the said land, that application would be made for a writ of ad quod damnum; and the writ was accordingly awarded, and an inquisition returned. After which, one of the heirs, who resided on the plantation with his mother, being made a defendant on his motion, moved the court to dismiss the case, upon the ground that notice of the application ought to have been given to him as one of the proprietors; but his motion was overruled. He then offered to introduce evidence to prove that the applicant did not own the land on which he proposed to erect his machine: but it being proved that the applicant was in possession of the land, claiming title to it, and had built a house thereon, the court refused to permit the Condemnation Proceedings—Notice—Construction of Statute.—The "tenant of the freehold" to whom notice must be given in beginning proceedings under the statute for the condemnation of lands for public purposes, means the "tenant in possession appearing as the visible owner." For this proposition the principal case is cited and approved in Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 511; Hope v. N. & W. R. Co., 79 Va. 288; Keystone Bridge Co. v. Summers, 13 W. Va. 488. Same—Same—Proprietor.—It was held in Pitzer v. Williams, 2 Rob. 241, that a widow to whom dower had not been assigned, and who continued in the possession of the mansion house and plantation thereto belonging, must be considered as proprietor of the land in the meaning of the statute respecting writs of ad quod damnum; and a motion by the heir, who resided on the land with his mother, to dismiss the proceedings because notice was not served on him as one of the proprietors of the land, was overruled.

evidence so offered to be introduced. HELD, there is no error in these proceedings. For it was sufficient that the person making the application was in the actual possession and occupation of the land on which the machine was to be built; and that the person to whom the notice was given was the tenant in possession and appeared as the visible owner.

At a court held for Alleghany county on the 21st of October 1839, Elisha B. Williams produced a notice in these words: "Mrs. Jane Pitzer. Being the owner of a lot of land on one side of Jackson's river, the bed whereof belongs to the commonwealth, and being desirous to erect a carding machine upon the said lot, and to erect a dam across the said stream for working the same, and to abut such dam against your lands upon *the opposite side of said stream, you will please take notice, that on the 21st day of October 1839, I shall make application to the county court of Alleghany, then to be holden at the courthouse thereof, for a writ of ad quod damnum, to ascertain what damages you will sustain by reason of the premises, and such other matters as are directed by the act of assembly in such case made and provided; and shall thereupon move such proceedings as the law directs, in order to obtain the leave of said court to erect such machine and to build said dam. Yours &c. Elisha B. Williams. September 29, 1839."

It was proved that a copy of this notice was delivered to the said Jane Pitzer on the 8th of October 1839: whereupon the case was docketed and continued.

On the 21st of January 1840, the defendant moved to quash the notice for error apparent on the face thereof; which motion was overruled; and leave was then given the plaintiff to file his petition, which he accordingly filed in these words:

"To the worshipful the county court of Alleghany. The petition of Elisha B. Williams respectfully represents, that your petitioner is the owner of a lot of land lying on Jackson's river at the town of Covington in said county, on which he has erected a carding machine, which has heretofore been in operation to some extent, and has proved greatly beneficial to the public. Your petitioner finds it necessary, in order to the successful operation of said machine, to erect a dam across the river, and to abut the same against the lands of Mrs. Jane Pitzer, opposite to his aforesaid lot. He believes that a dam one foot high would be sufficient to answer his purpose, and that such a dam could do no material damage, either to the lands of Mrs. Pitzer, or to any of the proprietors of the lands above or below, and that it could not prove a public annoyance in any way. Your petitioner has obtained the consent of the *president and directors of the James river and Kanawha company according to law, and prays that your worships will award him a writ of ad quod damnum, and that such other proceedings may be had in the premises as the law requires, to authorize him to erect a dam of the foregoing description.

Elisha B. Williams."

A writ of ad quod damnum was accordingly awarded and issued, and an inquest returned, which set forth that the freeholders viewed the lands proposed for an abutment, and located and circumscribed by metes and bounds one acre thereof, and appraised the same at one dollar; and that they examined the lands above and below, both of the said Jane Pitzer and others, and believed the erection of said dam to the height of one foot, where it was proposed to be erected, would do the proprietors of such lands no damage, by overflowing or in any other manner. They also responded to the other enquiries directed by the statute, in the following terms: "The mansion house of no proprietor, nor the offices, curtilage, gardens nor orchards will be overflowed; the fish of passage will not be obstructed; ordinary navigation will be somewhat obstructed, which may be prevented by leaving an opening of eight feet in said dam, which may be closed by a plank or piece of timber, only at such times as it may be needed for navigation; and we are of the opinion that the health of the neighbours will not be annoyed by the stagnation of the water."

A summons was awarded against Jane Pitzer, to appear and shew cause why leave should not be given to build the dam; which summons was returned executed.

In this state of the cause, it was removed by certiorari to the circuit superior court.

On the 23d of April 1841, Robert Pitzer applied to be made a defendant in the 244 cause; and it appearing to *the court that he was one of the heirs of Bernard Pitzer deceased, and was living with the defendant on the land upon which the plaintiff proposed to abut the dam, he was admitted a defendant; but the order provided that the trial of the cause was not to be delayed thereby.

On the 24th of the same month, the court, on consideration of the inquisition and the evidence adduced, and all the circumstances, ordered that the said Elisha B. Williams have leave to build the said dam, leaving such a sluice as was mentioned in the inquest of the jury, and providing for the passage of fish; and that he become seized in fee of the acre of land mentioned in the inquisition, upon his paying the valuation thereof and the damages found by the jury, to the several parties entitled thereto.

Several bills of exceptions were filed. The first set forth, that before the trial of the cause, the defendant Robert Pitzer proved by testimony, that Bernard Pitzer, the father of the said Robert, was in his lifetime seized of the said land, and that he the said Bernard Pitzer died intestate, leaving a widow, Jane Pitzer, and the said Robert and others his children and heirs: that the widow Jane Pitzer, defendant in this proceeding, continued to occupy the mansion house and plantation belonging thereto, of which the acre of land condemned in this case is a part, from the death of her husband until the commencement of this proceeding, and still continues to do so: that the said Robert Pitzer, during his minority and after he arrived at the age of 21 years, up to the institution of this application, resided at the same place with his said mother Jane Pitzer, and is still living there by her permission and consent: and that the said Jane Pitzer had never had dower assigned her in the lands of which her husband died seized. Upon these facts, the defendant Robert Pitzer contended 245 that he was one of the proprietors of the land aforesaid, *and that he ought to have had notice of the application, and also of the other proceedings in the case; and he moved the court to dismiss the case, because he was not made a party at the proper time, and had not had notice of the application. But the court, being of opinion that the said Jane Pitzer, the widow of the said Bernard Pitzer, not having had dower assigned her, was entitled to the possession of the said mansion house plantation, and was the tenant of the said land until such dower was so assigned, (she having actually held it since the death of her husband, and the said Robert only living on it by her consent and approbation) refused to dismiss the case for the cause aforesaid.

A second bill of exceptions stated, that on the trial of the cause, the defendant offered to introduce verbal evidence tending to prove that the lot of ground upon which the plaintiff has erected his carding machine had been dedicated by dr. James Merry to the public. But it being proved that the plaintiff had possession of the said lot of land, and had built a house thereon, the court refused to hear the said evidence.

A third bill of exceptions stated, that the defendant offered a record of a chancery suit decided in the circuit court of Alleghany on the 22d of September 1835, in the name of Hugh Lynch and others against Robert Skeen and others,* as evidence tending to prove that dr. James Merry had dedicated the strip of land upon which the plaintiff has erected the said carding machine house, to the public, as an easement, common way, &c. But it being proved that the plaintiff Williams is in possession of said land, claiming title, and has built a house thereon, the court refused to permit the said record to be introduced.

246 *Other bills of exceptions set forth, that the plaintiff gave in evidence an act of the general assembly of Virginia passed on the 30th day of March 1837, entitled "an act to authorize Elisha B. Williams to erect a wool-carding machine on Jackson's river near the town of Covington in the county of Alleghany," (Sess. Acts of 1836-7, p. 250, ch. 302,) and also offered an extract from the record of the proceedings of the James river and Kanawha company, in the words following to wit: "At a stated monthly meeting of the president and directors of the James river and Kanawha company, held in the city of Richmond on saturday the 13th of April 1839: Resolved that the consent of the company be granted to Elisha B. Williams to erect a dam across Jackson's river at the town of Covington, of the dimensions and on the conditions stated in the application of William G. Holloway under date of the 9th of April 1839; provided said dam shall not be over one foot in height, and shall in no wise impair the navigation of the river; and provided also that no right or privilege granted by or claimed under this resolution shall continue after the company shall have commenced the construction of the improvement at Covington. Extract from the records. W. B. Chitenden secretary." The defendants objected to the introduction of this extract, upon the ground, first, that it is not legal evidence; and secondly, because the letter of William G. Holloway therein referred to was not produced, to shew upon what conditions the consent of the James river and Kanawha company to the erection of a dam across Jackson's river was given. But the court overruled the objection, and permitted the said extract to be read.

The other facts proved were also stated in the last bill of exceptions; but it is unnecessary to set them forth.

On the petition of Robert Pitzer, a super-seedeas was awarded.

247 *Eskridge for plaintiff in error.

The fee simple owner of the land sought to be condemned ought to have had notice of the application. The first section of the act directs notice to be given to the proprietor. 2 R. C. 225, ch. 235. That the term proprietor, as here used by the legislature, is synonymous with owner, is evident from the 4th section, which provides for the case of an application to abut a dam upon a rock or island, and directs that the owner of such rock or island shall have like notice of the application for such writ, and of the execution thereof, as is required to be given to the owner of land on the opposite side of a stream. Id. p. 226. The owner or proprietor of land is he who has the absolute dominion and property in the land. Neither of these terms is ever used to convey the same meaning as tenant in possession. Again, the 6th section declares, that if the party applying obtain leave to build the said mill, machine or engine, and erect the said dam, he shall, upon paying to the several parties entitled the value of the acre located and the damages, become seized in fee simple of the said acre of land. The proceeding then is one by which the applicant seeks to acquire, and by the judgment of the court does acquire, the fee simple property in the acre of land condemned; and being of this character, the legislature must have designed that the fee simple owner of the acre should have notice of the proceeding. The court is bound so to construe the law as not to encroach upon any of the established rights of the citizen. It would be against common right and the principles of magna charta, to take away the property of the fee simple owner without giving him notice to appear and defend. Were the legislature to pass a law authorizing the property of one man to be taken from him and given to another, without compensation, and without notice to him of the proceeding, the court would be bound not to carry it into effect. The supreme court of South Carolina, in the case of Bowman and others v. Middleton, 1 Bay 252, set aside, as against common right and the principles of magna charta, an act of assembly which took away the freehold of one man and vested it in another, without any compensation, or previous attempt to determine the right.

If, according to a just and reasonable construction of the act, notice of the application is to be given to the fee simple owner of the land, the court ought to have dismissed the case for the failure to give such notice. For the proceedings ought to conform strictly to the act of assembly. All laws which interfere with private rights, and authorize proceedings unknown to the common law, ought to be strictly complied with. The necessity of notice has been adjudged by this court in the case of Bernard v. Brewer, 2 Wash. 76.

The other points presented by the bills of exceptions, he submitted without comment.

Hudson and Peyton for the defendant in error. Under the first part of the first section, authorizing a person owning lands on a watercourse to apply for leave to build a mill, it has been adjudged to be sufficient that a party is in possession as visible owner. Wood v. Boughan, 1 Call 329. In a summary proceeding of this kind, the court cannot go into the question of title, or make any enquiry as to any future or expectant interests which persons may have in the land. The law, therefore, only requires that notice should be given to one in possession. Notice even to an agent is in some cases sufficient, by the express provision of the act. A fortiori, notice to a tenant in possession, who is himself interested, will suffice. A notice to such particular tenant will in general be notice to the remainderman. If the remainderman wishes to be formally made a party to the case, the court will give him leave to appear for that purpose, at any stage of the proceedings. See *Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 Hen. & Munf. 256. On the other hand, if he should not appear and make himself a party, his rights will not be affected by the proceeding. This is manifest from the 9th section of the act; 2 R. C. p. 228.

Here the appellant, upon his motion to dismiss the case, has introduced evidence of his title, in opposition to the inquest of the jury which found the title to the land to be in mrs. Jane Pitzer. Upon questions of this kind, the court can only look to the inquisition. Anthony &c. v. Lawhorne, 1

Leigh 1. If the appellant, after making himself a party, could have maintained any motion upon the evidence which he introduced, it could only have been a motion that the inquisition should be quashed and a new writ awarded; not a motion to dismiss the case.

But all objections to the proceedings were cured when the appellant went to trial upon the merits. Bernard v. Brewer, 2 Wash. 76; Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & Munf. 1.

II. The case of Wood v. Boughan, 1 Call 329, is an authority against the point made by the second bill of exceptions.

III. Extracts from the books of a public corporation (such as the James river and Kanawha company) the records of which cannot be conveniently removed, are evidence, without requiring the presence of the officer who made the entry; at least where the statements are adverse to the interests of the company. Hodgson v. Fullarton, 4 Taunt. 787; Auriol v. Smith, 18 Ves. 198; Esp. on Ev. 665. But another answer to the objection taken in the fourth bill of exceptions is, that the obtaining the consent of the James river and Kanawha company was altogether a work of supererogation.

Eskridge in reply. The defendant Jane Pitzer, to whom notice was given, 250 was merely the tenant of the *land at the will of the fee simple owners, having no fixed or permanent interest in the same. If deprived of the possession of the acre in question, the heir, in assigning her dower, would compensate her by giving her lands of equal value. She was not, therefore, the proper person to contest the application. But if it be considered that she was a proper person to have notice, still the heirs of Bernard Pitzer the fee simple owner, having a greater and more direct interest in the contest, ought also to have had notice.

The counsel for the appellee are wrong in supposing that the 9th section of the act would preserve to the appellant his private action, unaffected by the inquest and the proceedings had in the case. The jury are required to ascertain the true value of the acre of land; that is, its actual value to the fee simple owner, or its actual value as a fee simple. And in ascertaining its value, they necessarily ascertain the injury which will result to the fee simple owner of the land. They therefore estimate that injury; and the rights of the fee simple owner are consequently not protected by the 9th section.

The cases relied upon on the other side, to shew that all objections to the proceedings were waived when the appellant went to trial upon the merits, do not apply; because here the objection was taken in due time, and the appellant did not go to trial upon the merits until after the objection had been overruled. There is no ground for saying it was ever waived or abandoned by him.

ALLEN, J. It is contended that though the notice to Mrs. Pitzer might have been insufficient, yet as Robert Pitzer has appeared and contested the application on the merits, the objection taken by him to the insufficiency of the notice cannot avail him. The case cited in support of this proposition does not sustain it. In

251 Bernard v. Brewer*, 2 Wash. 76, the court decided that notice to the proprietor should appear in the record, and reversed the judgment for that cause. The judges in delivering their opinions say, that if they could be satisfied from the record that the party appeared and contested the motion on the merits of the case, he could not afterwards avail himself of the want of notice in the first instance, to defeat the order; because a defence made on the merits would have amounted to a waiver of the objection. The reason assigned shews that the objection here would have been well taken, if no sufficient notice had been given. The objection was made at the first appearance of the party, and it was not until it had been overruled, that he contested the case on the merits. He cannot be said to have waived an objection which he made at the earliest opportunity, by contesting the case on the merits after the court had overruled the objection. This brings us to the main question, was the notice sufficient? Mrs. Pitzer was the tenant in possession of the plantation, of which the acre sought to be condemned was a part, and had continued in possession from the death of her husband. She was a tenant of the whole under the law, though her tenancy could have been terminated at any time by the assignment of dower. The law requires ten days previous notice to be given to the proprietor of the land, if he be found in the county, and if not, then to his agent therein, if any he hath. The term proprietor, as used here to designate the party to be notified, as well as the term owner, where the law speaks of the applicant, are somewhat indefinite as to the precise extent of the interest held in the land. In regard to the latter phrase, though the question was not expressly decided, the court in the case of Wood v. Boughan, 1 Call 329, strongly intimate, that the act does not authorize a contest in this summary proceeding about the title of the

252 parties, and *that the words "owning lands on one or both sides" are satisfied by the petitioner's being in possession as visible owner. In Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & Munf. 1, the inquisition having found that lands of Thomas Rowlett deceased would be overflowed, a summons issued to Coleman as executor and trustee of Thomas Rowlett deceased. It was objected, that the law required the summons to issue against the proprietor or tenant, and that Coleman did not appear to be such. However, as he had appeared and contested the application on the merits, the court considered it too late to raise the objection that he was not legally summoned. In Anthony &c. v. Lawhorne, 1 Leigh 1, the inquest found that lands in the possession of A. would be overflowed, and assessed the damages. The court gave leave to erect the dam without the payment of the damages; it appearing that the lands belonged not to A. but to the applicant. This judgment was reversed, because the right to the lands could not be thus collaterally tried. Judge Green, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, that where leave to erect a mill is given, the court is only authorized to impose conditions for preserving the passage of fish &c. and has no power to determine whether the damages are to be paid or not, or to whom they are payable. The statute, notwithstanding the leave given, imposes upon the applicant the duty of paying to the persons entitled the damages so assessed, as a condition upon which such leave is to be effectual for protecting him against the action of the person actually injured.

These are all the authorities having any bearing upon the question under consideration; and none of them expressly decides what extent of interest in the land will satisfy the requisitions of the law. On looking at the first, second and third sections, it seems to me that it was the intention of the legislature to designate the tenant in possession as the proper party to be

253 *notified in all cases. The 1st section requires notice to the proprietor of the land proposed for the abutment. When the inquest is taken, and it is found that lands above or below, of the property of others, will be injured, the jury are required to say what damage it will be of to the several proprietors; and on the return of the inquest, summonses are to be issued to the several persons, proprietors or tenants of the lands so located, or found liable to damage. The word tenants here applies as well to the land located and condemned, as to the land found liable to damage; and the use of it in this connexion shews that the terms proprietors and tenants were intended to designate the same interest,—a possession as visible owner or tenant. The 6th section provides, that upon paying respectively to the several parties entitled the value of the acre located and the damages, the applicant shall become seized in fee simple of the acre of land, &c. And it is argued that this provision shews the necessity of construing the term proprietor to mean the fee simple owner; otherwise his estate might be divested by a proceeding to which he is no party. This, it seems to me, is the necessary consequence of the construction which I give to the statute. And no such injustice is done as has been supposed. No man's property should be taken without just compensation. The law provides the mode by which that compensation is to be ascertained, leaving it to the applicant to pay to the party entitled, at his peril. Unless this were so, land for public improvements, or other necessary public purposes, could not be condemned where the owner was unknown; and thus enterprises of great utility might be arrested for this cause. This law itself merely requires notice to the proprietor or his agent, when found in the county: but the land of any person may be condemned, no matter whether he be found within the county or not; and when it is so condemned, and the money is paid to the 254 *party entitled, the applicant becomes seized in fee simple. This proves, that in the contemplation of the legislature it was not essential that the true owner should be a party to the proceeding by which he is divested of the fee for purposes of this character: that where notice can readily be given, it should be done: but whether it be given or not, a just compensation should be secured to him.

I think, therefore, that notice to the tenant in possession, appearing as the visible owner, was sufficient; and that the court was right in overruling the motion to dismiss the proceeding.

For the same reasons, I think the court was correct in refusing to hear parol evidence of a dedication to the public, by a former owner, of the ground in possession of the applicant. It appeared that the applicant was in the actual possession and occupation of the property; and this is sufficient.

The other objections taken in the court below have not been pressed in the argument, and may be disposed of by remarking that it was supererogatory to introduce the order of the James river company. The order giving leave to erect the dam must be taken as subordinate to the rights of the company under their charter and the general law. On the merits, the court was clearly right in granting the leave to erect the dam.

The judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the judgment of affirmance.

tion of the said four months, neither party has the right (without the consent of the other) to set the cause for hearing.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—It appearing by the record of a suit in chancery, that the answer and replication were filed at August rules 1840; that at September rules 1840 the plaintiff set the cause for hearing; and that on the 5th of October 1840 the cause was heard upon the bill, answer, replication, depositions, exhibits, and arguments of counsel, and a decree made against the defendant, HELD, the cause was prematurely set for hearing, and prematurely heard. The decree was therefore reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to send the case to rules, there to remain for two months before it shall be set for hearing at the instance of either party, (unless it be set for hearing before the lapse of the two months by the consent of parties,) and for such decree in the case after it shall be set for hearing, as may be proper. Accord. Dalby v. Price, 2 Wash. 191.

This was a suit in chancery in the circuit court of Randolph county, by Garrett Johnson against Henry Poling. The subpoena was issued the 2d of December 1839, returnable to the first monday in January following, and was returned "executed by delivering a copy to the defendant." The bill was filed at May rules 1840. At August rules 1840, the defendant appeared and filed his answer, to which the plaintiff replied generally. At September rules 1840 (according to the record) the plaintiff came by his attorney and set the cause for hearing.

And on the 5th of October 1840
256 *a decree was made against the defendant. It commenced as follows: "This cause came on this day to be heard upon the bill, answer, replication, depositions and exhibits, and arguments of counsel." The depositions were on both sides.

On the petition of the defendant Poling, an appeal was allowed from the decree. The petition assigned several errors, but only one need be mentioned; to wit, that the cause was prematurely set for hearing, and prematurely heard and decided, the same having been set for hearing on the first rule day after the answer filed and replication thereto, and having been decided by the court in the following month; all which was without the consent and against the will of the defendant.

George H. Lee for appellant. The subpoena having been returned executed, the bill ought to have been filed at the return day; and this not having been done, the suit ought regularly to have been dismissed under the act of assembly. The circumstance of the defendant having answered may preclude him from now requiring the suit to be dismissed; but it does not prevent him from making the objection that the suit was set for hearing in less than four months after the answer was filed. The rule formerly was, that upon an answer and replication filed, six months from the time of the replication were allowed the parties for taking their depositions; and the cause could not then be set for hearing, nor heard and determined, before the expiration of the six months, without the consent of the parties entered of record. Dalby v. Price, 2 Wash. 191. The period has since been reduced to four months. Sess. Acts of 1822-3, p. 39, ch. 37, § 1; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 129. But the case of Dalby v. Price still applies, when a cause is set for hearing (and then heard and determined) before the expiration of the time prescribed by the statute now in force.

257 *Price for appellee. If, at the time of the hearing, the defendant had any objection to the cause being heard, he ought to have made it then. It may fairly be inferred that the hearing was by consent. The entry that the cause was heard upon the arguments of counsel authorizes this inference. Dalby v. Price was decided before the act of February 27, 1828, which declares that no decree shall be reversed for informality in the proceedings, where the parties have proceeded to take their depositions, and it appears to the court that there has been a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done between the parties. Sess. Acts of 1827-8, p. 20, ch. 25, § 1; Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 125. Here, both parties proceeded to take depositions, and substantial justice has been done. The objection must be deemed invalid, if any regard be had to what would be the rule at law under like circumstances. If a declaration be filed in term, a plea then put in, issue joined and trial had, a defendant would not be permitted to object in an appellate court that the cause had been prematurely tried.

Lee in reply. The court cannot infer from the entry of the decree, that the arguments of counsel there mentioned were of the counsel on both sides. And if it could so infer, still this is not tantamount to an entry upon the record, that the defendant consented to the cause being heard; which it is held in Dalby v. Price ought to appear, to constitute a waiver of the objection. The act of 1828 cannot cure this error. 1. The parties must have proceeded to take their depositions; they must have taken all their depositions; which cannot be intended here, where the time has not elapsed which is allowed for the purpose. 2. When the party has not had the time intended for him to take his depositions, the court cannot say that there has been a full and fair hearing; and unless there has been a full and fair hearing, 258 *it is impossible to say that substantial justice has been done.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the resolution of the court:

The court is of opinion that the case was prematurely set for hearing, that being done at rules at the instance of the plaintiff, one month after the answer and replication thereto; and as it does not distinctly appear that at the hearing of the case, the defendant, in person or by counsel, appeared and was heard, the court below ought not to have proceeded to hear the case and render a decree therein. Had the record distinctly shewn that the defendant appeared at the hearing, in person or by counsel, the court might properly imply, that as no objection appears in the record to have been taken to the said irregularity at rules, the objection thereto was waived, and the cause heard by consent, though such consent was not expressly stated on the record. For the irregularity aforesaid, the court is of opinion that the decree is erroneous. Therefore the said decree is reversed with costs. And the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to send the case to rules, there to remain for two months before it shall be set for hearing at the instance of either party, (unless it be set for hearing before the lapse of the two months by the consent of parties,) and for such decree in the case after it shall be set for hearing, as may be proper.

259 *Dawson v. Watkins.

August, 1848, Lewisburg.

Writ of Right—Constructive Seisin—How Disproved—

Case Approved.—The decision in Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. 27, that in a writ of right, where the demandant shews no seisin by a pedis positio, but relies wholly on a constructive seisin by virtue of a patent of the land as vacant land, it is competent for the tenants to disprove that constructive seisin by showing that the state had previously granted the same land to other persons, with whom the tenants claim no privity, approved and acted on.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—The demandant in a writ of right claims the land (of which the tenant is in possession) under a patent bearing date the 17th of June 1786, and the tenant disproves the constructive seisin of the demandant, by shewing a patent for a large tract embracing the

—In Breathed v. Smith, 1 P. & H. 804, it is said: "It is well settled, that in a writ of right, where the demandant shows no actual possession (or seisin by pedis positio as it is termed), but relies wholly on a constructive seisin by virtue of a patent of the land as vacant land, it is competent for the tenant to disprove that constructive seisin, by showing that the state had previously granted the same land to other persons with whom the tenant claims no privity. *Green v. same land, which issued as early as the first of December 1773. Whereupon the demandant, to establish a seisin in deed by a pedis positio, proves that the patentee under whom he claims came, in 1824 or 1825, to the county in which the land lies, and employed an agent to enter upon and survey the said land and various other tracts in the same county; that the said agent procured a surveyor and chain carriers immediately thereafter, who went upon the land in question, and surveyed and remarked the same for the patentee. HELD, these facts are not sufficient to authorize a jury to find a seisin in the demandant.

This was a writ of right, brought on the 22d of September 1837 in the circuit court of Kanawha county, by William M. Watkins (trustee for Caroline M. R. Johnson wife of Edward Johnson) against John Dawson. The mise was duly joined, and at May term 1840 a jury was impanelled and a special verdict returned, which found the following facts.

That letters patent from the commonwealth of Virginia, bearing date on the 17th of June 1786, issued to Thomas Augustus Taylor assignee of Henry Banks for a tract of land containing 642 acres, lying then in the county of Greenbrier, now in the county of Kanawha.

260 *That Thomas Augustus Taylor, in the latter part of the year 1824 or the first part of the year 1825, came to the county of Kanawha, and employed an agent to enter upon and survey the said tract of land and various other tracts claimed by him in the county of Kanawha; that the said agent procured a surveyor and chain carriers immediately thereafter, who went upon the said tract of land and surveyed and remarked the same for the said Thomas Augustus Taylor.

That the said Thomas Augustus Taylor died intestate some time previous to the year 1830, leaving Thomas Osburn Taylor his only child and heir at law.

That Thomas Osburn Taylor died some time previous to the year 1835, having made his will, which, on the 2d of February 1835, was admitted to record in the court of the county of Powhatan (where the said Taylor in his lifetime resided and where he died), and which will was set forth at large in the verdict. After some specific bequests, it contained a devise by the testator of the residue of his property, both real and personal, unto Holden Rhodes and Archer L. Wooldridge as trustees for Caroline M. R. Johnson wife of Edward Johnson. And the said Rhodes and Wooldridge were also appointed executors.

That the executors named in the said will renounced their right to qualify as such, and administration with the will annexed was granted to Benjamin Watkins the sheriff of Powhatan county.

That the said Caroline M. R. Johnson wife of Edward Johnson, afterwards, to wit, on the 7th of October 1835, by her next friend W. M. Watkins filed a bill on the equity side of the circuit court of Powhatan county, against Holden Rhodes and Archer

L. Wooldridge as executors and trustees under the will aforesaid, for the purpose of substituting another trustee in the place and stead of the said Rhodes and Wooldridge; and by a decree of the said court

Higginson Hancock was substituted
261 *in the place and stead of the said

Rhodes and Wooldridge; and afterwards, by a further decree of the said court, William M. Watkins the demandant in this action was appointed and substituted, in the place and stead of said Hancock, trustee to execute and perform the will of the said Thomas O. Taylor.

That a copy of the will of the said Thomas O. Taylor with the orders of the court of probate, and copies of the decrees in the suit aforesaid, have been admitted to record in the office of Kanawha county court.

That in pursuance of the first decree, the said Holden Rhodes and Archer L. Wooldridge and Caroline M. R. Johnson executed a deed of conveyance to the said Higginson Hancock, bearing date the 12th of October 1835, which deed, with the certificates of acknowledgment thereof, was duly admitted to record in the office of the county court of Kanawha on the 4th of July 1838.

That in pursuance of the last decree, the said Higginson Hancock and Caroline M. R. Johnson executed a deed of conveyance to the said William M. Watkins the demandant, bearing date on the 17th of March 1837, which last deed, after being acknowledged before two justices, was on the first of June 1837 admitted to record in the office of the county court of Kanawha.

That under an order in this cause, the surveyor of Kanawha county made a survey of the land in controversy, and returned a plat and report of the same.

That John Green, in 1809, built a cabin and cleared about three acres of land at and immediately below the mouth of David Dick's branch, represented on said plat by figure 2, and extending down Pontalico river: that in the same year, one Robert Atkinson built a cabin and cleared some land at and above the mouth of Grapevine branch, at letter G. on said plat: that in the fall of 1811, the tenant John Dawson purchased of Atkinson (who had previously bought out Green) the possessory 262 *rights of the said Atkinson and

Green to the improvements aforesaid, paying therefor a horse valued at 50 dollars: that neither the said Atkinson nor Green had any title to said land, but both were what is commonly called in the country squatters: that the said tenant John Dawson, in February 1812, took possession under his purchase aforesaid of the two improvements aforesaid, the lower one at the time of his purchase containing about four acres of cleared ground, the upper one, formerly occupied by Green, containing about three acres as aforesaid: that the said Dawson the tenant has continued to occupy, from that time to the present time, the lands so obtained and the intermediate land lying between the same, except that portion lying above the line shaded with green, and between that and the said figure 2, at the mouth of David Dick's branch: that the said John Dawson has, from time to time since February 1812, continued to fence, clear and cultivate additional portions of said land, and for the last seven or eight years had enclosed and in cultivation all that portion of the land within the lines shaded with green on the said plat, and situate between the line dotted with red and the said line shaded with green, on the side next to the river: that the said Atkinson, during his residence on the said land, made sugar at or near the mouth of Grapevine at letter G. and for that purpose had a sugar camp, and used the trees for some distance up said creek; and that the said trees had been since used by said Dawson from time to time in making sugar: that the said Dawson, during the period of his occupation of said land as aforesaid, has never claimed any title to the said land, other than that derived from the said Atkinson as aforesaid.

That the land granted by the patent aforesaid to the said Thomas Augustus Taylor, and designated in the said plat by letters A. C. D. F. includes and comprehends within its boundaries all the 263 land occupied, held *or claimed by the said John Dawson as aforesaid, and designated on the plat by the lines shaded with green, beginning at letter G.

That during the colonial government of Virginia, to wit, on the 1st of December 1773, a grant was issued in the name of the king, and signed by the lieutenant governor of the colony, granting unto George Mercer, Andrew Wagoner and John West junior a tract of land in the county of Botetourt, now Kanawha, containing 6787 acres; and this tract embraces and comprehends within its boundaries the entire tract of land granted to Thomas Augustus Taylor by the patent aforesaid of the 16th of June 1786, and designated as aforesaid by the said plat.

That in the year 1826, Charles Fenton Mercer, one of the claimants under George Mercer one of the patentees in the said patent of the 1st of December 1773, employed a surveyor to go upon the land embraced in the said patent, and to run and mark the exterior lines of said patent, and revise and correct the partition lines which had been previously made, not less than five years before, between the patentees of the last named patent; and that said surveyor did go upon said land, and run and remark the exterior bounds last aforesaid, and did also revise and in some instances correct, and did generally remark, the partition lines last aforesaid.

If the law upon these facts should be for the demandant, then the jury found for the demandant the land laid down in the plat, and designated by the lines thereon shaded with green, commencing at letter G. at the mouth of Grapevine creek, and one cent damages; but if the law should be for the tenant, then they found for the tenant.

The circuit court, being of opinion that the law was for the demandant, entered judgment for him accordingly.

264 *On the petition of the tenant, a supersedeas was awarded.

B. H. Smith for plaintiff in error. There is no seisin found in the demandant, or any one else under whom he claims, unless the employment of an agent to survey the land may be construed into a seisin. It is, however, obvious that seisin cannot be inferred from such an act as surveying the land. Seisin and possession are identical; see opinion of Carr, J., in Bolling v. Mayor &c. of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 570. According to this authority, constructive seisin does not follow or attach to a junior grant. The constructive seisin of the land in controversy could only be in those claiming under the grant of the first of December 1773. The demandant, then, has to insist that he has actual seisin. And the subsequent survey cannot possibly by itself give actual seisin. The survey as found does not amount even to an entry. The intent to take possession did not exist. The intent was to ascertain the identity of the land. To constitute actual possession, the taking of esplees is necessary. There must be some improvement of the land, and an application of it to some use of which it is susceptible, such as taking coal from a mine, or cutting timber from the land and using or disposing of it. And in every instance there must be the intent to take possession. The act and the intent necessary to constitute actual possession are both wanting in this case. In Moss and others v. Scott, 2 Dana 274, 5, it is expressly decided that a survey is not seisin. On this subject the court is referred to 1 Salk. 246; Smith v. Burtis, 9 Johns. 180; Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters 442; Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Peters 53. If, from the facts which appear, the jury had been authorized to infer seisin, still it would be a valid objection to their verdict that the fact has not been found. But the facts did not authorize the jury to find either actual or constructive seisin. And without the 265 *one or the other, no writ of right can be maintained. Watts v. Cole &c., 2 Leigh 664.

Cooke for defendant in error. A writ of right only brings into controversy the mere rights of the parties to the suit, and a better subsisting adverse title in a third person is no defence to it. Green v. Litter and others, 8 Cranch 233. The tenant Dawson, under this decision, could not avail himself of the outstanding and superior title of Mercer, Wagoner and West. But in Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. 27, it is said, that where the demandant relies for proof of seisin solely upon a constructive seisin in virtue of a patent from the state of vacant lands, the tenant may shew that the land has been previously granted by the state; for that disproves the demandant's constructive seisin. This doctrine however will not avail the tenant, because in this case the demandant did not rely solely on his constructive seisin. On the contrary he proved an actual seisin per pedis positionem, of the most solemn and notorious sort. Taylor had held title to the land in question, and many other tracts in Kanawha, from 1786 for nearly 40 years, without actual seisin or pedis positio. He went to Kanawha in 1824 or early in 1825, to fortify his title by actual entries. In order to shew the full effect and legal extent of each entry, he surveyed each tract and remarked its boundaries. He "employed an agent to enter upon and survey this tract." The agent procured a surveyor and chain carriers, who "went upon the said tract of land, and surveyed and remarked the same for the said Thomas A. Taylor." He found on the land a squatter, the tenant Dawson, who claimed no title to the land, and he did not turn him out. Why should he have turned Dawson out? It could have answered no purpose. He could not have taken possession of the land in a more formal and solemn way than he did, 266 *unless he had served express notice on all the neighbourhood, and uttered in their presence some form of words indicating his intention.

Smith in reply. The argument of the counsel on the other side leads to the conclusion that every junior grantee necessarily has seisin: for every junior grant is preceded by a survey. But it is impossible to construe an entry by an agent, with intent to identify the land by survey, into an actual possession, especially where there is an actual adverse possession. If Dawson was a mere tenant at sufferance, he was not the tenant of Taylor or of those holding under him, but the tenant of those who had the superior title, and his possession was therefore adverse to all the world but the true owner. Jackson v. Shark, 9 Johns. 167. Moreover the case of Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. 30, shews (as does also the case of Watts v. Cole &c.) that where seisin is to be made out by a pedis positio, a taking of the esplees or something equivalent thereto is essential.

ALLEN, J. From the special verdict it appears that the land in controversy was embraced in two patents, and the demandant claimed under the junior grant. The tenant in possession is not found to claim under the elder grant, nor is any privity shewn to exist between him and those claiming under the first patent. Facts are found tending to shew a continued possession of the land by him: but in the view I have taken of the case, I deem it unnecessary to express any opinion upon the character of his possession, and shall consider the question as if he were a mere occupant without claim or colour of title. Every possession of land has the presumption of right in its favour, and until such presumption is destroyed by proof, the possession is adverse: and the actual occupation and enjoyment of land in the accustomed mode, without any recognition 267 *by the occupant of title in another, or disavowal of right in himself, would, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, raise the presumption that he held as owner. Where, however, no claim of right has been made, the law adjudges the possession to be in subservience to the legal owner (Jackson v. Thomas, 16 Johns. R. 293); for he cannot claim the benefit of a legal presumption, who has shewn by his acts that no such presumption exists. But without dwelling on this branch of the case, involving, as it does, questions of deep interest to many individuals, it is sufficient here to say that the demandant by this proceeding admits the tenant, for the purposes of this action, to be tenant of the freehold. This seisin thus conceded is sufficient for the tenant, if he can establish that the demandant, or those under whom he claims, had no such seisin as is required to maintain a writ of right.

The special verdict does not, in terms, find a seisin in the demandant or those under whom he claims. This perhaps would of itself be a sufficient objection to a judgment in favour of the demandant on this verdict. In Barnes v. Williams, 11 Wheaton 415, it appeared that the claim of the plaintiffs was founded on a bequest of slaves, and it was essential to a recovery at law that the assent of the executors should be proved. Chief justice Marshall said, that although, in the opinion of the court, there was sufficient evidence in the special verdict from which the jury might have found the fact, yet they had not found it, and the court, on a special verdict, could not intend it. In Watts v. Cole &c., 2 Leigh 662, it is said that seisin cannot be presumed by the court, even if the jury had found facts from which they might have properly presumed it. But passing this objection, which, if nothing more appeared, might require a venire facias de novo, have the jury found any evidence of the fact, which would have justified the finding of seisin in the demandant? If 268 not,—if the *facts found disprove such seisin, it would be useless to send the parties back for another trial.

The commonwealth, according to the uniform course of decision, cannot be dis-seised of the public domain. Her estate is divested by her grant, and vested in the patentee. Such grant confers title on the grantee, and therefore must confer seisin, one of the essential requisites of a complete title. Accordingly it has been uniformly held that a patent confers constructive seisin in deed, sufficient to enable the patentee to maintain his writ of right. Clay v. White &c., 1 Munf. 162; Green v. Litter &c., 8 Cranch 229; Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheaton 27. But seisin of some kind must be shewn, either the constructive seisin in deed by the operation of the grant, or seisin in deed by the possession of the land and the perception of the profits. When seisin of either kind is shewn in the demandant, according to the decision of the supreme court in Green v. Litter &c., it is not competent for the tenant to defeat the action by evidence of a superior outstanding title in a third person.

The special verdict in this case finds that the land was embraced in the elder patent to Mercer and others. That grant conferred upon the grantees the seisin of the commonwealth, and disproved the constructive seisin in deed in the demandant and those under whom he claimed. To sustain his action on his junior grant, he must prove that he had seisin in deed by the actual possession and perception of the profits. The land at the date of his grant was in the adverse seisin of those claiming under the senior patent; and as two claiming under different grants, and adverse to each other, cannot be seized of the same land at the same time, the junior patentee can only establish an actual seisin in himself by proving an ouster of those holding under the prior grant.

The only fact found tending to prove such ouster of the senior patentee and seisin by the demandant, is, *that in the 269 year 1824 or 1825 the patentee visited the county of Kanawha, where the lands are situated, and employed an agent to enter upon and survey the tract of land in question, and various other tracts claimed by him in that county; and that the said agent immediately thereafter employed a surveyor and chain carriers, who went upon the said tract, and surveyed and remarked the same for the patentee. What acts of ownership will be sufficient to constitute an ouster of the senior patentee, and invest the junior patentee with actual seisin in deed, must in a great measure depend on the circumstances of each case. Where seisin of the latter kind is relied on, the rule is generally laid down that it must be evidenced by an actual occupation and taking of the esplees. Cases may be put (as of a barren rock) where there are no esplees: still there must be some application of the land to some purpose of which it is susceptible. It is not necessary that the land should be enclosed or built upon, or actually cultivated or cleared; but to operate a dis-seisin of one having right, the entry should be made under the claim of title, with the intention of taking possession, and be accompanied with such visible acts of ownership as from their nature indicate a notorious claim of property in the land. The character of the acts necessary to give such seisin must necessarily vary with the situation of the land and the condition of the country. In a settled and cultivated region, an actual occupation and permanency of the profits might be required; whilst in the wilderness, a possession of a less definite character might suffice, if the jury should be satisfied that the property was not susceptible of a more strict occupation. However difficult it may be to lay down any precise rule adapted to every case, I am satisfied that the facts found in this verdict would not have warranted the jury in finding an ouster of the rightful owner and a seisin in the demandant. It has 270 *never been held that a subsequent entry and survey (acts which must precede a patent) of themselves worked a disseisin of the elder patentee. Here it does not appear with what intention the entry was made. The inference from the whole finding is, that the entry was made, not with the intent to take possession,—to give notice to adverse claimants and the community of an actual, visible and exclusive possession of the land, but with the intent to ascertain the boundaries of land claimed by the party, and to preserve the evidence with a view to some future occupation or act of ownership. To give to such a transaction the effect of an actual ouster of the true owner, would be establishing a principle by which every proprietor of vacant lands might be disseised without his knowledge or the possibility of protecting himself. There is great reason for requiring strict and satisfactory proof of such a possession as is notorious and exclusive, when seisin so acquired is alone relied on to counteract the effect of evidence adduced by the tenant, of an outstanding better title in a third person. For, if the possession of the tenant is without claim or colour of title, his possession is in subservience to the legal owner; he is in fact a tenant at sufferance of the holder of the better title, and such a possession could not be divested but by an actual pedis positio and taking of the profits.

I think the judgment should be reversed, and a judgment entered for the tenant.

The other judges concurring, judgment reversed with costs, and judgment entered for the tenant.

Estoppel—Recital of Payment in Deed—Relief in Equity.†—A deed conveying land contains an acknowledgment on its face that the purchase money has been paid, though in truth no payment thereof has been made. In an action of assumpsit for the purchase money, the defendant, by way of estoppel, relies upon the acknowledgment in the deed; and the plaintiffs, believing that the estoppel will prevent their recovery at law, dismiss their action, and file a bill in equity against the purchaser. HELD, they are entitled to the aid of a court of equity. Accord. Wilson's curator v. Shelton's adm'r, 9 Leigh 342.

On the 10th of March 1835, a deed was made between James Radcliff and wife and Robert Wiley jr. of the one part, and Benjamin High of the other part, whereby it was witnessed, that in consideration of the sum of 91 dollars and 50 cents to the said Radcliff and wife and Wiley in hand paid, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged, they conveyed to High all their right and title to a certain piece of land described in the deed.

In October 1839, Radcliff and Wiley exhibited a bill in the circuit court of Harrison, setting forth, that High promised to pay them the consideration money of 91 dollars and 50 cents within a few weeks after the deed was made: that they, confiding in his promises, took from him no obligation for the purchase money: that afterwards he refused to pay them, and they instituted an action of assumpsit against him to recover the said sum, in which action he, by plea of estoppel, pleaded and relied upon the acknowledgment in the deed that the purchase money had been paid by him: and the complainants, being satisfied that the plea of estoppel would prevent their recovery at 272 law, dismissed the action. *The

prayer of the bill was, that High should be decreed to pay the said purchase money with interest.

High admitted in his answer, that he did defend himself in the action at law, as stated in the bill; but he did not pretend that the consideration money had in truth been paid, and it clearly appeared that no payment thereof had been made.

Other grounds were taken in the answer against the claim of the plaintiffs, which, in the opinion of the circuit court, were sufficient; and that court accordingly decreed that the bill be dismissed, and that the complainants pay to the defendant his costs.

From this decree an appeal was allowed.

The cause was submitted without argument, by William A. Harrison for the appellants, and George H. Lee for the appellee.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the resolution of the court:

The court is of opinion that the appellants were entitled to the aid of the court of equity, in recovering the amount agreed to be paid by the appellee, for the conveyance of their interest in the land mentioned in the deed from the appellants to the appellee, filed as an exhibit in the cause; the legal remedy for the recovery of the same having been successfully obstructed by the plea at law of the said deed, and the acknowledgment it contained of the receipt of the purchase money, as an estoppel to the claim in that forum. The court, without deciding whether this defence ought to have availed at law, is of opinion that in this case it is not for the appellee to say it ought not, while he enjoys the benefit of the successful use of it at law; and that the decree dismissing the bill is erroneous. Therefore the decree is reversed with costs. And this court proceeding to render such decree as 273 the court below ought *to have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered and decreed that the appellants recover of the appellee the sum of 91 dollars 50 cents with interest thereon from the 10th of March 1836 till paid, and the costs by them expended in the superior court in the prosecution of their suit.

RECEIPTS.

I. Definition.

II. Effect of Receipt.

1. When It Is Obtained by Fraud.
2. As Evidence.
3. Parol Evidence to Vary.
4. In Deeds of Conveyance.

I. DEFINITION.

Receipts are either mere admissions of payments or delivery, or they contain a contract to do something in relation to the thing delivered. Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 387.

II. EFFECT OF RECEIPT.

1. WHERE IT IS OBTAINED BY FRAUD.—

Where, by collusion with one of two administrators, a debtor to the estate of the decedent pays a part of the debt, and procures a receipt for the whole, knowing that the other administrator is the sole acting and responsible representative, the receipt is not acquittance for the whole debt, but equity will, notwithstanding, allow the debtor a credit for the payment actually made. Laidley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh 346.

Alterations Render Receipt Open to Suspicion.—Every alteration on the face of a written instrument, such as a receipt, detracts from its credit and makes it suspicious, which suspicion the party claiming under it is ordinarily bound to remove. Elgin v. Hall, 82 Va. 680. In this case it was held that alterations on the face of receipts offered in evidence, being unexplained, rendered them worthless.

2. AS EVIDENCE.

Generally—Where a receipt is not impeached for mistake, error or fraud, it is evidence of a settlement of accounts between the parties, and is a ratification and acceptance of the payments claimed as credits in said receipt. Ruby v. Railroad Co., 8 W. Va. 269; Tate v. Jones, 98 Va. 544, 36 S. E. Rep. 984. Thus where a party accepts payment for certain work and receipts in full for all demands under his contract of labor; this receipt furnishes a complete defence to an action brought by him upon the contract in which action he claims damages for the alleged failure of the other party to perform his part of the contract. Scott v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 90 Va. 241, 17 S. E. Rep. 882.

Receipt by Assignor Not Evidence against Assignee.—The acknowledgment, written or verbal, of the assignor of a claim, that the same has been paid to him, is no proof against the assignee, unless it be proved to have been made before the assignment; and the burden of proving this lies on the debtor. In such case the date of the acknowledgment or receipt will not be taken as prima facie true. Wilcox v. Pearman, 9 Leigh 144.

As Evidence of Settlement of Fiduciary Accounts.—In Tate v. Jones, 98 Va. 544, 36 S. E. Rep. 984, an administrator had a settlement with the residuary legatees, and received receipts from them in full of their interests in the estate. He afterwards collected money on judgments in his favor as administrator. After the execution of such receipts, and until the administrator's death, a period of some seventeen years, all parties in interest treated the accounts as settled; and after the administrator's death no claim was made against his estate, except by complainant, an assignee of one of such legatees, who sued the administrator's estate, for a settlement of his accounts. It was held that it must be presumed that the money collected on the judgment was embraced in the receipts.

Best Evidence Rule—When Production Is Required.—

Under the rule requiring the production of the best evidence, where a witness introduced by the plaintiff speaks of receipts which he had taken, the evidence ought to be rejected, unless he shows that they were lost or offers some other valid excuse for the failure to produce them. Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

3. PAROL EVIDENCE TO VARY.

Generally—It is a general and well-settled rule that parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument. The rigor of this rule, however, is relaxed in its application to receipts as contradistinguished from contracts generally. In regard to receipts, it is to be noted that they may be either mere acknowledgments of payment or delivery, or they may also contain a contract to do something in relation to the thing delivered. In the former case, and so far as the receipt goes only to acknowledge payment or delivery, it is merely prima facie evidence of the fact, and not conclusive; and, therefore, the fact which it recites may be contradicted by oral testimony. But in so far as it is evidence of a contract between the parties, it stands on the footing of all other contracts. Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 387; Dolan v. Freiberg, 4 W. Va. 101.

A receipt for money which purports to be "in full, on account, to date," does not import an agreement or contract between the parties, and is open to explanation or contradiction by parol proof. Dolan v. Freiberg, 4 W. Va. 101.

To Explain Receipt.—An attorney's receipt for claims for collection may be so far added to by parol testimony as to show a contemporaneous additional contract on the part of the attorney to receive the claims as collateral security for debts due him from the client. But the liability of the attorney or transferee is only for the exercise of due diligence to collect those claims; and in neither capacity is he responsible for their loss, unless such loss be occasioned by his negligence. Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 387.

Covenant in Receipt Cannot Be Excluded by Parol Evidence.—An agreement that "all matters and things embraced by the within contract have been fully adjusted and settled, and this contract is, for value received, declared ended and settled," cannot, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake, be shown by parol testimony to have referred only to money accounts between the parties to the contract, and not to have included a covenant therein, on the part of the party paying the consideration for the release, not to engage in a certain business with any one else for a certain time. Bonsack Machine Co. v. Woodrum, 88 Va. 512, 18 S. E. Rep. 994.

4. IN DEEDS OF CONVEYANCE.—Where a vendor of land executes a deed of conveyance to the purchaser, in which he acknowledges receipt of the purchase money, and subjoins to the deed a recelpt in full for the same, he is not precluded from claiming the balance due him in equity, where the whole purchase money was in fact not paid. Wilson v. Shelton, 9 Leigh 342; Radcliff v. High, 2 Rob. 271. See also, monographic note on "Estoppel" appended to Bower v. McCormick, 23 Gratt. 310.

Robinett v. Preston's Heirs.

August, 1843, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Joint Tenants—Conveyance of Part by One Tenant—

Effect.*—At the trial of the mise joined in a writ of right, after the demandants had introduced a grant to their ancestor, embracing the land demanded, the tenant introduced an earlier grant of the land to two grantees, and offered to give in evidence a deed from one of those grantees, conveying by metes and bounds a particular part of the land to a person under whom he (the tenant) claimed, and also offered other evidence tending to prove that partition had been in fact made, though without deed, between the two grantees. The circuit court, being of opinion that the conveyance by metes and bounds by one joint tenant, of a portion of the land held jointly, was void, refused to permit the same to go in evidence to the jury; and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the demandants. HELD, the circuit court erred; and its judgment therefore reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, on which the conveyance, if offered, is not to be rejected on the ground that it is void.

This was a writ of right in the circuit court of Lee, brought by certain persons as the heirs of Walter Preston against Isaac Robinett. At the trial of the mise, the demandants introduced a grant of the com-

*Joint Tenants—Conveyance of Part by One Tenant—

Effect.—The principal case is cited in McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 346, as authority for the proposition, that although a conveyance by one joint tenant of a part of the land might have no legal effect to the prejudice of the cotenant, yet it would be effectual to pass the interest of the grantor in the tract. And if upon partition, the share assigned of the cotenant did not include the part conveyed, the cotenant would get all he was entitled to, and the grantor could not deny his deed.

The principal case is further cited in this connection in Cox v. McMullin, 14 Gratt. 90; Bogges v. Meredith, 16 W. Va. 27; Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 239.

Same—Same—Same.—The principal case is cited in Buchanan v. King, 22 Gratt. 422, for the proposition that a conveyance by metes and bounds of part of an estate held in common, though valid against the grantor, cannot prejudice the rights of the cotenant, unless followed by entry and adversary possession. The grantee becomes thereby merely a tenant in common with the cotenants of his grantor; his possession is in presumption of law, the possession of all, and is to be deemed in support and not in derogation of the common title.

monwealth of Virginia, dated the 30th of May 1800, to Walter Preston for 1000 acres of land lying partly within the disputed territory comprised within or between Walker's and Henderson's lines; and the tenant admitted the demandants to be the heirs of the said Walter Preston. Whereupon the tenant introduced a copy of a grant of the commonwealth of North Carolina, dated the 12th of July 1794, to Andrew and David Greer for 640 acres of land beginning on Henderson's line and lying south thereof, within the said disputed territory; and the said tenant also introduced, as a link in his chain of title, and to connect himself with the grant to the said Greers, a deed dated the 26th of September 1797, from Andrew Greer, one of said grantees, to David Archer, conveying by metes and bounds 320 of the said 640 acres of land, being the northern half thereof. To the introduction of this deed as evidence the demandants objected, upon the ground that as no partition of this grant had been made by the grantees, it was not competent for one of them, a joint tenant of the granted land, to convey by metes and bounds such portion as he pleased, without the assent of his cotenant, and in prejudice of his rights; and that such conveyance is wholly void. The tenant contended, that from the great lapse of time, and other circumstances, the assent of David Greer, the other grantee, to this partition of Andrew Greer by his deed of conveyance aforesaid, was to be presumed; and in support of such presumption offered two depositions of William Wilson, mentioning an old survey by one Thompson for the purpose of partition, and also offered the conveyance by said Archer of this 320 acres of land to Lawrence Horn, and shewed that the sheriff of Hawkins county, Tennessee, levied on this land and sold and conveyed the same to John Hannah, who conveyed the same on the 27th of November 1804 to William Armstrong, under whom, in 1816, possession was first taken; which possession has been regularly transmitted, by various deeds of conveyance, *down to the tenant, and to the commencement of this suit on the 24th of July 1837, and to this time. The tenant also introduced the following witnesses. Amos Grantham proved, that wishing to purchase some of the land, he went in 1816 to Knoxville, Tennessee, where he found George Wilson, a son in law of one of the said Greers, who claimed half of said North Carolina grant, and shewed the witness the grant, and offered to sell to witness half of it for 800 dollars, which witness refused to give; and Wilson said at that time, that the land had never been divided, that he had never seen it, and that he knew nothing of it except by information. Lincoln Amis proved that the common report in the neighbourhood of the land was, and is, that one Thompson a surveyor, wishing to purchase some of the land, had divided the same; but how he divided it, or by what authority, the witness has not heard and does not know. Stephen Wilborn proved, that more than 40 years ago he saw some one surveying this land for William Armstrong, as he understood; but whether it was Thompson, or who it was, the witness does not know. It appeared at the trial, that there was less than 640 acres in the North Carolina grant; that the quantity claimed by the tenant under Andrew Greer is about 220 acres; and that the land so claimed by the tenant is within the grant to Walter Preston. There was no evidence to shew what had become of the other half of the North Carolina grant, or whether it is possessed or claimed by any person, except the evidence before stated; nor did it appear which of the Greers was father in law to Wilson, nor whether they are living or dead, or whether there be any descendants or heirs of them or either of them.

The circuit court, upon the authority of certain cases decided by the supreme courts of Massachusetts, Connecticut and Vermont, (which it stated were to be found in 12 Mass. Rep. and 9 Vermont Rep. 276 or referred to *therein) held that the conveyance by Andrew Greer to David Archer, being a conveyance by metes and bounds by one tenant in common or joint tenant, of a portion of the land held jointly or in common, was void, and refused to permit the same to go in evidence to the jury. To this opinion the tenant excepted.

A verdict was found for the demandants, for so much of the land demanded as was held by the tenant, and for one cent damages; and judgment was rendered thereupon. To which judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

The cause was argued by the attorney general for the plaintiff in error, and M'Comas for the defendants in error. In the course of the argument, the following authorities were cited and examined: Porter v. Perkins &c., 5 Mass. R. 233; Porter v. Hill, 9 Mass. R. 34; Bartlet v. Harlow, 12 Mass. R. 348; Varnum v. Abbot &c., 12 Mass. R. 474; Starr v. Leavitt, 2 Conn. R. 243; Hinman v. Leavenworth, 2 Conn. R. 244, note (a); Mitchell v. Hazen, 4 Conn. R. 495; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. R. 363; Taylor v. Horde &c., 1 Burr. 108; 2 Co. Lit. 237 a., 237 b., 238 a., 238 b.

ALLEN, J. As between joint tenants, one cannot do an act to the prejudice of the other; but the joint tenancy can at any time be destroyed by a conveyance by one of the joint tenants to a stranger. Such conveyance severs the joint tenancy by destroying the unity of title, and also by destroying the unity of possession; for the alienee and the remaining tenant have several freeholds. 2 Cruise's Dig. title 18, ch. 2, § 10. But though cases of severance by the conveyance of one joint tenant are of frequent occurrence, this happens, it is said, where such conveyance is of the joint tenant's estate in the land, but not where it is a part of the land. As between the joint tenants, there may 277 *be good reason for holding that a conveyance by one, of a specific parcel of the land, should not affect his cotenant. They are seized per mi et per tout, and neither has a right at his election to convey a particular portion, so as to affect or prejudice his cotenant. The cases in Massachusetts Reports, cited in the argument, establish the proposition that one shall not convey so as to prejudice the cotenant. And this is the extent to which they have gone. As between the tenant conveying and his grantee, in one of the earliest cases (Porter v. Hill, 9 Mass. R. 34), it is intimated that such conveyance may operate by way of estoppel against the grantor; which could not be if the deed were to be considered as entirely void.

The earlier cases in that court arose in controversies where the tenants were parties. But in Varnum v. Abbot &c., 12 Mass. R. 480, the question directly arose, whether such a conveyance had any effect as against the grantor and those claiming under him? After reviewing the cases in which it had been held that such a conveyance could have no legal effect to the prejudice of a cotenant, the court proceeded to consider its effect as against the grantor, and determined that it is effectual against him. If upon a partition the share assigned to the cotenant does not include the part conveyed, the cotenant has got all he has a right to, and the grantor cannot be permitted to deny his deed. So in the case of a release by the cotenant to the alienee, of his moiety in the part conveyed, the alienee would have a deed from each, and yet, if the first conveyance was merely void, it could not help the second; and so the party in possession, with deeds from each of the tenants who alone had any pretence of title to the land, would still be unable to maintain the possession. For these and other reasons given by the court, they determined that the deed is not absolutely void.

278 *With us, there are still stronger reasons (if any were required) for holding such deeds not to be void. All grants are to be most strongly construed against the grantor; and by our statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 20, p. 368, all alienations purporting to pass or assure a greater right or estate than the grantor may lawfully pass or assure, shall operate as alienations of so much of the right and estate as the grantor might lawfully convey. Under the covenants of such a deed as this, though it might be ineffectual to pass the particular tract as against the cotenant, yet as against the grantor and strangers it would be effectual to pass the interest of the grantor in the tract. Possession under it would support a release from the cotenant: and if the part conveyed were assigned to the alienee on partition, the title would be absolute at law. The deed being good against the grantor, the entry of the tenant under it would be lawful; and though it might be inoperative so far as the rights of the cotenant were thereby prejudiced, yet as it would invest the grantee with the estate of the grantor so far as he could lawfully convey, the grantee would be tenant in common with the cotenant of his grantor, to the extent of the interest conveyed. His possession and seisin would be the possession and seisin of both, because such possession and seisin would not be adverse to the right of his companion, but in support of their common title.

I think, therefore, that the court erred in deciding that the deed was merely void.

Even if the matter were more doubtful than I think it is, still the court erred in excluding the deed. Evidence was introduced tending to prove that a partition had been made between the tenants. The jury were the judges of the effect of that evidence. If a partition had in fact been made, though without deed, and the parties had held in severalty afterwards for a period

279 sufficiently long to bar a writ of right, the jury might *have presumed a deed. Whether the circumstances in evidence would have justified such presumption, it is not necessary to determine. The deed, in connexion with the other evidence, was admissible, as tending to prove facts from which such a presumption might arise.

The deed, too, was proper evidence on other grounds. The tenant (as the bill of exceptions discloses) relied on the possession. Whether the evidence would have made out such a possession as of itself would have been sufficient to bar a recovery, was a question of fact for the jury. If the tenant claimed to hold by virtue of the deed, though it might not have furnished evidence of title, it would have shewn that he claimed under colour of title, and was not a mere naked trespasser. In that point of view, and for the purpose of defining and designating the extent of his possession, the deed was proper evidence.

I think the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, upon which the deed, if offered, is not to be rejected upon the ground that it was merely void.

The other judges concurring, judgment entered accordingly.

*Tavenner v. Robinson.

August, 1843, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Deed of Trust*—Chattels—Discharge of Deed.—A slave conveyed by a deed of trust is sold, in the absence of the trustee, by the debtor with the concurrence of the trust creditor, to another creditor not secured by the deed, for a consideration compounded of the balance remaining due upon the trust, other debts claimed by the trust creditor, and a debt due to the purchasing creditor. HELD.

that by this arrangement the trust deed was discharged, and the title of the trustee, so far as concerns the personal property embraced in the deed, divested; for in a conveyance of chattels personal the law disregards mere formalities of the instrument, and the payment of the debt secured thereupon completely extinguishes the incumbrance.

Fraud—Sale of Personalty—Retention of Possession by Vendor.†—The vendor of a slave continuing in possession until an execution was levied on the slave more than a year after the sale, and the presumption arising from the inconsistency of the possession with the title claimed by the vendee not being repelled by any circumstances appearing in the case, but the circumstances on the contrary confirming the presumption of fraud, the sale declared void as to the execution creditor.

Executions—Title of Sheriff Purchasing at His Own Sale.—The owner of a slave sells her, but remains in possession. The slave is afterwards levied upon under execution, and the vendee forbidding the sheriff to sell, the creditor gives an indemnifying bond with security, and then the slave is sold by the sheriff, and the sheriff becomes himself the purchaser, though at the time in the name of another. In an action of detinue by the first vendee against the sheriff so purchasing, HELD the question whether a sheriff can acquire title by a purchase at his own sale does not arise, but the proper enquiry is whether the title of the plaintiff is valid against the execution creditor.

This was an action of detinue, brought in the circuit court of Wood by James Robinson against Franklin Tavenner, for a female slave named Zilpa; and the plea was the general issue.

At the trial in September 1841, it appeared by the evidence, that some years previously Charles H. L. *West moved from the state of Maryland to Wood county, and brought Zilpa with him; that West was an improvident and intemperate man, who became embarrassed in his circumstances, and indebted to divers persons; and that on the 21st of January 1834 he made a deed of trust, which was admitted to record in the office of Wood county court on the 22d of the same month, whereby,—after reciting that J. M. Stephenson had become surety for him in a forthcoming bond to William Tefft and Otis L. Bradford, for the use of Tefft, for 92 dollars 47 cents, and also surety for him in another forthcoming bond to Levi Wells for 36 dollars 51 cents, and that he was indebted to Stephenson 25 dollars by a single bill bearing date on that day, payable on demand,—the said West conveyed to Thomas M'Farland his interest in three several parcels of land, also a negro slave by the name of Sylph, two horses, one cow, &c. in trust that M'Farland should permit West to remain in possession of said land and personal property until default be made in the payment of the said forthcoming bonds, and then in trust that so soon as the said bonds should become forfeited, M'Farland should sell so much of said property as should be sufficient for the payment of the aforesaid bonds, or so much thereof as should remain unpaid, after having advertised the said sale 20 days at the door of the courthouse of the county, and should, out of the proceeds of sale, first pay all the costs attending the execution of his trust, and then pay off the amount of said bonds &c. or so much as might remain unpaid by the said West. The record did not distinctly state that Zilpa was the same slave that was conveyed by this deed by the name of Sylph, but it may be inferred that she was. The trustee M'Farland, it appeared, advertised a sale of the said slave to take place at the house of West on the 4th of March 1835; but on the day of sale, he being absent from the commonwealth, West executed a paper 282 under his hand *and seal, authorizing and empowering Stephenson to make the sale in pursuance of the advertisement, and Stephenson proceeded to sell the said slave accordingly. She was struck off to the plaintiff Robinson for 88 dollars, and the following writing was thereupon executed by West and Robinson: "James Robinson this day purchased at public sale a negro girl of C. H. L. West, by the name of Sylph, for the sum of 88 dollars, which said girl is now in the possession of the said West; and it is agreed by the said Robinson that the said girl may remain in the possession of the said West for the present; the said West on his part agreeing to give up the said girl at any time on the request of the said Robinson or his assigns. Given under our hands and seals this 4th day of March 1835.

Chs. H. L. West, [Seal.]
 Jas. Robinson, [Seal.]"

It was understood at the sale, that the forthcoming bonds mentioned in the deed of trust had been previously paid and satisfied, leaving the sum of money due Stephenson alone to be provided for by the sale. A computation was made previous to the sale, ascertaining West to be indebted to Stephenson about the sum of 60 dollars, which included 25 dollars mentioned in the deed of trust, with the interest thereon, and some additional accounts in which West stood indebted to Stephenson. West was also indebted to Robinson a sum which added to the amount aforesaid constituted an aggregate of 88 dollars. For this aggregate of 88 dollars Robinson made his first and only bid, and for this price the slave was struck off to him without competition. The only persons present at the sale, as far as recollected by the witness who deposed on the subject, were Stephenson, Robinson, West with his family, and two other persons. West, at the time of the sale,

283 was *much embarrassed in his circumstances, and generally considered insolvent. The slave had been in the possession of West from the time of his removal to the county, up to the time of the sale; was present at the sale; and thereafter continued as before in the family and service of West. At the time of the sale, Robinson, who had been the correspondent and agent of the uncle and brother of West (residents of Maryland), stated that Zilpa was the property of Arthur West the brother of the said Charles, and had been loaned to him for the use of his family, on his removal from Maryland to this county; that he was instructed by Arthur West to purchase her, so that she might be secured to the use of the family of the said Charles; that he was making the purchase for these purposes, and would give up all right in the said slave and convey her to Arthur West, on receiving the sum of money for which he had become the purchaser. No money was paid at that time, but some months afterwards Robinson liquidated the balance of the amount due Stephenson, having previously paid a part by a check drawn by the uncle of Charles H. L. West for 54 dollars. This balance Robinson stated he had received from Arthur West. Whether the remittance had been sufficient to cover the moneys due to Robinson did not clearly appear: the impression of the witness who deposed on the subject was, that Robinson informed him he had received 90 dollars. On the 25th of July 1836, a writ of fieri facias was sued out of the court of Wood county in favour of William Tefft against the goods of West, which was levied on Zilpa, who was then in his possession. Not being sold under the fieri facias for want of time, a venditioni exponas issued commanding the sale of her, upon which this return was made: "1836, October 17. The negro girl Zilpa sold to Rawley M. Kiger for 300 dollars, which sum more than satisfies this execution.

The balance is now in my hands. F. Tavenner D. S. for J. *Tomlinson S. W. C." While Zilpa was in the custody of the sheriff, another fieri facias issued from the same court on a judgment obtained by Alfred Beauchamp jr. against West, which was levied on the same slave, and the following return made thereon: "Satisfied by applying a part of the proceeds of the sale of a negro girl (Zilpa) sold to Rawley M. Kiger on the 17th October 1836. F. Tavenner D. S. for J. Tomlinson S. W. C." The defendant in this action was the acting sheriff who levied the executions aforesaid and sold the slave under the same. At the sheriff's sale, the plaintiff claimed the slave as his property, and forbade the sale; and on the requisition of the sheriff, Tefft, the plaintiff in the first execution, executed a bond with security for the sheriff's indemnity. The defendant procured Kiger to bid for and purchase in the slave for him, and she was knocked off at Kiger's bid for 300 dollars, and immediately thereafter went into the possession of the defendant, without Kiger's having any further agency in or control about the matter. The plaintiff's forbidding the sale of the slave probably affected the price for which she was sold. Some evidence was given tending to shew that the sale was hurried by the defendant, and without sufficient time being given for deliberate and reflecting bids by competitors; but the court was not satisfied that the sale was conducted with any fraud or unfairness.

Upon the evidence being closed, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the legal title to the said slave being in M'Farland the trustee, the substitution of Stephenson, and a sale by him of the slave, did not vest in Robinson the purchaser such right and title as would enable him to maintain this action: but the court was of opinion that as M'Farland's was a naked power, not coupled with any interest, it was competent for West the grantor and Stephenson the creditor to unite in the sale, by which the title

285 of West to the slave might *pass; and instructed the jury, that if the evidence satisfied them that the plaintiff Robinson had been repaid his purchase money, such repayment divested him of the title acquired by the purchase, under the terms and conditions thereof as herein before stated.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, ascertained the slave to be of the value of 500 dollars, and assessed the plaintiff's damages to 200 dollars.

After the verdict, the defendant moved the court to set aside the same and to award him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. The court overruled the motion; and a bill of exceptions was filed, stating the facts as before mentioned.

Judgment being rendered for the plaintiff, a supersedeas was awarded thereto.

The cause was submitted without argument, by Fisher for the plaintiff in error, and William A. Harrison for the defendant in error.

BALDWIN, J. The sale of the slave in controversy, though ostensibly under the trust deed, was substantially a sale by the debtor, with the concurrence of the trust creditor, to another creditor not secured by the deed, for a consideration compounded of the balance remaining due upon the trust, other debts claimed by the trust creditor, and the debt due to the purchasing creditor. By this arrangement the trust debt was discharged, and the title of the trustee, so far as concerns the personal property embraced in the deed, divested; for in a conveyance of chattels personal the law disregards mere formalities of the instrument, and the payment of the debt secured thereupon completely extinguishes the incumbrance. I think therefore that the circuit court correctly overruled the instruction asked for by the defendant there, it 286 being founded upon the *idea that the legal title to the slave in question was still outstanding in the trustee M'Farland.

But the debtor West's continued possession of the slave up to the time of the levy of the executions under which the defendant purchased, was inconsistent with the title claimed by Robinson, and rendered his purchase in contemplation of law fraudulent and void as against creditors, according to the rule declared in Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587; Land &c. v. Jeffries &c., 5 Rand. 211, 599; Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh 536; Mason v. Bond & co., 9 Leigh 181, and many other cases. There were no circumstances, such as are to be found in some of those cases, to repel the application of this rule. The sale was virtually made by the debtor, and cannot be considered as a fair, open and public sale made by a trustee. There was no obstacle to the plaintiff's obtaining immediate possession of the property. Nor was there a bona fide bailment of it for a valuable consideration, such as a hiring for a limited time. The unregistered agreement between West and Robinson, by which the former was to remain in possession of the property until it should be called for by the latter, comes within the very terms and spirit of the rule, instead of repelling its application. And if the legal conclusion of fraud needed confirmation, it would be found in all the material circumstances of the case,—the insolvency of the debtor, the gross inadequacy of the price, the total absence of competition, and the declarations of Robinson, calculated to prevent it, that he was purchasing in the property for the benefit of West's family. I deem it unnecessary to consider a question not yet decided by this court, whether a sheriff can acquire title by a purchase at his own sale. The title and possession of the plaintiff were fraudulent and void in regard to the creditors, the levy of whose executions was valid, however irregular the sale, and who have an interest in the result of this contro-287 versy, *arising out of the indemnifying bond, which guaranties against the consequences of the seizure as well as the sale of the property, and moreover warrants the title to the purchaser. My opinion therefore is, that the verdict of the jury was a plain deviation from the evidence, and that the circuit court erred in refusing a new trial.

The other judges concurring, the judgment was accordingly reversed with costs, the verdict set aside, and the cause sent back for a new trial.

*Tichanal v. Roe.

August, 1848, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Patent for Land—Construction of Statute.*—Construction of the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 86, § 40, p. 330, which declares that "no entry or location on any lands within this commonwealth, which have been settled thirty years prior to the date of such entry or location, and upon which quitrents or taxes can be proved to have been paid at any time within the said thirty years, shall be deemed valid;" and relinquishes any title that the commonwealth may be supposed to have thereto.

*Tempus Regi Non Occurrit—Statutory Exception.—The principal case, Gore v. Lawson, 8 Leigh 458, and Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110, are cited in Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Gratt. 578, for the proposition that there can be no adversary possession of lands against the commonwealth, and that no time

Same—Case at Bar.—In 1796, a person settled upon, cleared and improved a tract of land. In 1806, he conveyed a part of it by metes and bounds. And in 1834, the land embraced in this conveyance was granted by the commonwealth in conformity with a survey made in 1833. It appearing that the tenant claiming under the deed of 1806 had entered upon, settled and improved the land conveyed by this deed, and had, during the period he held it, paid the taxes thereon, and that a portion of this land was actually enclosed in 1796, when the tract of which it then formed a part was settled, HELD, it is competent for the tenant to connect his possession with the possession of those under whom he claims (the same never having been interrupted); and it thus appearing that the location on which the commonwealth's grant was founded was on lands which had been settled thirty years prior to the date of the location, and upon which taxes had been paid within that time, HELD farther, that the location was invalid, and that no title passed by the commonwealth's grant.

This was a writ of right brought in the circuit court of Harrison on the 10th of April 1835, by David Tichanal against John Roe. The mise was tried the 17th of October 1838.

At the trial, the tenant gave in evidence to the jury a deed bearing date the 4th of January 1806, from Thomas Bartlett to Jesse Bartlett, conveying by metes and bounds a tract of land in Harrison county, which was admitted to record in the court of the said county at June term 1806; and 289 also a deed bearing date the *7th of June 1806, from Jesse Bartlett and wife to John Roe for the same land, which was admitted to record in the same court at the same term. The said tenant proved by witnesses, that in the summer of 1806 he went upon said land, claiming it under his deed according to certain lines marked 1, 2, 3, 4, on the plat of the survey made under the order of court in the cause, and cleared a turnip patch within the said lines: that in the spring of 1807 he built a house about the middle of the area within these lines, and improved about 20 acres of the land: and that he has resided upon the land ever since, and claimed the whole of the area within the said lines, and paid the taxes thereof. In 1811, one Sanford Bartlett, now dead, shewed to Starling Bartlett, one of the witnesses, two white oak trees standing at figure 1, on the plat, and told the witness those two trees were a corner to his Sanford's land referred to in the tenant's deed; which trees were then marked. They are not now there, but there is a white oak stump standing where said trees stood in 1811. The surveyor who made out the plat of the survey in this case, proved that when he made the said survey, he began at figure 1, shewn to him by the witness Starling Bartlett as the place where said Sanford Bartlett had shewn him the two white oak trees as aforesaid, and he (the surveyor) ran out the courses and distances of the deed from Jesse Bartlett aforesaid, and did not find any corner or line trees marked on the lines from figure 1, to figure 4, on the plat. The tenant also proved, that the demandant had resided a near neighbour to the tenant ever since he the tenant first settled upon said land: that Thomas Bartlett before named lived upon a larger tract of land (which he got of Simpson) which included the tract of land in dispute, and had cleared, improved and cultivated a part of the land he lived on as early as the year 1796, and continued to live on the same until some time after 290 he made *his deed to Jesse Bartlett: that the said Thomas Bartlett claimed the land in controversy as part of the tract on which he lived, but that the improvement made by the said Thomas Bartlett was not within the bounds of the land in controversy; and that in the year 1796 the said Thomas Bartlett fenced about one half acre of the land in controversy, including a lick called the Stone coal lick (claiming it as being part of his land), for the purpose of taking wild deer, and not for the purpose of cultivation. A witness for the tenant also deposed, that he thinks the tenant settled upon the land in controversy about 32 or 33 years ago (the witness was certain it was at least 31 years), and has continued in the actual possession thereof, claiming it as his own under the said deed. The demandant then gave in evidence a grant from the commonwealth of Virginia, bearing date the first of May 1834, whereby it appeared, that in conformity with a survey made on the 18th of March 1833, there was granted by the commonwealth unto David Tichanal a tract of land in Harrison county; and the demandant proved that the boundaries of the land so granted to him include the land in controversy, and also proved that in 1834 he entered the land so granted with the commissioner of the revenue for Harrison county for taxation, and has paid the taxes thereon ever since.

This being all the evidence in the cause, the demandant demurred to the same, the tenant joined in the demurrer, and the jury found a verdict subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer.

The question on the demurrer turned upon the act passed the 24th day of January 1798, declaring that "no entry or location on any lands within this commonwealth, which have been settled thirty years prior to the date of such entry or location, and upon which quitrents or taxes can be proved to have been paid at any time within the said thirty years, 291 shall be deemed valid; *and any title which the commonwealth may be supposed to have thereto is hereby relinquished." Sess. Acts of 1797-8, ch. 10, § 1; 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 86, § 40, p. 330.

The circuit court, under this act, held the evidence sufficient to maintain the mise joined on the part of the tenant, and entered judgment that he hold the tenement demanded against him to him and his heirs, acquit of the demandant and his heirs forever, and that he recover against the demandant his costs.

To this judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

The cause was submitted without argument, by William A. Harrison for the plaintiff in error, and George H. Lee for the defendant in error.

ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the resolution of the court:

The court is of opinion that on the demurrer to evidence, and as against the party demurring, the jury would have been justified in inferring, under the circumstances of this case, an actual settlement on and occupation of the land in controversy by Thomas Bartlett, as early as the year 1796; it appearing that as early as the year 1796 the said Thomas had settled upon, cleared and improved a tract of land, of which the land in controversy formed a part, and that he actually enclosed a portion of the land in controversy in that year. The court is further of opinion that as the tenant claims under a deed from said Thomas to his son Jesse, conveying to him the land in controversy by metes and bounds, and as the tenant has entered upon, settled and improved the land comprised within the boundaries described in the deed, and during the period he has so held the land has paid the taxes thereon, it is competent for the tenant to connect his possession with the possession of those under 292 whom he claims (the same *never having been interrupted), and to refer to the period at which the first settlement was made by Thomas Bartlett, to ascertain the date from which the time of the settlement should be computed. And it thus appearing that the said land in controversy was settled more than thirty years prior to the location which was the foundation of the demandant's patent, the land so settled by the tenant and those under whom he claimed was not liable to entry or location when the entry of the demandant was made; the title of the commonwealth having, by operation of law, been relinquished to and vested in the tenant prior to such entry. The court is therefore of opinion, for the reasons aforesaid, that the law upon the demurrer to evidence was for the tenant, and that there is no error in the judgment of the said circuit superior court. Therefore it is considered that the same be affirmed.

The other judges concurring, judgment affirmed.

Buckles v. Lafferty's Legatees.

August, 1843, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

[40 Am. Dec. 762.]

Principal and Agent—Purchase by Agent from Principal.*—The doctrine of the English chancery, that a person standing in the confidential relation of agent cannot, while that relation continues and before that confidence is withdrawn, make a purchase from the principal (that will bind the latter) of a subject within the scope of the agency, recognized and acted upon.

Same—Same—Legatees—Impeaching Purchase—Delay—Interest of Legatees—Ascertainment of—Resale—Upset Price†—Proceeds of Resale—How Applied.—A testator (amongst other things) directed lands to be sold, and legacies to be paid out of the proceeds. The administratrix with the will annexed, on whom the power of making the sale was conferred,

293 appointed an agent, who did the business of the *administration, and received the commissions allowed the administratrix. She was old, and had great confidence in him, and he acted in a great degree without her supervision, and practically conducted the administration without control. After several previous attempts by the agent to sell one of the parcels of land, it was put up at auction (as the sale bill announced) for the last time, and knocked down to a person requested by the agent to bid (for the purpose of promoting the sale) at 21 dollars 52 cents per acre, a higher bid than had been made on any previous occasion. Some persons present were willing to have given as much as 25 dollars per acre; and one of them, who was surprised when the land was knocked off and not to his bid, on the same day (immediately after sale) stated to the agent his willingness to have gone higher if necessary. A few weeks afterwards, the agent purchased the land from the administratrix by private contract

*Fiduciaries—Purchase of Trust Subject.—See footnotes to Bailey v. Robinsons, 1 Gratt. 4; Wellford v. Chancellor, 5 Gratt. 39.

Same—Same.—A purchase of trust property, made by one while holding the fiduciary or confidential relation, is voidable at the option of the cestui que trust, although the fiduciary may have given an adequate price, and gained no advantage whatever. For this proposition, the principal case is cited in Newcomb v. Brooks, 16 W. Va. 59, 63; Feamster v. Feamster, 35 W. Va. 13, 13 S. E. Rep. 57; Lewis v. Brown, 36 W. Va. 7, 14 S. E. Rep. 446; Tennant v. Dunlop, 97 Va. 241, 33 S. E. Rep. 620; Harrison v. Manson, 95 Va. 598, 29 S. E. Rep. 420; Ferguson v. Gooch, 94 Va. 9, 38 S. E. Rep. 397; Christian v. Fox, 2 H. & M. 245; McKey v. Young, 4 H. & M. 430.

†Same—Same—Resale—Upset Price.—In syllabus 5 of Howerly v. Helms, 20 Gratt. 1. It is said, that where land is resold, because the commissioner appointed by a decree in a partition suit to sell the land, became himself the purchaser, the usual and proper course is to offer the property at an upset price, to be fixed by the decree, according to the cases of Buckles v. Lafferty, 2 Rob. Rep. 292, and Bailey v. Robinsons, 1 Gratt. 4.

at 22 dollars per acre, and took a conveyance of it from her. This was in 1829. In 1835, a bill was filed by the legatees to rescind the sale and conveyance. The bill alleged that the proceeds of the sale were insufficient to pay the legacies, and it further alleged that most of the plaintiffs were nonresidents who had not been in Virginia since the sale, and that some were infants and femmes covert. HELD, 1. A purchase by such an agent is in substance no better than a purchase from himself, and though it might bind him, is not binding on the legatees, unless ratified by them deliberately and on full information. 2. No such ratification appearing, the delay in this case to impeach the purchase (due allowance being made for the infancy of some and the nonresidence of others) does not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to the aid of equity. 3. The extent of the interest of the plaintiffs ought by a proper account to be ascertained, to the end that the purchaser may, if he thinks proper so to do, remove that interest by paying to the plaintiffs the parts unsatisfied of their legacies. 4. If the purchaser should not do this, the plaintiffs will be entitled to have the land reexposed to sale at a proper upset price, to be ascertained by debiting the purchaser with the profits of the land or with a fair annual rent therefor since his purchase, and crediting him first with his payments and interest on the same, and secondly with all his substantial and permanent improvements. The balance, with the addition thereto of a reasonable amount for the commission and charges of resale, is the sum at which the land should be set up, on a credit of 6, 12 and 18 months, bearing interest. 5. If the land and improvements should not sell for more than the upset price, the purchase should stand confirmed: if it should sell for more, then the 294 former sale should be vacated, *the purchase money on the resale duly collected from the purchaser at the same, and a conveyance made to him, and the proceeds of the resale applied, 1st. to pay the charges of sale; 2dly, to pay the first purchaser the balance due him upon an account stated as before mentioned; and the surplus to the legatees, according to their respective rights.

Thomas Lafferty by his will bearing date the 20th of September 1824, after certain specific devises and bequests of lands and chattels, and a bequest to his wife Catharine Lafferty of one third part of the remainder of his personal property, devised as follows:

"Item 6th. It is my will that the balance of my property both real and personal, namely, the land joining line with the heirs of Coontz, Lucas, Selby and Remsburg, and the land joining line with Butler, Vendier and Ozburn, shall be sold by my executors, and after paying all my just debts, funeral expenses, &c. shall be disposed of as I shall now direct."

And then the testator directs that there shall be paid by his executors, out of the money arising from the sales of said lands and personal property, to his son George Lafferty 600 dollars, to his son Thomas Lafferty 500 dollars, to his son Samuel Lafferty 600 dollars, to his daughter Rebecca Harris 600 dollars, to his son David Lafferty

800 dollars, to his grandchildren the heirs of his son John Lafferty 400 dollars, and to his son William Lafferty 800 dollars. The 400 dollars bequeathed to the grandchildren he directed to be paid to them or their guardians, and appropriated to their education. And the 800 dollars bequeathed to his son William he desired should be put on interest by his executors, and the interest paid yearly to testator's wife Catharine Lafferty for the support of his son William. If William should live longer than his mother, he desired that Thomas Lafferty should take him, and directed his executors to pay Thomas the 800 dollars, which 295 Thomas was to put on interest, and apply the interest or so much of *the principal as the necessities of William might require. Should William die before his mother, the will directed the executors to pay the 800 dollars to her for her own use, to dispose of as she might think best. If the two pieces of land directed to be sold, with the two thirds of the personal property, should not amount, after paying just debts and funeral expenses, to 4300 dollars, the aggregate of the sums given the legatees, the testator directed that they should lose in proportion to the sums given them; if there should be a surplus, he directed that surplus to be paid by his executors to his wife Catharine Lafferty, to will, use or dispose of as she might think best.

The county court of Jefferson refused to admit the will to record; but on an appeal from its judgment, the same was reversed by the circuit court on the 30th of August 1827, and the will recorded. Daniel Buckles, who alone was appointed executor, renounced the executorship. And thereupon Catharine Lafferty the widow qualified as administratrix with the will annexed, giving bond as such, with Daniel Buckles and others as her sureties, in the penalty of 1500 dollars.

On the first of April 1829, a deed was made between Catharine Lafferty as administratrix with the will annexed of Thomas Lafferty, of the one part, and Daniel Buckles of the other part, conveying to him, for the consideration of 2126 dollars 37½ cents, a tract of land containing 96 acres 2 roods and 26 poles, being the land described in the will as "joining line with the heirs of Coontz, Lucas, Selby and Remsburg." This deed was acknowledged before two justices of the peace the 15th of September 1829, and admitted to record in the court of Jefferson county on the 16th of September 1833.

At December rules 1835 a bill was filed in the circuit court of Jefferson, by the parties, or the representatives of the parties, to whom legacies were bequeathed out of the proceeds of the land, against the 296 widow in *her own right and as administratrix, and against Buckles, praying that the sale and conveyance to Buckles might be rescinded; that he might be compelled to account for the rents and profits of the land since it had been in his possession, and for all wood &c, sold and taken therefrom; that the same might be offsetted against his advances; and that there might be a resale of the land, and other relief.

It was alleged in the bill, and admitted in the answer of Buckles, that the administratrix, upon her qualification, constituted him her agent, that he acted as such, and that he received the commissions allowed to the administratrix. As the respondent "did the business and bore the responsibility, he considered" (he said) "there was no sort of impropriety in the stipulation that he should be entitled to the commissions." But he positively denied that there was any thing fraudulent or improper in the sale, or that the price was inadequate. The transaction was stated by him to have been as follows. At a public sale by him as agent, on the 10th of March 1829, he had requested Mr. John T. Cookus to bid, for the purpose of preventing the land from going below its value; telling Cookus that if the land should be knocked off to him, he (the respondent) would take it off his hands. Cookus's bid of 21 dollars 52 cents per acre was the last and highest. He told Cookus, that if he was inclined, he might keep the land; but Cookus would not keep it, and the respondent felt bound to take it off his hands. Hearing afterwards that one of the Lucases had said he would have gone higher, the respondent, instead of claiming as the substitute of Cookus a right to the land at the price it was knocked off, purchased it by private contract from the administratrix on the 4th of April 1829, at 22 dollars per acre, which was not only more than the price at which it was knocked off, but more than had been offered for it on any previous occasion

297 when the attempt *had been made to sell it. And the respondent said he did not claim as purchaser from himself as agent, but as purchaser from Mrs. Lafferty, by private contract fairly made and for a full consideration. He exhibited with his answer the contract of the 4th of April 1829.

As to Mrs. Lafferty, the bill was taken for confessed.

Many depositions were taken by the plaintiffs to prove, and by the defendant to disprove, the charge made against him of actual fraud or covin. But the opinion of this court resting upon the relation of the parties, and upon the principle of law applicable to that relation, it is unnecessary to state more of the evidence than what follows.—It appeared that there had been an attempt to sell the land in the fall of 1827, when the highest bid was 19 dollars, and two other attempts in 1828, when the highest bid was about 17 dollars per acre: that Buckles declined letting the land go at either of those bids: that in March 1829 the sale bill announced that it would positively be the last sale; and that it was knocked down to Cookus (bidding for Buckles as stated in the answer) at 21 dollars 52 cents per acre. Some persons however, who were present, deposed that they were willing at the time of the sale, if the land could not be got for less, to have given as much as 25 dollars per acre for it, and one of those persons seemed to have been surprised when he found that the land was knocked off and that it was not his bid. On the same day, immediately after the sale, he stated to Buckles his willingness to have gone higher if necessary. The evidence further shewed that Mrs. Lafferty was an old woman, who went from home very little; that she was not present at the attempt to sell in 1827 or 1828, or at the public sale in 1829; and that she had great confidence in Buckles, and entrusted the sales to him. It was alleged in the bill and not controverted by the answer, that the proceeds of the real and personal estate

298 set apart by the testator for the *payment of debts, funeral expenses and legacies, had fallen greatly short.

And the bill further alleged that most of the plaintiffs are "residents of the western country, and were so previous to said sale, and have not since been in Virginia, and had not, until very recently, known the facts, some of them being infants and femes covert." The parties plaintiffs were the administrator, widow and heirs of George Lafferty, one of whom was an infant suing by her next friend; the administrator, widow and heirs of Thomas Lafferty; the children and heirs of John Lafferty, some of whom were infants suing by next friend; Rebecca Harris, whose husband was joined as plaintiff pending the suit, and Samuel, David and William Lafferty; as to which last, upon a suggestion that he was a person of unsound mind, the bill was by consent amended so as to make him a plaintiff by his next friend.

The cause coming on to be heard the 16th of June 1838, the circuit court decreed that Buckles, on receiving back his purchase money with interest, should convey the land to Mrs. Lafferty to and for the uses in the will, and that he should account for the rents and profits of the same during his possession thereof.

On the petition of Buckles an appeal was allowed.

Arguments were submitted in writing (or printed) by Edmund J. Lee jr., Richard Parker, J. T. Dougherty and A. H. H. Stuart for the appellant, and by Green B. Samuels for the appellees. They were chiefly upon the question of fraud in fact.

The general principle that trustees, agents, and other persons acting in a confidential character are disqualified from purchasing, was not denied by the appellant's counsel. But they said this principle had not hitherto been acted on, in Virginia, with much strictness against executors. Anderson &c. v. Fox &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 245; M'Key ex'or of Fuqua v. Young, 4 Hen. & Munf. 430; 2 Rob. Pract. 65, 6. What chancellor Taylor spoke of in 4 Hen. & Munf. 430, as being common in his day, they said, continued to be the practice, and was so generally understood to be admissible, that the maxim communis error facit jus ought to be applied. And they argued that even if the general principle before adverted to were to prevail in Virginia, it could not affect this case, because here Buckles purchased at a private sale from the administratrix, and not at a public sale made by himself. They further insisted that the legatees must have had the benefit of the purchase money which had been paid, and that their receiving the same and acquiescing in the sale for more than six years was sufficient to prevent the court from disturbing the transaction. Nor (they urged) could the circumstance of some of the plaintiffs being infants and others nonresidents help the case. For others of the plaintiffs were adults living here, prominent in the case in their own right and as the next friends of the infants, and the suit might have been brought in the same way as well six years ago as now. They were as well acquainted then with the grounds on which the bill rests as now. And the explanation of their delay was only to be found in the fact that land generally in the neighbourhood has since risen in value, and this particular tract is especially improved by judicious cultivation and by the industry of its present possessor.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the evidence in this case is insufficient to fasten on the appellant the charge of actual fraud or covin in the purchase of the land that belonged to the estate of Thomas Lafferty. The appellant, however, was confessedly the agent of the administratrix with the will annexed of Lafferty, on whom the power of making the sale was conferred by the will; and, as the evidence shews, an agent acting in a great degree without the supervision of his principal, and practically conducting the administration without control. A purchase by such an agent is in substance not better than a purchase from himself, and though it might bind him, is not binding on the beneficiaries interested in the execution of the trust, unless ratified by them deliberately and on full information; and they, to the extent of their interest, are entitled to the benefit of any advance that may be realized on a resale. The court is further of opinion that no such ratification of the appellant's purchase appears in this case, nor does the delay on the part of the plaintiffs in the court below to impeach the purchase (due allowance being made for the infancy of some and the nonresidence of others) deprive them of their right to the aid of a court of equity.

The court is further of opinion that the plaintiffs, the legatees of Lafferty, were interested in the sale of the land and the proceeds thereof, to the extent only that those proceeds were necessary to pay their legacies; and if those proceeds, blended with the other funds dedicated by the will to the payment of those legacies, were adequate to discharge them, the plaintiffs, having under the will no interest in the surplus, would have no interest, and consequently no title, to question the sale. The allegation of the bill that part only of those legacies had been paid not being controverted by the answer, the court was justified in proceeding on the assumption that part of the legacies remained unpaid; but as that gave to the legatees but a limited interest in cancelling the purchase of the appellant or having a resale, the extent of that interest ought by a proper account to have been ascertained, to the end that the purchaser, if his purchase was not effectually questioned by any other than the plaintiff legatees, might have the opportunity, if he thought proper to use it,

301 of removing the interest of those plaintiffs in, and consequently their right to, the experiment of a resale, by paying to them the parts unsatisfied of their legacies. If, on such an account, the purchaser should not avail himself of the opportunity to prevent the experiment of a resale, the plaintiffs would be entitled to have the land reexposed to sale at a proper upset price, to be ascertained in the manner following. An account should be taken, in which the appellant should be debited with the full amount of the profits of the land, or with a fair annual rent therefor, since his purchase, and credited, 1st. with the payments made by him for the purchase, with interest on those payments from the dates respectively at which they have been made available to the legatees, and 2dly, with all the substantial and permanent improvements made on the land since the purchase. The balance of such account, with the addition thereto of a reasonable amount for the commission and charges of resale, is the sum at which the land on a resale should be set up, on a credit of 6, 12 and 18 months for equal instalments of the purchase money, with interest on those instalments from the day of sale. If the land and improvements should not sell for more than the upset price, the purchase heretofore made by the appellant should in all respects stand confirmed. If it should sell beyond that sum, then the former sale should be vacated, and the case further proceeded in by causing the purchase money on such sale to be paid, and a proper conveyance to be made to the purchaser, and the proceeds of sale applied, 1st. to pay the charges of sale; 2ndly, to pay to the appellant the balance shewn by the said account to be due for purchase money and improvements; and the surplus to the legatees of Lafferty, according to their respective rights. The court is consequently of opinion that the decree of the circuit superior court is erroneous. It is therefore

302 adjudged, ordered and decreed that the said decree be reversed, and that the appellees pay to the appellant the costs expended in prosecuting his appeal in this court. And the cause is remanded to the circuit superior court, for further proceedings according to the principles above declared.

Note by the reporter.—The leading cases upon the principal question in this are Whelpdale v. Cookson, 1 Ves. sen. 9; 5 Ves. jun. 688; Fox v. Meckreth and others, 2 Brown's C. C. 400; 2 Cox 320; 4 Brown's Par. Cas. 258, (Tomlin's ed.) and The York Buildings Company v. Mackenzie, 8 Brown's Par. Cas. 42, (same ed.). The last two decisions were in the house of lords, where the subject underwent the ablest discussion; a discussion in which light was obtained from the writers upon the civil as well as from the judges of the common law, and the doctrine traced back to its original source. "It is," said the counsel for the York buildings company, (p. 68, 4.) "the constitution of nature itself, and is as old as the formation of society, and of course it must be universal. It proceeds from nature, and is silently received, recognized and made effectual wherever any well regulated system of civil jurisprudence is known. The ground on which the disability or disqualification rests is no other than that principle which dictates that a person cannot be both judge and party. No man can serve two masters. He that is entrusted with the interest of others cannot be allowed to make the business an object of interest to himself, because, from the frailty of nature, one who has the power will be too readily seized with the inclination to use the opportunity for serving his own interest at the expense of those for whom he is entrusted. The danger of temptation, from the facility and advantages for doing wrong which a particular situation affords, does, out of the mere necessity of the case, work a disqualification; nothing less than incapacity being able to shut the door against temptation where the danger is imminent and the security against discovery great, as it must be where the difficulty of prevention or remedy is inherent to the very situation which creates the danger. The wise policy of the law has therefore put the sting of a disability into the temptation, as a defensive weapon against the strength of the danger which lies in the situation." The doctrine is laid down in like general terms by the chancellor of New York in two recent cases, Van Epps v. Van Epps, 9 Paige 241, and Torrey v. The Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige 663. He says in the last, "It is a settled principle of equity that no person who is placed in a situation of trust or confidence in reference to the subject of the 303 sale, can *be a purchaser of the property on his own account." He adds, "In the recent case of Greenlaw v. King, decided in the court of chancery in England in January 1841, (5 Lond. Jur. 18,) lord Cottenham held that the principle was not confined to a particular class of persons, such as guardians, trustees, or solicitors, but was a rule of universal application to all persons coming within its principle; which is, that no party can be permitted to purchase an interest, where he has a duty to perform that is inconsistent with the character of purchaser."

The decisions of lord Eldon strongly support the rule. In Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 345, he said, "This doctrine as to purchases by trustees, assignees, and persons having a confidential character, rests much more upon general principle than upon the circumstances of any individual case. It rests upon this, that the purchase is not permitted in any case, however honest the circumstances; the general interests of justice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance, as no court is equal to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases." On a subsequent day he said, (p. 348) "My opinion in this case is purely upon the principle."—"The principle is, that as the trustee is bound by his duty to acquire all the knowledge possible, to enable him to sell to the utmost advantage for the cestui que trust, the question what knowledge he has obtained, and whether he has given the benefit of that knowledge to the cestui que trust which he always acquires at the expense of the cestui que trust, no court can discuss with competent sufficiency or safety to the parties." "The courts have said, it is better for the general interests of justice that in some cases a loss should be sustained by a cestui que trust, than a rule should be established which would occasion loss in much more numerous cases."

Lord Eldon must be understood here as alluding to a case in which the confidential relation still continues. For in Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 636, he had said, the rule does not preclude the trustee from bargaining that he is no longer to act as such. "The cestui que trusts may," (he observed) "by a new contract, dismiss him from that character: but even then, that transaction by which they dismiss him must, according to the rules of this court, be watched with infinite and most guarded jealousy; and for this reason, that the law supposes him to have acquired all the knowledge a trustee may acquire; which may be very useful to him, but the communication of which to the cestui que trusts the court can never be sure he has made, when entering into the new contract by which he is discharged." Again, in Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 351, adverting to Fox v. Mackreth, he states the question properly to have been, "whether a person who had a confidential situation previously to the purchase, had at the time of the purchase 304 *shaken off that character, by the consent of the cestui que trust freely given after full information, and bargained for the right to purchase." And in Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 344, he says, "A trustee may buy from the cestui que trust, provided there is a distinct and clear contract, ascertained to be such after a jealous and scrupulous examination of all the circumstances, that the cestui que trust intended the trustee should buy; and there is no fraud, no concealment, no advantage taken by the trustee of information acquired by him in the character of trustee. I admit it is a difficult case to make out, wherever it is contended that the exception prevails."

These doctrines have been recognized in many other cases in England: Ex parte Bennett, 10 Ves. 398; Randall v. Errington, 10 Ves. 427; Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 373; Sanderson v. Walker, 13 Ves. 601; Downes v. Glazebrook, 3 Meriv. 207; Woodhouse v. Meredith, 1 Jac. & Walk. 223, and Rothschild v. Brookman, 5 Bligh N. S. 190. And they have also been approved and sanctioned by many of the courts in this country: in New York by chancellor Kent, as well as by the present chancellor, Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 52; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cowen 734; by chancellor Desaussure of South Carolina in Butler &c. v. Haskell, 4 Desauss. 705; by chief justice Marshall in Teakle v. Bailey, 2 Brock. 52; by the supreme court of the United States in Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. 421; and by this court in Carter &c. v. Harris, 4 Rand. 204, and Segar v. Edwards and wife, 11 Leigh 213, as well as in the present case.

In the present case, it could not be said that the relation of the principal and agent had been changed; that the confidence in the agent had been withdrawn. And as strict a rule was applicable as that laid down by lord Eldon in Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 271. He there said, "An attorney buying from his client can never support it, unless he can prove that his diligence to do the best for the vendor has been as great as if he was only an attorney dealing for that vendor with a stranger. That must be the rule. If it appears that in that bargain he has got an advantage by his diligence being surprised, (putting fraud and incapacity out of the question) which advantage, with due diligence, he would have prevented another person from getting, a contract under such circumstances shall not stand."—"From the general danger, the court must hold that if the attorney does mix himself with the character of vendor, he must shew to demonstration (for that must not be left in doubt) that no industry he was bound to exert would have got a better bargain." And the court in the present case might properly conclude, as lord Eldon did in that, "Therefore, without imputing fraud, a general principle of public policy makes it impossible that this bargain can stand."

Judgments—What Constitutes—Record of Judgment Confessed—How Far Evidence Aliunde is Admissible to Show the Action and Power of Attorney to Confess*—Case at Bar.—On a motion for award of execution against three obligors in a forthcoming bond, one of whom is principal and the other two are sureties, the entry upon the record states that as well the plaintiffs came by their attorney, "as the defendant M." (the principal) "in his proper person, and the other defendants by their attorney, and the said defendants acknowledge judgment." In the same entry (after the judgment) is the following: "And the plaintiffs by their attorney here in court release to the defendants 183 dollars 60 cents, and agree to stay execution of this judgment until the first day of the next term." On a bill in equity by the sureties, claiming a discharge on the ground that the agreement to stay was without their consent or knowledge, it is alleged that the sureties did not appear by an attorney at law, but by an attorney in fact; that the power under which the attorney acted did not authorize him to confess judgment

On the 28th of September 1839, Fleming B. Miller and William B. Calwell executed an obligation to Sheilds & Somerville for 3000 dollars, payable nine months after date.

On the 9th of the same month, a deed of trust was made between Miller of the first part, James Calwell jr. of the second, and William B. Calwell of the third part, whereby, after reciting that William B. Calwell was surety in the bond executed by Miller to Sheilds & Somerville, that Miller was indebted to William B. Calwell 1000 dollars by bond, and that William B. Calwell was the endorser with Miller on a note of William Ross for 3000 dollars, due the Farmers bank of Virginia at Lynchburg, Miller conveyed to James Calwell jr. sundry slaves and horses, and his furniture and farming utensils, in trust that if Miller should pay the said bonds, and indemnify and save harmless William B. Calwell from liability on his said endorsement, then all right and title in and to the property should cease and determine in James Calwell jr.; but if Miller should fail in any of these engagements, and William B. Calwell should be compelled to pay the bond to Sheilds & Somerville, or the debt to the Farmers bank, or the debt of 1000 dollars should be unpaid at its maturity, then it should be lawful for James Calwell jr. to sell by public auction, after three months notice, all or any part of said property, for the full and adequate indemnity of William B. Calwell for the money he might have paid upon the debts aforesaid, and the payment of the bond to William B. Calwell.

On the first of May 1840 another deed of trust was made, between Miller of the first part, James Calwell jr. of the second, and William B. Calwell and Henry B. Calwell of the third part, whereby, after mentioning the same endorsement and bonds, and another bond of 750 dollars to William B. Calwell, and after mentioning that Henry

B. Calwell is the security of Miller in a note to John Callaghan, one to Matthew W. Pettigrew, and one to Joel W. Flood, the same property and ten head of 307 *cattle were conveyed to James Calwell jr., upon trust that if Miller should pay off the debts due to William B. Calwell when they should become due, and should pay off the debts due to Sheilds & Somerville and to the Farmers bank, so that William B. Calwell should be entirely absolved from all liabilities for the same, and should also pay off the said debts for which Henry B. Calwell was surety, so as to absolve him from all liability for the same, then all the right and interest conveyed to James Calwell jr. should cease and determine. But if Miller should fail in any or all of these engagements and obligations, then it should be lawful for James Calwell jr. to sell at public auction, (the day and place of sale being advertised publicly for 3 months) at the request of either the said William or Henry, so much of the said property as would pay the said bonds due to William B. Calwell, and also all the money which he might have been required to pay either to Sheilds & Somerville or the Farmers bank, and also pay to Henry B. Calwell all money which he might be required to pay to Callaghan, Pettigrew or Flood.

Default being made in the payment of the bond to Sheilds & Somerville, they instituted an action thereupon in the circuit court of Greenbrier, and on the 21st of October 1840 obtained judgment against the obligors. A writ of fieri facias on the said judgment went into the hands of Joel M'Pherson deputy for John Mays sheriff of the county of Greenbrier, and on the 18th of November 1840 he took from Miller and William B. Calwell a forthcoming bond with James Calwell as surety, which recited the execution as amounting to 3344 dollars 77 cents. This bond being forfeited, M'Pherson took from the obligors the following writing:

"We authorize Joel M'Pherson to confess judgment for us and in our name, on a delivery bond in favour of Sheilds & Somerville, executed by us on the 18th 308 November *1840. Witness our hands and seals this 10th day May 1841.

F. B. Miller, [L. S.]
 W. B. Calwell, [L. S.]
 Jas. Calwell. [L. S.]"

After this it was discovered that by mistake of the clerk the fi. fa. issued for interest from the 2d of June 1839, instead of from the 2d of June 1840, and therefore there was an excess included in the forthcoming bond of 180 dollars (the interest for one year) and the sheriff's commission of 2 per cent. thereon, being 3 dollars 60 cents, amounting together to 183 dollars 60 cents.

On the 15th of May 1841, the following judgment was entered:

"John N. Sheilds and Robert B. Somerville, merchants and partners trading under the firm and style of Sheilds & Somerville, plaintiffs,

against Fleming B. Miller, Wm. B. Calwell and James Calwell, defendants.

"On motion for award of execution on a forfeited forthcoming bond, taken by virtue of an execution sued out of this court on the 27th of October 1840, in the name of the plaintiffs against the defendants Fleming B. Miller and William B. Calwell.

"This day came as well the plaintiffs by their attorney, as the defendant Miller in his proper person, and the other defendants by their attorney, and the said defendant acknowledge judgment for the sum of 6689 dollars 54 cents the penalty of the said bond, besides the costs by the plaintiffs about their motion in this behalf expended. But this judgment is to be discharged by the payment of 3344 dollars 77 cents with 309 legal interest thereon from the 18th of November 1840 until *paid, and the costs. And the plaintiffs, by their attorney, here in court release to the defendants 183 dollars 60 cents with interest thereon from the 18th day of November 1840 till paid, and agree to stay execution of this judgment until the first day of the next term of this court."

On the 18th of August 1841, William B. Calwell, by a writing under his hand and seal endorsed on the deed of the 9th of September 1839, assigned and transferred to the president and directors of the bank of Virginia at Buchanan, for value received, his right and interest in and to the property conveyed in the said deed, and all benefit thereof. And on the same day he united with Henry B. Calwell in making a similar assignment on the deed of the first of May 1840 for their benefit. Afterwards, to wit, on the 21st of August 1841, a formal deed was executed between Miller of the first part, John S. Wilson of the second part, and the president and directors of the bank of Virginia at Buchanan of the third part, whereby Miller conveyed the same property, to secure the payment of two bonds to the said bank, in which William B. Calwell and Henry B. Calwell were joined with him. And at the foot of this deed two other writings were executed, one by William B. Calwell and Henry B. Calwell, bearing date on the same day with the deed, whereby they declared that the deed was executed with their privity and consent, and they released and transferred all their right and title to the property thereby conveyed; and the other by James H. Calwell, bearing date the 23d of August 1841, stating, that by direction of the parties, he transferred and assigned to the president, directors and company of the bank of Virginia such legal title as was vested in him by virtue of the deed of trust for the benefit of William B. Calwell and Henry B. Calwell.

In January 1842, William B. Calwell and James Calwell filed a bill to restrain 310 proceedings against them on *the judgment of Sheilds & Somerville, setting forth that William B. Calwell was surety of Miller in the original judgment, and James Calwell was surety of Miller and William B. Calwell on the forthcoming bond, and alleging, that to the agreement for the stay of execution on said judgment they were neither parties nor privies; that it was entered into without their knowledge or consent; that they have been informed and believe it was entered into by the plaintiffs with Miller in consideration of a waiver by Miller of an error in the execution on which the forthcoming bond had been taken, which probably rendered the bond invalid; that Miller had no authority of any kind to make any such agreement for them; that the power of attorney given to M'Pherson only authorized him to confess judgment for them, and in point of fact M'Pherson did not in any manner assent to said agreement for them or in their behalf. They charged expressly, that the agreement was completed between Miller and the plaintiffs without the assent of them or either of them, directly or indirectly given, either by themselves, or any one in any manner authorized or empowered to give such assent for them, and they insisted that by the agreement they, as the sureties of Miller, were released from all liability to pay the debt.

Sheilds & Somerville, in their answer, set forth the tenor of the judgment, as it appeared by a transcript thereof exhibited with the answer. And they stated they were informed by Alexander P. Eskridge esquire, their attorney at law, that the arrangement made was in fact with the knowledge of all the parties interested, or of those authorized to act for them; that Miller acted in the matter not only for himself, but as the known and authorized agent and attorney both of William B. Calwell and James Calwell; that Miller, for himself and as such attorney, objected in the first instance to the rendition of any judgment on the forthcoming bond, 311 because *of the mistake of the clerk in issuing the execution, (taking the ground that in consequence of that mistake the execution and bond were liable to be quashed); that, to obtain a judgment at that time against any of the obligors, he was compelled to agree to stay the execution of the judgment until the ensuing term of the court; and that after this agreement, and in consequence of it, judgment was confessed by Miller for himself and as attorney for the other obligors, and the agreement was entered of record. The answer then proceeded as follows:

"That Miller has been in the habit of acting as attorney for the Calwells since the commencement of his practice in the county of Greenbrier, is, these defendants are informed, a well known fact. He has so acted in their cases generally, and with their knowledge and approbation; and having so acted in other cases, the attorney aforesaid of these defendants regarded him as their attorney and treated with him as such in this case. It is well known, that according to the practise in the courts of this commonwealth, no warrant of an attorney is produced to sustain the action of an attorney in any particular case, but when a gentleman has obtained a license to practise in the courts of this commonwealth, and has been admitted to practise in any particular court, it is enough for him to appear as the attorney for any party to a case in that court. In this case the defendants are informed by mr. Eskridge, not only that mr. Miller appeared as the attorney of the Calwells to manage this case for them, but that he has frequently appeared as their attorney in other cases, as before mentioned; and his authority to appear in cases as their attorney, and manage the same for them, has not been denied. It is wholly unnecessary to enquire whether an attorney at law is authorized to make an agreement on behalf of his clients for a stay of execution. For even if it be conceded that

312 Miller had no greater authority *from the Calwells than that of their attorney, (which would be conceding a great deal more than ought to be conceded) and even if it be also conceded that the authority of an attorney at law does not enable him to make an agreement for a stay of execution, these concessions would avail the complainants nothing, for the plain reason that Eskridge had no other authority than that of an attorney at law, and the rule must work both ways. If Miller, as the attorney at law for the Calwells, was unauthorized to make an agreement for a stay of execution which would bind them, Eskridge, as attorney at law for these defendants, was equally unauthorized to make an agreement for a stay of execution which would bind these defendants; and if the agreement was not binding on these defendants, no argument is necessary to shew it can avail the complainants nothing."

The defendants farther stated "that M'Pherson was present in court, knew of the agreement between Miller and Eskridge at the time it was made, and not only did not object to it, but approved it;" and the answer continued as follows: "So far from an unqualified and unconditional judgment being confessed by M'Pherson as attorney in fact, the fact is (as these defendants are informed) that neither M'Pherson nor Miller would confess the judgment, or agree to confess it, unconditionally; but on the contrary, the mistake of the clerk in issuing the execution was pointed out as a matter which vitiated the execution and bond, and there would have been no confession of judgment either by M'Pherson or Miller, except for the agreement aforesaid to stay the execution. That agreement having preceded the confession, the confession was an assent to the agreement," even if the confession were made by M'Pherson.

The defendants then referred to the two deeds of the 9th of September 1839 and first of May 1840, and said, that Miller having failed in paying off his obligation to them, it became lawful for James Calwell

313 jr. at *the request of William B. Calwell, to sell at public auction so much of the property conveyed as was necessary to satisfy the debts secured; but instead of causing such sale to be made, the said assignments, deed of trust and other writings of the 18th, 21st and 23d of August 1841 had been made. And they insisted that "if indeed William B. Calwell had the power to divert the property conveyed by Miller to secure the debt due to these defendants, from the purposes for which it was conveyed, and appropriate it to other debts, the exercise of such a power must deprive him of all right to the relief sought by the bill."

Eskridge, who had been the attorney for Sheilds & Somerville, deposed as follows: "When the motion for a judgment was about being made, Miller came to me, and remarked that he should move to quash the bond and execution in the case, as Mr. North (the clerk) had issued the execution for one year's interest more than it ought to have issued for; and called my attention to the bond upon which the suit had been brought. Upon examining the bond and execution, I discovered that a mistake had been made; and then told Mr. Miller I would postpone the motion to a future day of the court. On the day on which judgment was rendered, an arrangement was made with Miller, (acting, as I supposed, not only for himself but as counsel for the Calwells,) by which the defendants were to confess judgment, and I, on behalf of the plaintiffs, was to release the excess of interest, and to stay the execution until the first day of the succeeding term of the court. I believed when the arrangement was made, that Miller had full power and authority to make it on behalf of all the defendants. I would not have made such arrangement unless I had believed all the defendants were to be bound by it." On answer to a question by the counsel for 314 Sheilds & Somerville, he said, "Mr. Miller *would not have consented, as I understood, to a judgment on the bond without a stay of execution. It was considered, as well as I recollect, both by Mr. Miller and myself, that the parties would be placed in the same situation at the then succeeding term, as if the delivery bond and execution had been quashed and new execution issued. My impression was that Miller, throughout this transaction, was acting as an attorney for the Calwells, and for himself as a party concerned. My reason for this impression is, that I have known Miller, since he has practised in Greenbrier, acting as the attorney for the Calwells in all their cases, and in the arrangement made by him he assumed to act for all the defendants, and I did not think, as a member of an honourable profession, he would assume to act where he had no authority." In answer to another question he said, "I would not have made an arrangement with Miller alone, nor would I have entered into any agreement to stay the execution, to which the defendants Calwells were not assenting by their attorney or agent; and if I had not firmly believed that Miller had the power as attorney to make the arrangement to stay the execution and confess the judgment, I would have made no arrangement with him."

On the other hand, Mr. Miller (who was objected to by the counsel of Sheilds & Somerville as incompetent) deposed as follows: "Before a motion for judgment was made upon the bond, I had discovered the error in the execution, and indicated it to Mr. Eskridge; upon whose motion the case was docketed and continued. Upon examination he admitted the error, and suggested a confession of judgment with stay of execution and correction of the error. To this I at once assented, confessed the judgment for myself, and have no recollection of any thing else that occurred about it. I did not see Mr. M'Pherson confess the judgment, nor had I any conversation with him, that I can recollect, in re-

315 lation *to it. I am certain that I did not direct or control his action upon it in any way whatever, nor did I ever hear the record read, or see it, until late in the fall. I was neither the agent of the securities, nor did I in any way assume to be such. I was the principal debtor, and wanted time to pay the debt, and felt confident of my ability to do so at the time which the limitation gave me." In a subsequent part of his deposition he said, "I was in this case not acting as the attorney for the securities, nor did I assume to be such."

M'Pherson deposed as follows: "I was authorized by a paper writing, filed with the papers in the case of Sheilds & Somerville, to confess a judgment on a delivery bond for William B. and James Calwell, which I did in open court. I had no other power granted me. I did not consent to the stay of said execution. I was not consulted in relation to the stay, and further it was a matter with which I had nothing to do." In answer to a question he said, "I was not aware that there was any objection to the bond, until the bond was directed to be docketed; and was informed (as well as I recollect, perhaps on the same day, or during the court) by Mr. North, that it was in consequence of an error in him as clerk, and not in me as sheriff. I was apprized of the stay of execution shortly after the rising of the court, about the time I received my executions from the office, or perhaps during the court; I cannot say certainly."

Mr. North, in his deposition, said, that he did not recollect that any other counsel than Miller had appeared for William B. Calwell and James Calwell since Miller's removal to Greenbrier, except in one action of trespass against James Calwell: that Miller was the attorney for them in all cases against them in the circuit court of Greenbrier in which pleas have been put in, since some time in the year 1840; that the original judgment in favour of Sheilds & Somerville was an office

316 judgment, *no plea having been put in: that at May term 1841, Miller examined all or most of the delivery bonds executed by James Calwell and William B. Calwell: that after he had examined the delivery bond and the original judgment in the case of Shields & Somerville, he understood from him that he intended to resist the award of execution on the delivery bond, because of a variance between the judgment and execution: and that on proving the notice, the motion was docketed and continued. "A day or two afterwards," he said, "I was informed (I think by Mr. Miller and Mr. Eskridge the attorney for Shields & Somerville) that the matter had been arranged; that judgment was to be confessed on the bond, with a stay of execution until the next court." According to his recollection, "Mr. Eskridge, Mr. Miller and Mr. M'Pherson, or perhaps Mr. Miller and Mr. M'Pherson, came to the clerk's office, and confessed the judgment as entered on the record: F. B. Miller confessed the judgment in person, for himself; William B. Calwell and James Calwell, by Joel M'Pherson their attorney in fact."

There was, however, a manifest difference between the entry of the judgment in this case and the entries in other cases (in the same court at this and a preceding term) in which judgments were confessed for the Calwells by M'Pherson as their attorney in fact. For while the entry in this case, as it regards the Calwells, was in the form that would have been used if the confession for them had been by an attorney at law, the entries in the other cases were as follows: "This day came as well the plaintiffs by their attorney, as the defendants by Joel M'Pherson their attorney in fact, and thereupon the said defendants, by their attorney aforesaid, acting under a power of attorney under the hands and seals of the defendants, acknowledge judgment" &c. Copies of five judgments in this form were filed as exhibits.

317 *The cause was heard the 19th of October 1842, before Duncan, J., upon a motion by the defendants to dissolve the injunction: On consideration whereof, the court, for reasons stated in a written opinion, decreed that the injunction be dissolved. The following is an extract from that opinion.

"A record is truth in contemplation of law, and, in the language of Lord Coke, 'imports in itself such incontrollable credit and verity that it admits of no averment, plea of proof to the contrary.' And this is rendered necessary from principles of public policy; for if the verity of the records of courts of justice could be questioned, there would be no end to litigation, and no security for titles to estates. Hardships may sometimes arise from the inflexibility of the rule, but it is much better that they should be endured, than to encounter the pervading and extensive mischiefs that would result from its relaxation. The rule is not of modern origin, but can be traced up to the earliest history of the common law; and no instance, I believe, has occurred of any departure from it down to the present day. The record in the present case states that the defendant Miller in his proper person, and the other defendants by their attorney, appeared, and the said defendants [that is, the said Miller and the two Calwells his sureties] acknowledge judgment for the sum &c. We may here stop to enquire, whether it would be competent for either of these parties to deny the facts stated in the record, so far as I have quoted it; that is, could the defendant Miller be admitted to aver and prove that he did not appear in person and confess the judgment? Suppose he offered to prove an alibi, such proof would necessarily be by parol, by facts in pais: and how could such proof compare with a record, having the solemn sanction of a court of record? Or suppose that the plaintiffs (the Calwells) offered to prove that the attorney who confessed the judgment was not 318 authorized *by them to do so: if there is any force in the decisions upon this question, ancient or modern, they clearly would not have the right. In 1 Salkeld 86, the court of king's bench decided, 'that an attorney's consent binds the client, though contrary to his express orders;' and in another case reported on the same page, chief justice Holt said, 'The course of this court is, where the attorney takes upon him to appear, the court looks no farther, and leaves the party to his action against him.' In a modern case decided by a learned judge of the federal court, in an action brought against two defendants upon a judgment rendered in a state court, the record shewed that both the defendants 'appeared by attorney.' One of them pleaded, that at the time of the proceedings he resided out of the state; that he had no notice of the proceedings, nor authorized any person to consent for him to the plea. There was a demurrer, and the court sustained the demurrer. This case presented the ground of an alibi, (according to the hypothetical case stated by me in the first proposition,) and in all respects is a much stronger case than the case of the plaintiffs; yet Judge Washington decided it upon the broad ground, that a record imports in itself such incontrollable credit and verity, that it admits of no averment, plea or proof to contradict it.

"So much as it regards what may be technically called the judgment in this case. I am clear in the opinion that the plaintiffs are estopped by the record from denying that there was such a judgment, and that it was rendered upon their confession by their attorney.

"But in the argument it was contended with great force and plausibility, that the agreement to stay execution was an extrajudicial act of the parties; that it constituted no part of the judgment of the court: and that whilst they admit the full force of the rule that the records of the courts must be considered a verity, yet the rule only applies to the judicial action of

319 the court, *and cannot be expended to embrace mere private agreements, which might as well be made out of court, and with which the court had nothing to do. It seems to me that this reasoning cannot be sustained. A judgment by confession is always the result of agreement, and frequently of compromise and concession; and I have shewn that a judgment by confession cannot be questioned. And so in reference to any agreement in the progress of a cause. We have seen in the case extracted from Salkeld, that an agreement by the attorney to join issue on a plea, (which the court says was a hard plea,) against the express orders of the client, was binding on the client. Thus I have shewn by express adjudication, that the agreement of the parties entered upon the record, in relation to a cause depending in the court, is of as high a nature as the record of the action of the court itself. And how is it in the case of an agreement of this character, entered upon record after a judgment has been rendered? Suppose the plaintiff, by his attorney, were to enter upon the record satisfaction of a judgment; can there be any doubt that it would be binding upon the plaintiff? I think there could be none. And as to an agreement to stay execution, suppose the record had stated that the defendants had in proper person appeared and agreed to it; would they not have the same right to controvert the fact of their having appeared in person, as they would of an entry upon the record that they had appeared by their attorney? I can see no difference. The agreement to stay execution is as much a part of the record as the agreement confessing judgment, and being contemporaneous with it, must be looked upon as a part of the same transaction. And that an agreement entered upon record to stay execution has all the characteristics of a record, is clearly inferrible from the decision in Eppes & others v. Randolph, 2 Call

186. Under our statute of executions, 320 we know that a judgment *creditor must sue out execution within a year after the rendition of the judgment: yet in the case to which I have just referred, there was a stay of execution for two years from the time of rendering the judgment, and the court of appeals recognized the right to sue out execution after the expiration of the time to which the stay of execution extended, though more than a year had elapsed from the date of the judgment. And I apprehend that the defendant could not have been entertained on a motion to quash the execution; on the ground that the record of the agreement to stay execution was an estoppel upon him. Such, I have reason to believe, has been the uniform course of the courts on this subject. But if it were competent to the defendants to question the verity of the record as to the agreement by them, by their attorney, to stay execution, is not the right mutual, and cannot the plaintiffs contest that matter also, and say that their attorney made no such agreement, or that he transcended his authority? Suppose the plaintiffs had caused execution to issue before the expiration of the stay, can there be a question that the court would have instantly quashed it, even if the plaintiffs had been full handed with proof that the attorney made no such agreement to stay execution, or if he did, that he transcended his authority? And if the argument of the plaintiffs here rest upon the ground that the general power of an attorney at law extends only to the prosecution or defence of an action, and that after judgment is rendered his functions cease, how will that proposition affect the parties here? The plaintiffs' attorney, it is supposed, had no right to enter into an agreement for a stay of execution, so as to bind them. If this is admitted, then the attorney for the creditors had no right to make the agreement, so as to bind them. Therefore the agreement to stay execution was binding on neither party: it must consequently be a nullity, and the judgment would 321 stand as if no such *agreement had been made. Now the principle is well established, that it is not the mere fact of indulgence by a creditor to the principal debtor that will exonerate the sureties: the indulgence must be the result of a valid agreement between the creditor and his debtor, which would be enforced either at law or in equity. This principle has been so often decided, that a reference to the authorities is unnecessary. It is not pretended that there was any other agreement to stay execution, than that disclosed by the record; and that agreement, if not binding on the sureties, cannot be binding on the creditors.

"But it is contended that the attorney for the defendants, mentioned in the record, was Joel M'Pherson, the attorney in fact. The answer to this is, that the record does not so state it: and a record must always be proved by itself; nothing aliunde is admissible. The term attorney, used in the record, implies an attorney at law. But suppose it does comprehend an attorney in fact: non constat that the attorney in fact was Joel M'Pherson; it may have been another: and non constat that the letter of attorney was the same filed in this cause; there may have been another: and to go into the enquiry would be to subvert the rule I have just stated, that a record must be proved by itself, and admits of nothing aliunde. Suppose, however, that the attorney mentioned in the record was Joel M'Pherson, and that his sole authority was the letter of attorney filed in this case: is the proposition a clear one, that he would have transcended his authority in making the agreement for the stay of execution? I doubt exceedingly whether it would not have been within the scope of his authority. He might have consulted thereby the interest of his principals. And when we take into consideration the fact, that they were actually in possession of a trust fund belonging to the principal debtor, intended for their indemnity against this particular debt, in equity *they became principals themselves: therefore delay was precisely what they may have most desired. But I will not elaborate this branch of the case. My proposition is, that the record is conclusive against them."

William B. Calwell and James Calwell presented a petition for an appeal. In a note by Patton as their counsel, subjoined to the petition, it was insisted that the judge of the circuit court had misconceived the question in the case; that his opinion was founded on the supposition that the plaintiffs seek to impeach the verity of the record, when such is not the fact. "On the contrary," said the counsel, "they insist upon the verity of the record. They, by their attorney, did confess the judgment. They expected and intended that Miller their principal should also confess judgment. This, it is true, he did: but by an arrangement between him and the defendants in equity, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, or of any person acting for or authorized to act for them, he procured a stay of execution." The attorney of the plaintiffs made no agreement that the execution should be stayed; "they made no such condition. The record alleges no such thing. And the proof not only shews that neither they nor any one else for them (either attorney at law or attorney in fact) made any such agreement, but it shews who did make the agreement. The proof is clear beyond doubt, that Miller acted for himself, and for himself alone; and it is equally clear that the attorney in fact, who acted for the plaintiffs in confessing the judgment, knew nothing about the arrangement,—neither assented to it nor was consulted about it."

The appeal was allowed.

Price for appellants. There is no inconsistency between the allegations of the bill and the entry upon the record. The circuit court seems to have supposed that the entry of the appearance of the defendants by their *attorney must mean that they appeared by an attorney at law. But that is not the necessary meaning of attorney: it means attorney at law or in fact, but does not necessarily mean either. And the record, therefore, does not estop the appellants from shewing by parol that the attorney meant was an attorney in fact. Not only did the circuit court hold it to work such estoppel, and to be conclusive proof that an attorney at law was meant, but it seems to have supposed that Miller must of necessity have been that attorney. For this supposition there is no foundation. The original judgment was by default, and no information is to be derived from that to shew who was the attorney in the case. Is it to be presumed that Miller, the principal debtor, had been employed as the attorney of the sureties? This would be a presumption not only without proof, but against proof: for Miller expressly dis-claims acting for the Calwells; and M'Pherson proves that he confessed the judgment. But suppose the record is to be considered as importing that the defendants appeared by an attorney at law and confessed the judgment; how far have the plaintiffs advanced? Not a step. The record shews that the plaintiffs at law by their attorney, agreed to stay execution. This is the very thing complained of; and the record is therefore evidence in our favour. The record does not shew with whom the agreement was made; it certainly does not shew an agreement between the Calwells and the plaintiffs at law for the stay: and we may therefore well contend that the burthen is, by the record, thrown upon the plaintiffs at law, to shew that the Calwells were parties to or acquiesced in the agreement. At all events we may shew with whom the agreement was made,—that it was with Miller, without shewing the record untrue. So far as appears from the record, the agreement was voluntary; but we are authorized to shew by parol what was the inducement to it; and the proof shews the consideration. *What then was the effect of the agreement? The cases all shew that if there be an agreement for delay between the principal and the creditor, by which the hands of the creditor are tied, the sureties are discharged. Nisbet v. Smith and others, 2 Bro. C. C. 579; Rees v. Berrington, 2 Ves. jun. 540; Boulton v. Stubbs, 18 Ves. 20; Samuel v. Howarth, 3 Meriv. 278; King v. Baldwin, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 560; S. C., 17 Johns. R. 390; Croughton v. Duval, 3 Calf 69; Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; Hill v. Bull, Gilm. 149; Bennett v. Maule's adm'r, Gilm. 305; Norris v. Crummey &c., 2 Rand. 334; Hunter's adm'r's v. Jett, 4 Rand. 107; Steele v. Boyd, 6 Leigh 547. If there had been no agreement of record,—if there had merely been a paper written and filed containing an agreement between the plaintiffs and Miller that the execution should be stayed, it would operate to discharge the sureties. The entry on the record can have no other effect.

It will be contended on the other side, that Miller is incompetent. This case is like Hill v. Bull in this, that there, without Hite's deposition, there was other abundant testimony, and here the testimony is abundant without Miller's. But the objection there, that the witness was liable for costs, does not apply here. In Steele v. Boyd it was unanimously decided that the witness was competent; and the decision is in point. Here, though the Calwells got relief, Miller will not be released. His interest is equal on both sides. Ware v. Stephenson, 10 Leigh 155, is also a pertinent authority on the question of competency.

The objection that William Calwell was indemnified by Miller's deeds of trust, does not apply to James Calwell. But is there any force in the objection even as to William Calwell? What were the terms of the deeds? If William Calwell should have the money to pay, the property might be sold. But unless he is bound, he will not have it to pay, and therefore the deeds cannot operate.

325 *Robinson for appellees. The ground of the bill is, that the agreement to stay, though made at the same time that the defendants confessed judgment, and entered of record contemporaneously with that confession, was without their knowledge or consent. Before enquiring whether the parol evidence sustains the allegation, the question arises how far such evidence is admissible to shew what took place in court? To what do we look "when the acts of a court of justice are the subject of evidence?" The answer is, that "courts of record speak by means of their records only." 3 Starkie on Ev. 1043. And the record imports in itself such uncontrollable credit and verity, that it admits of no averment, plea or proof to the contrary. 3 Tho. Co. Lit. 323; Field v. Gibbs &c., Peters's C. C. R. 155. This is not controverted; it is said that the appellants, so far from making any averment against the record, insist on its verity. If it had been averred that the Calwells had not appeared by attorney, and had not acknowledged the judgment, it is agreed that such averment would have been against the record, and no proof of it could have been received. But the argument is, that it is no contradiction of the record to aver that what is entered after the judgment, was without their knowledge and assent. An inspection of the record is sufficient to demonstrate the incorrectness of this proposition. The record states that the plaintiffs release to the defendants. This undoubtedly means, to all the defendants; to Miller, who had appeared in person, and to the other defendants, who had appeared by attorney. And if the release be to all the defendants, the agreement to stay the execution must be understood to be an agreement with all. It is only necessary to read the sentence, to see that this is its meaning. Agree with whom? Why, with the defendants, of course; with Miller, who had appeared in person, and with the other defendants, who had appeared by attorney.

326 No *other interpretation can fairly be placed upon the language, in the absence of words confining the agreement to Miller. Had it been understood to be with Miller alone, there would have been inserted, after the word "agree," the words "with the defendant Miller." Suppose, instead of one defendant appearing in person and the others by attorney, all had appeared in person or all by attorney, and the entry had stated that the defendants came in proper person or came by attorney, and had been in all other respects exactly as it is; surely the agreement must, in each of those cases, have been understood to be with all the defendants who appeared. And if it would have been so understood in those cases, it must be understood in the same way in this. The other side leave out of their consideration the word agree; they would have the court to forget that this word necessarily imports that there is some person or persons with whom the agreement is made. If not,—if they admit that the import of the record is that there were two parties to the agreement, then the conclusion is irresistible, that, according to the record, the plaintiffs by their attorney constituted one party, and the defendants in person or by attorney the other party: just as in a case where a suit is entered dismissed agreed, the plaintiffs constitute one party to the agreement, and the defendants the other; or as in the case of articles of agreement between A. B. of the one part, and C. D. and E. F. of the other, where, it being said that A. B. agrees, the necessary conclusion would be that the agreement was with C. D. and E. F. both. The record in this case, then, must be considered as importing not only that the agreement was with the knowledge of all the defendants, but also that it was with the consent of all.

But it is not necessary that there should have been the express consent of all; it is enough if the agreement was with the knowledge of all. Now, as the record

327 *shews and the appellants admit that they appeared by attorney, this appearance charges them with knowledge of all the proceedings which took place in court in the case. And the agreement to stay being part of those proceedings, they cannot be heard to say that the agreement was without their knowledge. Suppose this were a case in which the defendants had all confessed judgment in proper person, the entry in other respects being as it is, and two of the defendants were hardy enough to aver that the agreement was without their knowledge; can it be imagined for one single moment that such an averment would avail? Surely not. For all that appears in the record is regarded as having been done publicly in court, and the parties who appeared are considered as present while there was action in the case, and privy to what was done. The agreement to stay, forming a part of the action in the case, must be held to have been made in their presence and with their knowledge, and no averment or proof could be received from them to the contrary. If this would be so in case all the defendants had appeared in person, how stands the case when one of them has appeared in person and the two others by attorney? The agreement to stay must, in this case, equally be held to have been made in the presence and with the knowledge of the attorney who appeared. It is in vain to urge that the agreement might in fact have been without the knowledge of the attorney. Either he must have known of it, or he might with reasonable care have known of it. With due attention, he could not have failed to acquire such knowledge, either on the day the proceedings occurred, or the next morning when they were read. 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 69, § 46, p. 237. And if, for want of proper attention, he did not in fact obtain such knowledge, though this may subject the agent to the action of his principals, it cannot relieve them from the consequences of that knowledge which he had or might have had, *and which indeed they themselves might have had. In many cases, from considerations of policy, judicial proceedings affect third persons who are not parties to the case and have no actual knowledge of such proceedings, in like manner as if they had such knowledge. And in holding those who are parties to a case, and have appeared in it in person or by attorney, chargeable with knowledge of the proceedings in the case, the policy of the law is carried out with much more mildness, and upon grounds so reasonable that they cannot well be questioned.

In the view which has been presented, it is enough that the Calwells appeared by attorney: it is immaterial by what kind of attorney they appeared; and it can be of no avail to urge that the attorney who appeared for them was not authorized to agree to a stay of execution. Being authorized (as they admit) to appear in the case for them and confess the judgment, he was authorized at least to take notice of what took place, and inform his principals of it: it was his duty to take this notice and give this information; it must be intended that he performed this duty; and their failure to object at the time, or soon afterwards, is an acquiescence in what was done. Moreover, the authority of an attorney to confess a judgment carries with it the authority to make arrangements as to the time of issuing the execution. If he may confess judgment with an immediate issue of execution, he may confess it also with a stay of execution. It may be said, there is a difference in this respect between the case of an attorney appearing under such a power as that to M'Pherson, and the case of an attorney having the general authority of an attorney at law. This is not admitted: but if there be such difference, this confession is entered in the mode in which it would have been entered if made by an attorney at law, and not in the mode in which judgments confessed at the same term by *M'Pherson under powers of attorney were entered. It does not purport to have been confessed under a power of attorney, nor by him. But regarding the agreement as contemporaneous with the confession, it is wholly immaterial whether the confession was by an attorney at law or by an attorney in fact. For, as the authority under which the confession was made is unquestioned, the confession is binding, and must preclude the appellants from impeaching its validity because of any agreement which had been made before the confession, or which was made contemporaneously with it, as effectually as a confession made in that state of the case by the defendants in person would have done. Whether the attorney knew of the agreement to stay or did not know of it, the result will be the same. If he knew of the agreement and still made the confession, he did that which he was clearly authorized to do, and this confession bound his principals. It must have been so, if the agreement to stay had been entered first, and the confession of judgment entered afterwards; and it cannot the less be so, because of the order in which the two things are entered, supposing them to be contemporaneous. On the other hand, suppose the agent, when he made the confession, had no knowledge of the agreement to stay, and suppose, if he had possessed this knowledge, he would not have made the confession, (both of which suppositions are unauthorized by the facts of the case;) still, if the agent might with reasonable care have known of the agreement, and injury has resulted to his principals from the want of this care, the whole effect of such want of care (as before remarked) is to subject the agent to the action of his principals.

These views are fully authorized by the general doctrines which pertain to the relation of principal and agent, and by the decision of judge Washington in the case of Field v. Gibbs &c. before cited. Although he *held the plea in that case to be no bar to the action on the judgment, yet he entertained no doubt that if the plea was true, the attorney was liable for damages to the party for whom he appeared. That no injustice will be done by acting upon this doctrine in the present case, abundantly appears from the parol evidence, if it shall be found necessary to look into it. [The evidence of Eskridge and of North was here stated.] Well may Eskridge say, as he does say, that he did not think Miller, as a member of an honourable profession, would assume to act where he had no authority. He had a right so to think. No warrant of attorney is known among us. Counsel deal with counsel as authorized to act in those cases in which they assume to act. The courts act upon this supposition also. It is our usage, and a usage which must be respected when the objection is taken that the action of counsel does not bind the party for whom he has assumed to act. In this case, however, it cannot be doubted that Miller was authorized to appear and act for the Calwells in every case in which he thought proper to appear and act,—in this as well as the rest; and having acted for them as well as for himself, they are bound by his action. If they are not, still they are bound by M'Pherson's conduct. On the day the motion was directed to be docketed, he was aware of the objection taken to the bond. Yet he made no confession. He left Miller either to move to quash the execution and bond, or to make an arrangement with the plaintiffs' counsel, for the Calwells as well as for himself: and when Miller had made such an arrangement, M'Pherson united with him in making the confession. The confession thus made, being after that arrangement, was necessarily subject to it. He admits, too, that he was apprized of the stay of execution; and as it was his duty to communicate this fact, we have a right to conclude that he did communicate it to his principals.

331 *The deposition of Miller, we insist, cannot be used by the Calwells, because he is interested that they should succeed. To Sheilds & Somerville he is only liable for the principal, interest and costs recovered by their judgment, not for damages pending the injunction of the Calwells. Garnett v. Jones, 4 Leigh 633. Neither is he liable to them for their costs in equity. But if the injunction of the Calwells be dissolved, they may recover over against Miller whatever they may have to pay, (including the damages pending the injunction, and the costs in chancery) and may also recover against him the costs of their suit or motion. See Stowers adm'r of Bragg v. Smith's ex'x, 5 Munf. 401. Miller is therefore more clearly incompetent than the principal obligor in Riddle v. Moss, 7 Cranch 206, or in Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386. But if the deposition of Miller be looked to it is obvious, taking it in connexion with that of Eskridge, that Miller did not make the objection to the forthcoming bond merely for himself, but made it for the Calwells as well as himself, and that Eskridge's suggestion of the confession and stay was to Miller not only for himself, but as representing the other obligors; and that when Miller "to this at once assented," his assent was as well for the others as for himself. And all this may be so, though the confession of judgment for the Calwells was by M'Pherson.

The fact not being established that the agreement was with Miller alone, or that it was without the assent or knowledge of the sureties, it is unnecessary to enquire how far the agreement by the attorney for the plaintiffs is binding on them. This however is clear, that if the agreement had not been a part of the proceedings in court,—if there had merely been an agreement in pais between the plaintiffs' attorney at law and Miller that the execution should be stayed, such as was mentioned by the appellants' counsel, it would not operate to 332 discharge the sureties; because "an attorney at law has *not, in virtue of his office, power to release the sureties of the principal debtor from whom he may have been employed to collect a debt, or to do any act which would have that effect, to his client's prejudice." This is the language of the court in Givens v. Briscoe &c., 3 J. J. Mar. 533. And Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277, so far as it goes, sustains the same doctrine.

But II. Upon what principle is it that William B. Calwell can come into equity and ask to be discharged, after he has diverted the property conveyed by Miller to secure him in respect to the debt due Sheilds & Somerville, from the purposes for which it was conveyed, and appropriated it to other debts of his own? If the case had been the other way,—if the deeds of trust had been made in terms to secure the creditor, and the creditor had disabled himself from transferring the securities to the surety, he would be precluded from so much of his demand against the surety as the latter might have procured if the transfer had been made to him. The rule is one of equity, which regards the property as dedicated to the debt. On the other hand, where the property is conveyed in terms for the surety's benefit, the right of the creditor cannot be less. If a distinction in that respect be taken between a trust which is to cease and determine in case the surety be indemnified and saved harmless, and a trust which is only to cease in case the debt be paid, the answer is that these trusts are of the latter character. The terms are, that the right in the trustee shall cease if Miller shall pay off and discharge the bond. Certain it is, that when default was made by Miller in paying the bond, and William B. Calwell was required to pay it, and damnified by the suit of Sheilds & Somerville, from that moment a case existed in which there was a right to sell the property under the trust, and consequently in which the creditors had a right to be substituted to the then existing rights of the

333 surety. If the creditors had *then brought a suit to obtain such substitution, even if the sureties had become afterwards discharged by any act of the creditors, the creditors might yet be substituted to that right of the sureties which had become perfect before such discharge. And it may be questioned whether, by any transfer of the surety, this right of the creditors is destroyed. But undoubtedly, if, in consequence of William B. Calwell being the cestui que trust on the face of the deeds, his power over the subject was complete, and the right of the creditors to charge the subject thereby lost, William B. Calwell can have no pretence to the equity which he claims. The very ground of this doctrine as to the effect of an agreement by the creditor to give time to the principal debtor is, that if no such time had been given, and execution could have issued at the suit of the creditor or at the suit of the surety, the debt might perhaps have been made out of the principal's property. And the surety is not in a condition to ask equity to give him the benefit of this doctrine, when that which the doctrine supposes may perhaps have resulted from the creditor's agreement, has been done certainly and directly by the surety himself; viz. diverting the debtor's property from the debt. The case is yet stronger when we find the property diverted to effect other objects of the surety.

Patton in reply. We concede that where the record is certain and unequivocal in its statements, it cannot be contradicted or disproved, except in certain cases upon the ground of fraud or mistake. But we do not concede that it is an estoppel as to all that counsel may think proper to infer. The sense in which lord Coke considers the record as importing such incontrollable verity, appears by the next sentence, where he says, "And if such a record be alleged, and it be pleaded that there is no such record, it shall be tried only by itself." 3 Tho. Co. Lit. 323. What is the reason on 334 *which the doctrine rests? Lord Coke assigns it, immediately after the passage just referred to. "The reason," he says, "is apparent; for otherwise there should never be any end of controversies." Even between the same parties, the record is not always conclusive as to what appears on it. Seddon v. Tutop, 6 T. R. 607. The cases upon this subject are collected in the opinions delivered in Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 1. It is a part of the rule laid down by De Gray, chief justice, in the case of The Dutchess of Kingston (which is one of those cited, p. 18), that a judgment is not evidence of a matter incidentally cognizable, nor of a matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. And so it is laid down by lord Coke, that every estoppel "must be certain to every intent, and not to be taken by argument or inference," and that "every estoppel ought to be a precise affirmation of that which maketh the estoppel." 3 Tho. Co. Lit. 431. In the present case, the record is wholly ambiguous and uncertain as to the material facts. It shews that the acknowledgment of judgment for the Calwells was by an attorney; but who that attorney was, or whether an attorney at law or in fact, does not appear. It shews that the plaintiffs agreed to stay the execution; but with whom they agreed, whether with Miller, or the attorney for the Calwells, or both, or whether the agreement was voluntary or not, the record does not shew. And yet the court is asked to supply all these matters about which the record gives no information, upon the ground that the record is conclusive. If the construction of the entry contended for on the other side were a more probable one than it is, still it would be a complete answer, that the conclusion is only arrived at by ingenious, protracted and inferential ratiocination, and the record is no estoppel as to what is ascertained by argument and inference. And there is another rule of law which would preclude the appellees from relying on the estoppel, if otherwise they *might have 335 relied on it. They have not only answered as to the matter of fact, but have proceeded to take evidence in support of their allegations. The rule of law is, that if a party having a right to rely on an estoppel does not plead it, but merely relies on it as evidence, the truth of the matter may be proved. Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 18; Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1; Vooght v. Winch, 2 Barn. & Ald. 662; Trevivan v. Lawrence, 1 Salk. 276; Outram v. Morewood, 3 East 346; Stoughton v. Lynch, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 210.

As to the matters, then, about which this record is claimed to be conclusive, it can only be evidence so far as it goes, liable to have its defects supplied by parol proof. Indeed, parol proof is not only admissible to supply defects, but may be received to shew that what from the record, in the absence of evidence, would be supposed to be the fact, is not so. Shelton and others v. Ward, 1 Call 538; Stolars adm'r of Bragg v. Smith's ex'x, 5 Munf. 401.

Of what is the record in this case evidence? It shews, it is said, that the release was to the defendants. Does it follow that the agreement for a release was with the defendants? It was not only the interest but the duty of the plaintiffs' counsel to make the release, whether there was any agreement for it or not. As it regards the agreement to stay, there is nothing to shew that it was by contract with any person at all; it may have been voluntary, having no more of the nature of a contract than an entry of the plaintiff's agreeing to dismiss a suit in which there was no appearance by the defendant. But if not voluntary, what is there to authorize the inference that the agreement was with all the defendants, rather than with Miller alone? It seems to be supposed that in articles of agreement inter partes, every agreement by the party of one part must necessarily be considered to be with all those of the other part. This will be so or not, just as the articles 336 shew *or do not shew that the agreement was with all or only one of them. Platt on Covenants 130. Reference was also made to the entry of a suit dismissed agreed. Such an entry purports an agreement between the parties, because it states that the parties came by counsel, and by their agreement, or by their consent, the suit is dismissed.

But it is argued that because the record shews that the defendants came by their attorney, whether the agreement was with them or not, they must have known of it. In such a case as this, it is necessary that there should have been actual presence and actual knowledge by some persons who had authority to assent or ratify. If the Calwells had been personally present at the time of the agreement to stay the execution, and had made no objection to it, they would have been bound; but if they were not present and did not know of it, then, whether the agreement preceded or followed the judgment, they will not be bound. The argument that the attorney of the Calwells either knew of the agreement or might have known of it, will not avail. Suppose he did know of it, was it his duty or had he any right to object? He had a right to conclude that it was either voluntary, or with Miller alone, or with his clients; and neither way was he bound to object, or communicate the matter to his clients. If the attorney had interfered when the agreement was with Miller alone, and would have operated to discharge the sureties, well might it be said that he would be liable to the action of his principals. It was his duty not even to tell his clients, if by telling them he exposed them to the danger of having the liability revived.

It is thought just that relief should be denied to the appellants, and they left to pursue either Miller or M'Pherson. Pursue Miller for what? Was he their attorney? Does the record shew it? The attorney at law who is to bind the party must be the attorney on *record.

And here the record gives the name of no attorney. Ought the appellants to pursue M'Pherson? What was his authority and what was he to do? He could do nothing which he was not expressly authorized to do. Livermore on Agency 69, 94, 97, 103; Paley on Agency 150. And he has done nothing but what he was authorized to do. Would it not be as just to send the appellees in pursuit of Eskridge? If loss is to be inflicted on any agent in this transaction, on whom should it be but him?

(Here Patton examined the evidence, and argued that the agreement to stay the execution was with Miller alone; that he was not the attorney for the Calwells in this case, never told Eskridge he was acting for them, and in fact did not act for them, but left M'Pherson to confess the judgment as their attorney; that though Miller had said, in the most explicit terms, he was their attorney and would confess judgment if there was a stay of execution, they would nevertheless not be bound, if he had not done what he said he would do; that though he had assumed to act for them, yet if he so assumed in a case in which they had another attorney, and in which he was not authorized to act for them, this would not bind them, Kennedy v. Gibbes, 2 Desauss. 380; but that in truth he had not assumed to act for them, for Eskridge's statement that he so assumed must be regarded not as a statement of a fact, but as his opinion upon the facts; that for this opinion Eskridge had no sufficient ground; that no authority to Miller to appear in this case could be implied from his appearing for the Calwells in other cases, Wolstenholm v. Davis, Freeman's Cas. in Ch. 289, especially as the Calwells, so far from leaving the matter open to him to appear or not, had constituted another attorney; and that if, upon the whole evidence, the court should regard the same as balanced, the burthen of proof was on the appellees, and they must fail.)

*It seems to be supposed that Eskridge, who is directly interested, and against whom this very record could be used by his clients to charge him, is competent, and that Miller is not. (Robinson. There being no exception to the competency of Eskridge, that question is not before this court; there is an exception to Miller's deposition.) On what ground is Miller to be held incompetent? It is objected that he is liable to the sureties for costs; and the cases of Riddle v. Moss, 7 Cranch 206, and Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386, are referred to. Those cases do not apply. The costs there were a necessary incident to the obligation of suretyship. The costs here are not of that character; the surety comes here upon a new and independent ground. But the point is adjudged in Steele v. Boyd, 6 Leigh 547. That case shews that the principal is not liable for the costs in this case. And if not liable for costs, he cannot be for damages. The damages are a penalty only upon the party who prosecutes the injunction. Miller is clearly not liable for them to the creditor. Nor is he liable to the sureties. In Stowers adm'r of Bragg v. Smith's ex'x, 5 Munf. 401, the damages and costs were incurred in resisting the liability in consequence of the contract of suretyship; and that case is therefore clearly distinguishable from this, in which the controversy is (as before mentioned) upon new and independent ground.

To the proposition in Givens v. Briscoe &c., 3 J. J. Mar. 533, as applied to the case in which it is found, there is no objection; but it can have no application here. In Norris v. Crummey &c., 2 Rand. 334, judge Green puts the case of a judgment with an entry of record staying the execution, as one of the modes by which sureties may be discharged. The principle is, that whatever an attorney does in the course of a suit is binding on his client: the client is bound although the attorney was expressly prohibited from doing *it.

Huston v. Mitchell, 14 Serg. & Rawle 307. This subject is well considered in Denton & others v. Noyes, 6 Johns. R. 296.

In concluding upon the main question, Patton referred to Skip v. Hue, 3 Atk. 91; Eyre v. Bartrop, 3 Madd. C. R. 221, am. edi. 120; Chichester's adm'r v. Mason, 7 Leigh 244, and to the other cases cited by Price as to the effect of an agreement between the principal and creditor by which the hands of the creditor are tied. He referred to them to show not only the general principle, but also the manner in which it had been applied.

II. He examined the validity of the objection that William B. Calwell was not entitled to relief because he had released property conveyed for his benefit. He argued, that both deeds were in terms for the purpose of reimbursing William B. Calwell what he might have paid; that though there might have been a power to sell if he had required it, still he was not bound to require a sale; that if the creditors had in terms given William B. Calwell a release, they could not afterwards come into equity and complain that property previously conveyed for his benefit, had, after the release, been discharged; that here William B. Calwell had been discharged as effectually as he could be by a deed of release, and being discharged, had done no wrong in giving up property conveyed for his indemnity, there being no obligation, either legal or moral, to hold on to the property for the benefit of the creditors.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of a majority of the court:

The court is of opinion that the entry in the proceedings mentioned on the motion for award of execution upon the forthcoming bond, must be taken altogether, and regarded as the record of a judgment between the parties, upon the confession of the defendants therein, with the condition of a stay of execution: that it not 340 *appearing from that record whether William B. Calwell and James Calwell appeared by an attorney at law or an attorney in fact, evidence aliunde is admissible for the purpose of proving that they appeared by an attorney in fact, and to shew the authority under which he acted: that the power of attorney from said Calwells to Joel M'Pherson, under which the latter acted, did authorize the confession of judgment with stay of execution, appearing from said record: and that parol testimony is not admissible to prove that so much of said entry as relates to the stay of execution was without the consent and concurrence of said M'Pherson. It is therefore considered that the decree be affirmed with costs.

STANARD, J., dissented. He was of opinion that the injunction should be perpetuated, so far as it restrained proceedings as to James Calwell.

Yarbrough*, 13 Gratt. 192, for the proposition that where a wife has a vested remainder in personal estate expectant on the death of a tenant for life, and both the wife and tenant for life outlive the husband, the wife is entitled, by right of survivorship, to the interest or remainder, not only against the representatives and general assignees of the husband, but even against the particular assignee for valuable consideration.

thing assigned be no farther reduced into possession during the coverture, the title of the particular assignee will be good against the wife surviving, recognized as correct by judges ALLEN and STANARD.

Same—Same—Same—Effect of Divorce—Case at Bar.—

A testator directed his personal estate to be divided into shares, of which he gave one share to his daughter. The daughter's husband, for valuable consideration, assigned all the interest to which he was entitled, in right of his wife, in her father's estate. After this assignment, an act of assembly was passed by the legislature of Kentucky, in which state the husband and wife had become domiciled, declaring the marriage contract between them forever dissolved so far as respects her, and restoring her to all the rights and privileges of an unmarried woman, and further declaring her entitled, out of the estate of the husband, to receive alimony agreeably to the laws of the commonwealth. On a bill by the assignee against the testator's executor, the husband, and the wife, to recover her share of her father's estate, HELD by two judges, 1. That by the act of divorce, the right of the wife to her choses in action not reduced into possession during the coverture, is placed on the same ground as if the husband had then died: but, 2. That the interest of the wife in the subject assigned being a present, not a reversionary interest, and there being a particular assignment of that interest for valuable consideration, the title of the assignee is good against the wife.

Same—Same—Reduction into Possession by Assignee.

—The principal case is cited in Williams v. Sloan, 75 Va. 149, for the proposition that if the husband assigns the chose the assignee must reduce it into actual possession, and even then the assignee takes it subject to all the equities against the assignor, one of which is the wife's equity to a settlement out of the chose in action so assigned.

In Henry v. Graves, 16 Gratt. 249, it is said: "A husband's assignment for value of his wife's legal chose in action is good against the wife, because it is equivalent to a reduction into possession. Having a right to reduce it into possession, he, in effect, does so, when he receives value for it. By selling it, he agrees to reduce it into possession for the benefit of the vendee; and a court of equity, in such a case, considers that as done which is agreed to be done. But the husband's assignment of a vested remainder of the wife has not that effect: because, not having then, a right to reduce the property into possession actually, he cannot do it constructively. The assignment for value by the husband, places the assignee in the husband's shoes, and invests him with the husband's contingent interest, which will become absolute in the assignee, when and as it would have become absolute in the husband if he had made no assignment. See Browning v. Headley, 2 Rob. R. 370, and the cases cited."

‡Same—Wife's Equity to Settlement.—See foot-notes to James v. Gibbs, 1 Pat. & H. 277; Dold v. Geiger, 2 Gratt. 98, and monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 150. The principal case is cited in Poindexter v. Jef-

of Settlement. §—The doctrine of the english chancery, that where an absolute equitable interest is given to the wife, the court will not permit the husband to recover it without making a provision for the wife, and that the husband's assignee, whether general or particular, takes his interest subject to the same equity, recognized as binding upon the courts of this state. And the doctrine carried farther than it was carried in Beresford &c. v. Hobson &c., 1 Madd. C. R. 361, american ed. 199, by sir Thomas Plumer, who considered that the court in no case had given the whole to the wife; not even "where the husband has left his wife and gone abroad."

Same—Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—A testator directs his estate other than slaves to be turned into money, and directs the slaves and money to be divided amongst ten legatees, any advances to whom are to be deducted from their respective shares. The husband of a daughter assigns her interest for valuable consideration. On a 342 bill by the assignee *against the executor, the husband, and the wife, it is insisted by the wife that a provision should be made for her. No evidence is taken by the assignee to shew that the whole interest would be more than an adequate provision. But it appears that the penalty of the executor's bond was only 30,000 dollars, and the consideration for the assignment only 1500 dollars; that the husband had received from the testator upwards of 2000 dollars in money and property, and that he had squandered the same, and then abandoned his wife, leaving her with 6 or 7 children in a destitute condition, in consequence of which she obtained a divorce. HELD, under the circumstances, no enquiry before a commissioner is necessary, to ascertain what would be a reasonable provision for the wife; that it is plain the whole residue coming from her father's estate will not be more than an adequate provision for her; and the bill should be dismissed.

Same—Same—Consideration of Assignment—Evidence.—A share of the proceeds of a testator's estate being bequeathed to a feme covert, and her husband having assigned the same, a bill is filed by the assignee, which alleges that the assignment was in consideration of 1500 dollars. The executor and the feme both answer, but the answers do not deny the consideration, or call for proof of it; and the deed of assignment purports on its face to be in consideration of 1500 dollars. It seems, there being no such denial or call for proof, the deed is prima facie evidence of the allegation in the bill. Accord. Scott & wife &c. v. Gibbon & Co. &c., 5 Munf. 86.

William Headley, then of the county of Frederick in Virginia, made his will bearing date the 4th of April 1836, by which he desired that all his estate except slaves should be sold, his funeral expenses and just debts be paid, and the remainder of his estate (including the slaves as well as money and bonds) be divided into ten equal shares, of which he gave one share to his fries, 15 Gratt. 368; Sherrard v. Carlisle, 1 Pat. & H. 27.

§Same—Same—Amount of Settlement.—The principal case is cited in Poindexter v. Jeffries, 15 Gratt. 372; Dold v. Gelger, 2 Gratt. 105; Sherrard v. Carlisle, 1 Pat. & H. 31; Adams v. Medsker, 25 W. Va. 182.

daughter Winifred Browning. The nine other shares were given to other children, and the children of deceased children; and then there was this clause: "And whereas I have at sundry times made advances to my sons and sons in law, as will more fully appear by reference to instruments of writing now in my possession; now it is my will and desire that the advances alluded to shall be accounted for and deducted from the legacy or share of such son or son in law, 343 or from the children *of such, in case they are the legatees of such share or legacy." The will was admitted to record in the court of Warren county on the 28th of April 1836, and on the 29th of the same month Newton Headley qualified as executor, giving bond and security as such in the penalty of 30,000 dollars.

Winifred Browning was the wife of Joseph Browning; and he executed the following deed:

"Know all men by these presents, that I Joseph Browning, in consideration of the sum of 1500 dollars to me in hand paid by Willis Browning, have transferred and assigned, and by these presents do transfer and assign unto the said Willis Browning, his executors, administrators or assigns, all the interest to which I am entitled, in right of my wife Winifred Browning, in the estate of William Headley deceased, together with all the benefit and advantage that may be obtained thereby. And I do hereby grant to the said Willis Browning, his executors, administrators or assigns, full power to recover the same for his or their use. As witness my hand and seal this 31st day of May 1836.

Joseph Browning, [Seal.]"

On the day this deed bears date, it was acknowledged before two justices of the peace, and on the 2d of June 1836, it was admitted to record in the office of Warren county court.

Upon the application of Newton Headley executor of William Headley, the court of Warren county, on the 22d of December 1836, appointed commissioners to divide the testator's slaves among his legatees, and make report thereof to the court.

The report of the commissioners bears date the 2d of January 1837. It states that they had made the division, and mentions the part of Winifred Browning as follows: "Lot No. 5, allotted to Winifred Browning; viz. Rachel, Elias, Fanny and Eleanor (12 months old). Receives from lot No. 9, 27 dollars 50 cents."

344 *On the 9th of January 1837, "an act for the benefit of Winifred Browning," which had been passed by the general assembly of the state of Kentucky, was approved by the governor of that state. It declares "that the marriage contract heretofore existing between Joseph Browning and his wife Winifred Browning is forever dissolved, as far as respects said Winifred, who is hereby restored to all the rights and privileges of an unmarried woman, and that she be entitled, out of the estate of the said

Joseph Browning, to receive alimony agreeably to the laws of this commonwealth."

On the 23d of February 1837, the report of the division of the slaves was returned to the court of Warren county, examined by the court, confirmed, and ordered to be recorded, (there being no exceptions thereto).

Soon afterwards, to wit, on the 31st of March 1837, a suit in equity was commenced in the circuit court of Warren by Willis Browning. The bill, after setting forth the will of William Headley, and the legacy thereby given to Winifred Browning, alleges that Joseph Browning the husband of the said Winifred, on the 31st of May 1836, by a deed of that date, "for and in consideration of the sum of 1500 dollars," transferred and assigned to the plaintiff all the interest to which he was entitled, in right of his wife Winifred, in the estate of the said William Headley. It states, that though the testator left no debts that need procrastinate or embarrass the distribution of the estate, the executor refuses to assign to the plaintiff the share of the said state to which he is entitled by virtue of the said assignment from the said Joseph, and that there has been as yet no valid division of the negro property left by the said testator. The bill makes Newton Headley as executor, and also in his own right as legatee, Joseph Browning, Winifred Browning and the other legatees, defendants, and prays for a legal division of the slaves 345 belonging to the *estate, a full distribution of the said estate, and the payment and transfer to the plaintiff of the share to which he is entitled by virtue of the said assignment.

The executor answered, admitting it to be true that the testator died seized and possessed of a considerable estate, real and personal, and stating, that in the spring of 1836, he made sale of the land and perishable estate upon a reasonable credit, and since then there had been a division of the slaves, which he was advised was legal; that the money for the sales had not yet been all collected; but that he had delivered nearly all the shares of the slaves to the parties entitled. Winifred Browning's share of the slaves he admitted was still in his possession. He had refused to deliver it to the plaintiff, he said, for several reasons, which he was advised were good. 1st. He was informed by his sister Winifred, that she had obtained from the legislature of Kentucky, where she resided, an act of divorce; and she had given him formal notice not to pay her portion of her father's estate to the said Joseph, or any one. 2dly. He was advised that before said Joseph Browning or his assignee could recover the property of the said Winifred, the court would compel him to make a settlement upon her of a reasonable portion; and the respondent was gratified that he had it in his power to secure to his unfortunate sister a part at least of the property her father had bequeathed to her; for, he added, her husband had spent all that the testator gave to his daughter during his life, and for some years past had wholly abandoned her. 3dly. He found among the testator's papers a note given by Winifred Browning to her father in 1829, for a sum of money advanced to her by the testator, and he was advised the same should be deducted from her share. The note was filed as an exhibit. It was for 1000 dollars with interest from the 1st of January 1829; but on it were endorsements of credits, stating a balance to be due of 20 dollars 25 cents.

346 *Winifred Browning also put in an answer, which was sworn to before a justice of the peace of Kentucky in July 1837. She said, it was her misfortune to have become the wife of Joseph Browning, but for many years past they had not lived together; that during their residence together, she was doomed to suffer much distress of mind and body, in consequence of the bad temper and habits of her husband; that while they were living in the state of Kentucky, the said Joseph Browning finally abandoned her to the adversities of the world, and returned to Virginia, where they were first married; that he is still in Virginia, and she still lives in Kentucky, and is compelled to struggle alone for the support of herself and family; that being thus abandoned by her husband, she applied to the legislature of Kentucky, and obtained from that body an act of divorce. She says she is informed, with much pain and regret, that her late husband embraced the earliest opportunity after the death of her father, to wrest from her the pittance of property that had been bequeathed to her by her father, and to sell and transfer it to strangers. She is advised that the divorce put an end to his marital rights, and that neither he nor his assignee has any authority to call upon the executor of her father for the legacy bequeathed to her; and she insists that the plaintiff cannot recover it in this suit. In any event, she asks the court not to lend its aid to the plaintiff without first securing to her a suitable portion.

On the part of the plaintiff, depositions were taken (to prove the deed of assignment) of a person acquainted with the handwriting of Joseph Browning, and of the justices before whom the deed was acknowledged.

On behalf of mrs. Browning, the deposition of Newton Headley her codefendant was taken in April 1838. He deposed that Browning and wife moved to Kentucky 10 or 12 years before; that she came to 347 Virginia *in the latter part of 1835 or the first of 1836, and he came in April 1836; that she returned to Kentucky with him in the spring or summer of 1836, soon after which time he left his family and had not since been with them; that he left 6 or 7 children with his wife, and left them in a poor and destitute condition; that he had been idle and extravagant, and treated his family very harshly; that he had received upwards of 2000 dollars of William Headley in money and property, all of which he had squandered before he left his family; and that the witness had advanced Browning and wife 100 dollars, which he thinks was before he heard of the plaintiff's claim.

Browning, though served with process, filed no answer.

The cause came on to be heard before judge Smith the 30th of March 1839. On consideration whereof, the court, for reasons stated in a written opinion, decreed that the bill of the plaintiff be dismissed with costs. The following are extracts from that opinion:

"It appears there had been a bona fide change of residence by Joseph Browning and wife, from Virginia to Kentucky, and such residence in Kentucky had continued for 12 years previous to the act granting the divorce. Under such circumstances, I think it perfectly clear that the legislature of Kentucky had jurisdiction to pass the act in question, and that the divorce is valid. Indeed it is admitted to be so by one of the plaintiff's counsel; and I think it unnecessary to make any farther remark on that subject.

"The question then is as to the exclusive right of Mrs. Browning to the legacy in question, founded on her having survived the coverture; the divorce having placed her claim on precisely the same ground on which it would have stood if Joseph Browning had died on the 9th of January 1837."

348 *(The judge first considered the effect of the order of court appointing commissioners to divide the slaves, and the proceedings thereon, and after coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff could not support his case on the ground of a reduction of the slaves into possession during the coverture, proceeded as follows:)

"We come now to the question whether Mrs. Browning's right, based upon her having survived the coverture, is defeated by the assignment from Joseph Browning to the plaintiff.

"It is contended that the assignment was for a valuable consideration, and made at a time when the husband had the power to reduce the legacy into immediate possession; and the proposition is that such an assignment is equivalent to an actual reduction into possession, and defeats the wife's right of survivorship.

"In the case of M'Mechin v. Heinzman, in the court of Hardy, I had occasion to examine the authorities as to the effect of precisely such an assignment, in relation to the claim of the wife to a settlement; the coverture still existing, and the assignee applying to the court for a decree to enforce the payment of the wife's legacy to him. Upon a careful examination of the authorities, and especially Earl of Salisbury v. Newton, 1 Eden 370; Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417; Like v. Beresford, 3 Ves. 506; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 12; Kenny v. Udall, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 464; Haviland v. Myers, 6 Johns. Ch. R. 27; Haviland v. Bloom, 6 Id. 178. I was entirely satisfied that according to authority, although there were some decisions to the contrary, the wife was clearly entitled to a provision out of the fund. It is admitted in his case that the wife is entitled to a settlement: the only question is as to her right of survivorship, the coverture being dissolved.

"The rule is that the husband is only entitled to such of the wife's choses in action as he may reduce into possession during the coverture.

349 *"In the case of assignments by operation of law, as in the case of bankruptcy, and taking the oath of insolvency, it is well settled that the assignees stand in exactly the same situation, as to the choses in action of the wife, as the husband stood; and therefore in such cases the right of survivorship to the wife exists and must prevail, unless the choses in action be reduced into possession during the coverture, by the husband or his assignee. And the case of M'Mechin v. Heinzman was decided upon the ground that an assignment by the husband for a valuable consideration, although the property was immediately reducible to possession, stood precisely upon the same ground as an assignment by operation of law; that the husband by his assignment could not place the assignee in any other situation in relation to the wife's interest, than he himself occupied. And this principle, as I supposed, was applicable as well to her claim by right of survivorship, as to her equitable claim to a provision out of the fund during the coverture. Upon a reconsideration of the authorities, I am still of opinion that this is correct as a general rule. The only doubt I now have is whether the rule is not subject to some qualification. I had not adverted to any supposed distinction as to the subject matter of the assignment, or the terms in which it is made.

"I find, however, that a distinction has been taken in these cases. Judge Tucker in his commentaries, vol. 1, bk. 1, p. 118, (2nd edition) uses this language: 'But what is the effect of the assignment on the wife's right of survivorship, if the husband dies before the chose in action is reduced into possession? Here it is admitted that assignees of a bankrupt, &c. coming in by act of law, stand only in the husband's shoes, and of course the right survives to the wife, (1 Atk. 280; 1 Brown's Ch. R. 44, 50; 2 Dick. 492; 9 Ves. 87; 10 Ves. 578,)' though there seem to have been some decisions the other way, 350 *1 P. Wms. 458; 3 Ves. 617. And so as to assignments by act of the husband; if of a general nature, the assignee stands in the husband's shoes, and the right survives to the wife. But an assignment of a particular chose in action for valuable consideration, is a complete disposition and reducing into possession.' He refers to Newland on Contracts 136-7.

"Newland, after revising the cases, says, 'It should seem that any assignment by contract by the husband, of the above species of the wife's property,' (chose in action) 'if it be of a general nature, will not, though founded on a valuable consideration, bar the right of survivorship. For such an assignment places the assignee precisely in the same situation in which the husband stood. Upon that principle it was, that the former was obliged to make a provision for the wife out of her property. It appears to follow therefore as a necessary consequence, that such an assignee must also be liable to this right of survivorship. But this right will not prevail against the assignment by the husband, by contract for a valuable consideration, of a particular chose in action of the wife, or of a specific part of her equitable property of that nature. For such an assignment is considered a complete disposition of that property, and is equivalent to reducing it into possession.'

"A particular instance of a distinction between an assignment of a general nature, and of a particular chose in action, is given in the case of Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417. A wife being entitled under the will of her father to the fourth part of his personal estate, her husband made an assignment to his creditor of all the share which in right of his wife he was entitled to in her father's personal estate. Per lord Hardwicke, 'This is not an assignment of a term of years, or a specific thing, but an assignment at once for all her fortune; and if I were to allow this practice to prevail, it would elude the care and caution of this court with respect to 351 infants; *for a husband then would have nothing to do but take up the money of a third person, and though neither he nor the lender knew exactly at the time what the fortune is, yet he may assign it over, and so defeat the care of the court entirely.'

"In the case of Wiseman v. Mason, 1 P. Wms. 459; (Cox's note,) and Pryor v. Hill, 4 Bro. C. C. 139, the assignments were general, and it was held that the wife was entitled to a provision. It is true the question of survivorship did not occur in those cases, the husbands being still in life and the coverture existing: but being on the ground that the assignees were placed in the same situation in which the husbands would have stood, it would follow of course that the right of survivorship still existed.

"If therefore the distinction between a general and particular assignment does exist, and has the effect supposed, then the rule should be limited to cases of a general assignment. But if so, the right of Mrs. Browning would not be affected by the limitation of the rule; for the assignment in this case is general, and almost in the very words of the assignment in the case of Jewson v. Moulson.

"These cases go strongly to sustain the correctness of the rule as to assignments of a general nature. As to the effect of an assignment of a particular chose in action for a valuable consideration, inasmuch as that question does not arise in this case, I shall express no decided opinion upon it. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that in this case the right survives to the wife; and consequently the bill must be dismissed."

Willis Browning, by William Green esquire his counsel, presented a petition to the judges of this court for an appeal; from which petition the following is extracted:

"If it be conceded that the coverture was terminated by the divorce in question 352 as effectually as by death, *according to the judge's opinion, (as to which, however, see Lottey's case, Russ. & Ryan 237; Tovey v. Lindsay, 1 Dow's R. 117; 2 Kent's Comm. 99, 100,) and that the legal consequences of such a determination, in regard to the assignee's rights, are the same as if the husband were dead, (against which, however, a great deal might be said; and see 1 Tucker's Comm. book 1, p. 100,) still it does not follow that the assignee has no right to recover any thing by virtue of the assignment. Yet that is the proposition necessarily involved in the dismissal of the bill, and explicitly avowed by the judge. That the wife would be entitled to what is called her equity, that is, a settlement of some part of the property on her, according to the English authorities is clear; and at present it will not be controverted that she would be entitled to such a settlement in this case; although the supreme tribunal of this commonwealth has hitherto carefully avoided the adoption of those authorities. But still it does not follow that she is entitled, notwithstanding the assignment, to the whole subject in dispute. The judge himself admits, that in the cases upon which he relies, this question did not occur, because the coverture was in them still existing; but he supposes that the principles on which the wife's equity was allowed in those cases, lead to the conclusion that if the husband had been dead, she would have been entitled to the whole by survivorship. With submission, however, it would seem that there is a manifest fallacy in the argument. Numerous authorities shew that the assignee of a particular chose in action will prevail against the wife's right by survivorship; while, on the other hand, as many cases shew that her equity for a settlement will prevail against him. But not to go into a discussion of elementary principles, which would be out of place here, the case of Earl of Salisbury v. Newton, Eden 370, is in effect precisely the same with this case. There, as here, the coverture was terminated:

353 *the assignee brought his bill against the surviving wife and others, to recover the choses in action which had been assigned; and instead of the bill being dismissed, it was decreed that the wife should have a settlement out of the property, and that the balance of it should be paid to the plaintiff. A distinction was thus made between her equity and her right by survivorship, which completely answers the argument of the judge: the one prevailed and the other not, in one and the same case. And in other respects that case is also an authority in point. Whatever may be the distinction between a general and a particular assignment, the thing assigned in the present case was even less general in its character than in that of Earl of Salisbury v. Newton: for there the assignment was of all the wife's interest in her father's estate, which interest she might claim either under a deed or under a will, but not under both; and until accounts were taken, the election to take could not be determined. See also Jewson v. Moulson, cited from MS., 4 Ves. 524; Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 19, 20, and notes. The case of Green v. Otte, 1 Sim. & Stu. 250; 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 125, appears to be a very strong authority against the claim of the wife to the whole, in consequence of the termination of the coverture by the divorce.

"It should be also observed, that there is a distinction between choses in action that accrue to the feme before coverture, and such as accrue afterwards and during the coverture. Over the latter the husband has a greater power of control than over the former. See M'Neilage v. Holloway, 1 Barn. & Ald. 218, and the cases cited in it. And there is the less reason for denying the right of the assignee, when it is considered that the release of the husband alone might have effectually cut off the interest of the wife forever, if such a release had only been made before the divorce took effect. See Bac. Abr. title Release, F. and cases *there cited.

The appeal was allowed; and now the questions arising upon the record were fully argued.

Robinson for appellant. The opinion of the circuit court affirms, that though the assignment was for a valuable consideration, and made at a time when the husband had the power to reduce the legacy to immediate possession, it cannot place the assignee in any better condition than the husband would himself have occupied if there had been no assignment. This proposition, though plausible, is not sound. The law has been settled otherwise for more than a hundred years. The leading case is Lord Carteret v. Paschal, decided as early as 1734, and reported in 3 P. Wms. 197, and 2 Brown's Par. Cas. 10, (Tomlin's edi.) which has been followed by Bates v. Dandy, reported in 2 Atk. 207, and noted also in 1 Russ. 33,—by the Earl of Salisbury v. Newton, 1 Eden 373, and Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 12. There is a class of cases which may be relied upon on the other side, to wit, Hornsby v. Lee, 2 Madd. C. R. 16, american edi. 352, and Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1. These are cases of a reversionary interest, in which, at the time of the assignment, there was an incapacity to make an actual reduction into possession. We are told that when Hornsby v. Lee was decided, it was not acquiesced in, and was denied to be law. Clancy on Married Women 148; 1 Roper on Property 146. Sir Thomas Plumer, after reexamination in Purdew v. Jackson, decided as before, against the assignee of the reversionary interest. But it has never yet been decided that a bona fide assignment for valuable consideration, made by a husband to a third person, of a debt actually and presently due to the wife, does not divest in equity the title of the wife. This is the language of 355 *mr. justice Story on Cassell v. Carroll, 11 Wheat 152. Sir Thomas Plumer himself, in adverting to the decisions as to the effect of an assignment of a present interest, while he says, "If it were now a new point, it would be difficult to understand how the assignee could be in a better situation than the husband himself," admits that "it is too late to consider this;" for, says he, "it is decided that an assignment for valuable consideration, being a disposition of the property, is sufficient to bar the right of the wife surviving." Johnson v. Johnson, 1 Jac. & Walk. 456. So the law is understood to be in England, by the writers who treat of the subject. 1 Roper 222; Clancy 121, 149. Purdew v. Jackson was decided after mr. Roper's work was published. In this case also sir Thomas Plumer recognizes the distinction between the assignment of a present right, which he says may be regarded as a kind of constructive possession, and the assignment of a chose in action not then capable of being reduced into possession, which cannot be construed as a reduction of the thing into possession. 1 Russ. 45, 59, 60. Whatever may have been considered the law in Virginia as to the husband's power to sell his wife's reversionary interests,* there does not seem to have been any question as to his power to make an effectual sale or assignment of her present interests. Taliaferro &c. v. Taliaferro &c., 4 Call 93; Wallace & ux. v. Taliaferro & ux., 2 Call 447; Upshaw v. Upshaw &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 389; 1 Tuck. Comm. 116. Chancellor Kent has examined the subject in Shuyler v. Hoyle, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 207, 210, and come to the conclusion that the husband may assign for a valuable consideration, and that the wife has

356 no right *by survivorship. There is, it is true, a material distinction between the case of assignees of a bankrupt or insolvent husband, taking his whole estate without reference particularly to the property of the wife, and the case of an assignment by the husband having reference particularly to the property of the wife, and being of that property as distinguished from his. The last is a constructive reduction into possession; the former cannot be so considered. In the present case the assignment not only refers particularly to the wife's property, but is of a specific portion of that property. It is a particular assignment, like those in Carteret v. Paschal, Bates v. Dandy, Earl of Salisbury v. Newton, and Wright v. Morley.

*In this case it was not necessary for the counsel of the appellant to bring in question the decisions in Hornsby v. Lee, Purdew v. Jackson, and Honner v. Morton. In the case of Siter and another, guardians of Jordan, 4 Rawle 471-483, they are reviewed in an elaborate opinion by Gibson, C. J., and the opinion expressed by him is opposed to them.—Note in Original Edition.

So far, the case has been considered upon the supposition that, by the divorce, the claim was placed on the same ground as if Joseph Browning had then died; and it has been shewn that even in that case the assignee for valuable consideration would have been entitled to the subject assigned, and not the wife who survived. But is it clear that the divorce has the effect ascribed to it? The contract of marriage was made in Virginia: could it be dissolved by an act of Kentucky? If it could, on what ground could it be done? Is it that the parties had become domiciled in Kentucky? Can that ground be taken consistently with the reason assigned for the divorce, which is, that the husband had abandoned his wife, left the state, and gone to Virginia? The court will find the questions growing out of this state of facts to be full of difficulty. Story's Conflict of Laws, ch. 7, p. 168; 2 Kent's Comm. p. 106. They will find it doubtful, at least, whether it was competent to the legislature of Kentucky to pass any law affecting the rights of the husband, whose domicil was changed before the act passed. And accordingly the legislature of Kentucky seem to have desired not to exercise the jurisdiction as it

357 respected him. The peculiar phraseology *of the act seems to indicate this. To understand this act, it will be proper to examine the provisions of the general act of Kentucky regulating divorces in that state; Statute Law of Kentucky, vol. 1, p. 122. Here there was no such case as authorized the circuit courts to decree a divorce under that act: there was no abandonment for two years, nor was the treatment such as to endanger the wife's life. Hence the wife applied to the legislature. When they interfered, it is not reasonable to suppose that they intended to grant a divorce of a stronger character than would have been granted by the courts, had they acted. And the divorce granted by the courts does not appear to be an absolute divorce a vinculo matrimonii. Moreover, this particular act of divorce declares her entitled, of the estate of Browning, to receive alimony agreeably to the laws of the commonwealth. What those laws are, will be found in the 1st volume of the statute law, p. 121. The decree for alimony seems there not to follow, but to precede a divorce a vinculo matrimonii; p. 122, § 3. And this accords with the general principle, which is to allow alimony in case of a divorce a mensa et thoro, 1 Black. Comm. 441, 2; 1 Tuck. Comm. 98, but not in the case of a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. The doctrine of the liability of a husband to alimony rests on the presumption of law, that by marriage the property of the wife vests in the husband, and that she is possessed of no property of her own. Poynter on Marriage and Divorce, p. 259, 60. It does not apply to a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, where the wife receives again such of the personal property which she had at the time of the marriage, as may not have been disposed of by the husband. 1 Tuck. Comm. 98. This then ought not to be regarded as a divorce a vinculo matrimonii; and if not so regarded, there is no foundation for the proposition that the choses in action, not reduced to possession before the divorce, are afterwards the property of the 358 *wife in like manner as if the husband had then died. For the divorce, to produce this consequence, must be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. 1 Tuck. Comm. 978, "If a husband and wife are divorced a mensa et thoro, and a legacy is left to her, the husband may release it." Bac. Abr. title Release, F. vol. 6, of Lond. edi. of 1832, p. 624. The decision in Green v. Otte, 1 Sim. & Stu. 250; 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 125, is a direct adjudication in favour of the validity of an assignment even of a reversionary interest, where the tenant for life died before the divorce took place.

[Stanard, J. Supposing the assignment to be held valid, will there not be a resulting question as to the right of the wife to a provision?] Though the court should think the english doctrine on that subject ought to prevail here, it would not prevent a reversal of the decree; the effect would merely be to send back the cause for an enquiry to ascertain what would be a reasonable provision.

Patton for appellees. It is not enough that there is a deed of assignment. The whole argument that the assignee stands in a better condition than the assignor, rests upon the ground that the assignment is for valuable consideration. And there is no proof of the fact that the assignment was for value, but ground to suspect it was a mere contrivance. Great care has been taken to adduce witnesses to prove the execution of the deed, and not a word is asked as to its consideration. The deed itself is no proof of consideration as against the wife. Wilcox v. Pearman, 9 Leigh 144.

Upon the question as to the authority of Kentucky to grant a divorce, it is sufficient to refer to Story's Conflict of Laws, p. 189-92, § 228, 229, 230. The court will see that in Scotland, Massachusetts and New York, it is held that the authority of that state in which the parties have been domiciled may grant a divorce to one 359 *party, no matter where the other is residing at the time. But it is argued, the divorce here is not a vinculo matrimonii. The marriage contract being forever dissolved as respects the feme, and she being restored to all the rights and privileges of an unmarried woman, the divorce must be a vinculo matrimonii as it regards her. Nor can the effect of this language be restrained or impaired by the clause allowing her alimony. In the general act of Kentucky regulating divorces, there is authority to make provision for the wife out of the husband's estate; and this clause may fairly mean that such provision may be made for her. Neither should the construction of this act be affected by the use of the term alimony; for even though it be used elsewhere in reference to divorces a mensa et thoro, the legislature of Kentucky may use it in a way in which it has not been used before. Under the general act of Kentucky, the divorce is a complete divorce a vinculo matrimonii, except only that the other party cannot marry. Suppose Mrs. Browning had died after the act of divorce, would Joseph Browning have had a right to administer on her estate? Surely not. It is equally plain that from the time of that act he was absolved from all obligation to pay her debts. 1 Tucker's Comm. 98. She was also deprived of the right of dower or distribution in his estate. These propositions being unquestionable, does it not follow that the act of divorce is even more effectual than death would have been? Choses in action of the wife, not reduced into possession during the coverture, remain her property on the dissolution of the marriage. 1 Tuck. Comm. 100; Legg v. Legg, 8 Mass. R. 99; Lodge v. Hamilton, 2 Serg. & Rawle 491. And this principle applies in all cases of divorce a vinculo matrimonii, no matter what the ground of divorce. In this case, when the assignment was made, the husband had abandoned his wife. And there is no reason for restricting her to merely an equitable 360 provision. She should be held entitled after such abandonment and such divorce, even if the assignee would have been entitled after the husband's death.

But would the assignee have been entitled against the wife surviving? In the argument of Purdew v. Jackson, sir Thomas Plumer propounded this question to the counsel: "Is there any case in which, the husband having assigned the wife's present chose in action, and having died before the assignee obtained possession of it, the assignee prevailed over the surviving wife?" and he added, "Suppose that in such a case the assignee were to claim the chose in action, in whose name would he make the claim, and in what form would he bring the action?" To this question counsel upon both sides answered, "We believe that such a case has not occurred." 1 Russ. 19, 20. Here then was a call upon counsel for a case establishing the very proposition now contended for, and the distinguished counsel in that case (Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Sugden) admitted that no such case could be produced: yet now we are told that that proposition has been long established, and several cases are cited to shew it. Do they shew any such thing? Dicta undoubtedly there are in abundance; but are there any well considered decisions upon the point? If Lord Carteret v. Paschal is an authority upon this question, it proves too much; for there the surplus was taken away, as to which the assignment was only voluntary. But the real import of the decision is, that it was a case of an equitable extent; that the husband and wife were in possession. It was like the case of a term of years, which stands upon different ground from ordinary choses in action of the wife. And so as to Bates v. Dandy: that was a case of mortgages, one of which was of a term; between an assignment of which, and of choses in action generally, there is a distinction. The term stands upon the footing of personal chattels reduced into possession during 361 the coverture. There was, besides, an agreement in Bates v. Dandy that the husband should have an interest in the subject. Something, it is true, is said about the husband's right to assign his wife's chose in action as well as her term, so that it be for valuable consideration; but what is said as to this matter is evidently a loose and ill considered opinion. In a note in 1 Russ. 20, in relation to the question propounded by sir Thomas Plumer, the reporter does not cite either of those as cases meeting the question; the only case which he mentions is Earl of Salisbury v. Newton. This case is briefly reported, appears to have been but little considered, and the decision in it does not well accord with the first part of the opinion. The other English case relied upon on the other side (Wright v. Morley) was the case of an assignment sought to be enforced during the life of the husband. The husband during his lifetime had a right to recover the property against the wife. It is impossible, then, to regard the law as settled by the English cases. When sir Thomas Plumer said in Johnson v. Johnson, that the question was decided, he had not then examined it with the care which he afterwards bestowed upon it in Purdew v. Jackson. In this last case he shews, by an examination of all the authorities, that there had been no such decision; and shews also that in his opinion there was no difference between the assignment of a present and of a reversionary interest. There is certainly no decision on the question in Virginia. This court is now to settle the law in reference to the matter; and it should make such a decision as may be consistent with what has been decided. The general rule is, that the husband is entitled to his wife's choses in action, provided he reduces them into possession during the coverture: in regard to all not reduced into possession, the right of the wife is the same as if she had not been married. And Purdew v. Jackson may properly be referred to for a principle 362 equally applicable to a present as to a reversionary interest; it is, that the assignee can have no better right than the assignor. If this be so, and the whole right of the husband be a right to reduce into possession during the coverture, how can the assignee acquire any thing more than a right to reduce into possession, if he can, during that time? It is said in some of the cases, or some of the books, that the husband may release, and therefore he may assign; that he may destroy, and therefore he may preserve. But the ground of the husband's right to release is, that he has the right to receive. Between the right to release and the right to assign, there is a want of analogy in several respects. In the former case there is no equitable right to a provision: in the latter there is. The husband could not assign a possibility, but he might release it. Gage v. Acton, 1 Salk 327. If he may release a possibility but not assign it, why may he not release a right not reduced into possession, and yet not be able to make an effectual assignment of it? It is impossible, by any sound and consistent reasoning, to arrive at the conclusion that the right to release gives the right to assign. If it does, why does it not give the right to assign without value, as well as with value? why does it not confer a right upon a general, as well as upon a special assignee? The release being the exercise of a legal right, there can be no doubt that it will operate at law, and extinguish the right, whether with or without consideration. But the assignment confers no legal right; it can only be enforced in equity. And when attempted to be enforced in equity, it is a mere equity against an equity with better legal right. There is something plausible in the idea that the assignment of the wife's property is a constructive possession, or the commencement of a taking possession. But the answer is, that a commencement is not enough. There is no right unless the husband does reduce into possession. He may commence a suit, 363 but if he dies before obtaining a decree, *the commencement of the suit will add nothing to his rights. Moreover, if the assignment were equivalent to a reduction into possession, the wife would have no right against the assignee to an equitable provision: but this right she unquestionably has. The case of Earl of Salisbury v. Newton not only shews its existence, but shews that it exists as well against a particular as against a general assignee. If the right to a provision exists against the former as well as the latter, why shall there be a distinction between the two in regard to the wife's right by survivorship? In concluding upon this question, the attention of the court is called to Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 87, which contains a valuable review of the authorities; to the early cases of Burnett v. Kinaston, Prec. in Ch. 119, 121; S. C. 2 Vern. 401; S. C. Freeman's Ch. Cas. 240; Packer v. Windham, Prec. in Ch. 412; Becket v. Becket, 1 Dick 340, and to Ward on Legacies, p. 280, which is against the proposition contended for on the other side.

There is, however, no necessity for the court to decide the question in this case, which is different in circumstances and different in principle from the cases in which it must ordinarily arise. If there be any foundation for the doctrine contended for as to the validity of a particular assignment, it is that the wife has got the benefit of the consideration. And here that reason cannot apply, because the wife had been abandoned before the assignment was made. But 2dly, if the rule be established, there can no doubt that it is limited to the case of the assignee of a particular subject. Where the assignment is a general assignment of the wife's interests, (which is the character of the assignment here) the assignee takes subject to her right by survivorship, as well as her equity. Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417; Pryor v. Hill, 4 Brown's C. R. 139; Macaulay v. Phillips, 4 Ves. 19; Newland on Contracts 136; 2 Tuck. Com. 115, 16.

364 In Jewson v. Moulson it was *argued that the assignment was special, and that the special assignee was not subject to the wife's equity; but the assignment was held to be a general assignment. The case of Earl of Salisbury v. Newton is open to the remark, that the wife had in fact no interest except the particular subject which was in controversy there. And 3dly, the decree was right in dismissing the bill, because, in any aspect, the wife is entitled to a provision, and the whole value of the subject assigned would be an inadequate provision for her. No person can doubt that her interest in her father's property was her whole estate. There is no proof, it is true, of the value of this interest, except the consideration expressed in the deed of assignment. But the other side must admit the assignment to have been for adequate consideration. Suppose, however, that the interest, instead of being only of the value of 1500 dollars, was worth 3000 dollars; would a provision to that amount be more than adequate for her? The following cases relate to this subject: in some of them, the court will find it to have been decided that the wife should have the whole property. Ex parte Coysegame, 1 Atk. 192; Like v. Beresford, 3 Ves. 506; Elliott v. Cordell & others, 5 Madd. C. R. 96, American ed. 150; Kenny v. Udall & Co., 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 464; Udall v. Kenny, 3 Cowen 590; Haviland v. Bloom & Co., 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 178; Smith and others v. Kane and wife, 2 Paige 303; Van Epps and wife v. Van Deusen, 4 Paige 64.

Robinson in reply. The bill alleges that the assignment was in consideration of the sum of 1500 dollars; the answers do not controvert the fact of consideration; and the deed of assignment purports on its face to be in consideration of 1500 dollars in hand paid. The case is in principle like that of Scott & wife & Co. v. Gibbon & Co. & Co., 5 Mynf. 86. It is needless to en-proof of it, the onus would have been on the assignee: it is enough that there has been no such denial or call for proof. In the absence of it, the deed is prima facie evidence of the allegation in the bill. The cause, moreover, has been proceeded in to a hearing upon the supposition that there was consideration, and the decision of the circuit court is on this supposition.

365 quire whether, if the answers had denied the consideration and *called for

It is argued that the act of Kentucky is such a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, as entitles the wife to her personal estate not previously reduced into possession by the husband. Can it be regarded as importing this, when it entitles the wife to receive alimony? It is supposed that § 7, p. 123, (of 1 Statute Laws of Kentucky) may have been in the view of the lawmakers; a section giving power to divide the estate. But that can scarcely have been the meaning of the legislature; for that power is confined to the court which pronounces the decree of divorce. It is supposed, also, that the legislature has used the word in a sense different from that in which it is ordinarily used. But when they use it in this act, we must suppose it is in the sense in which it is used by them in other acts. And when we look to those other acts, we find no instance of alimony after a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. It is asked whether, if Mrs. Browning had died after the act of divorce, Joseph Browning would have had a right to administer? This is but another form of stating the proposition. If there were no valid divorce a vinculo matrimonii, the case of Elliott &c. v. Gurr, 2 Phil. 16; 1 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 166, shews that a decree of divorce which was invalid would not prevent his administering. And a decree though valid, which was not a complete divorce a vinculo matrimonii, would be attended with the same consequence. So also the husband's obligation to pay the debts of the wife, and her right to alimony in his lifetime or to dower or distribution afterwards, depend on the same considerations. The court should hesitate to

366 place an interpretation *upon the act which would deprive her of these rights, when there is ground to doubt whether such interpretation will be in accordance with the intention of the legislature. Though the ill treatment of the wife properly entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro only, still the legislature of Kentucky might allow her to marry again in Kentucky if they pleased, and such may have been their intention. But will it follow that there is such a divorce a vinculo matrimonii as is necessary here? It is laid down in 2 Burn's Eccl. Law 503, that divers acts of parliament for the divorce of particular persons in the case of adultery have allowed a liberty to the innocent person of marrying again. But on the same page of Burn (or rather 502 d.) it is laid down, that as to the having again the goods she brought, or so much as is not spent, that in the law books is meant only of divorce a vinculo, or where there was a nullity of marriage. No one supposes that this act of Kentucky ascertains that there was really no valid marriage; that it was null ab initio; that the children of the marriage are bastards. And such an interpretation should be placed upon the act as will avoid these consequences.

But suppose the feme here entitled to all that the most complete divorce a vinculo matrimonii can give; what then are her rights? As to the idea that they are any greater against the assignee than would result from a dissolution by death, it will suffice to say that there is not the least foundation for it.

What then would be the feme's rights if the husband had died at the time of the act of divorce? If all that has been said on this subject were mere dicta, yet such and so many dicta, regarded as law for 100 years both in England and this country, and hitherto acted upon as such, would present reasons of the most cogent character against establishing a different doctrine now. But is there nothing but dicta?

367 It is conceded that *there is one decision, the case of Earl of Salisbury v. Newton; but that case, it is said, was but little considered. If the question was but little considered in that case, it was because there was no occasion to consider it,—because it had been most maturely considered and definitively adjudged in the two previous cases of Lord Carteret v. Paschal and Bates v. Dandy; In 3 Russ. 70, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 301, the court will find at large Lord Hardwicke's opinion in Bates v. Dandy, which shews that in Lord Carteret v. Paschal, as well as in Bates v. Dandy, the precise point which we are now arguing was distinctly made, the very authorities of Burnett v. Kinaston and Packer v. Windham, which Mr. Patton now cites, were then cited and examined, and the point was distinctly adjudged in direct opposition to what he is now contending for. It is then an assumption to say that the whole right of the assignee of a husband to the wife's personalty, is to such personalty as may have been reduced into actual possession during the coverture. The same authority which might establish, as a general proposition, that the surviving wife had a right to whatever had not been reduced into actual possession during the coverture, might equally establish, as a modification of that proposition, that the right of the wife was gone where the husband had made an assignment for value. The law is the authority which has established the former as well as the latter. And this law has been adjudged, promulgated and acted upon for more than 100 years. No matter what may be the reason of the rule; whether it be founded upon the idea that the husband might release and therefore may assign; or upon the idea that the assignment is the commencement of a reduction into possession; or upon the idea that the assignment imports an agreement to reduce into possession, and equity considers that as done which ought to be done; either way, it is enough

368 that the rule is *established. It cannot be material now to notice particularly the authorities cited on the other side; the cases of Burnett v. Kinaston and Packer v. Windham, examined by lord Hardwicke 100 years ago, and found inapplicable; the case of Becket v. Becket, which was not an assignment for valuable consideration, but merely for love and affection; and the case of Purdew v. Jackson, a case of assignment of a reversionary interest, decided by sir Thomas Plumer, who considers it too late to question now the right of the assignee of a present interest for value. It is said, he made this remark before he examined the subject in Purdew v. Jackson. But he had before examined it in Hornsby v. Lee. And even in Purdew v. Jackson he admits that an assignment of a present interest may be regarded as the commencement of a reduction into possession. But since Purdew v. Jackson was decided, and with all the lights afforded by that case, a higher authority than sir Thomas Plumer, the lord chancellor himself (lord Lyndhurst), while affirming the doctrine of Purdew v. Jackson, has declared the law to be settled as it regards the assignment of a present interest. Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 298.

Upon the question whether this is such an assignment of the wife's property as entitles the assignee against the wife when claiming by survivorship, nothing need be added to the cases already cited, some of which were more general than this.

The english cases as to the wife's equity against the assignee to a provision will be found collected in 1 Roper 266. The doctrine has never yet been established in Virginia. Gregory's adm'r v. Marks's adm'r, 1 Rand. 372, 385; 1 Tucker's Comm. 114. And the court must consider whether it ought to be. But that doctrine, if established, will not sustain the decree dismissing the bill. As before remarked, all

369 that could be done would be to direct an enquiry to ascertain *what would be a suitable provision. Reliance is placed on a remark of chancellor Kent in Haviland v. Myers, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 25, that the equity might be extended, if circumstances should require it, to the whole of the estate. But did chancellor Kent so extend it without any enquiry? Not at all. All that he did was to overrule the motion to dissolve the injunction, and let the cause proceed. We do not know whether the wife may not have other property of her own. To the extent of that, regard is always had. Lady Elibank v. Montolieu, 5 Ves. 744; Green v. Otte, 1 Sim. & Stu. 250; 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 125. Neither are we informed as to the value of the interest assigned. There may have been a considerable estate besides slaves; and the will and the executor's answer shew that in fact there was. To give the assignee title, it is enough that he is an assignee for valuable consideration: we have no question in the pleadings, or in the cause, as to the sufficiency of the consideration. The interest assigned may be of much greater value than 1500 dollars, double, treble, or quadruple; yet the court must hold the assignment valid. The court can with no propriety determine, upon the case as it stands, what would be a suitable provision: with still less propriety would it determine that a suitable portion of the property is the whole. [Baldwin, J. Does not the fact of the husband's abandoning his wife make a difference? Must she then be restricted merely to a portion?] It was argued by mr. Patton that the wife here should have the whole, because the husband had abandoned her. But that circumstance does not change the principle, which is simply that the wife shall have a reasonable provision out of the subject. The very terms of the rule indicate that she is only to have part of the subject. In Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 12, as well as in this case, the husband had abandoned his wife, and the whole fund there was 260 pounds 370 a year; yet it was *said that the assignee would deal fairly towards the wife, if, out of the 260 pounds, he allowed her 100 pounds.

ALLEN, J. This case has been argued with great learning and ability; but time has not been afforded during the term to go into a review of all the authorities, or to discuss all the questions commented upon in the argument. I shall therefore content myself with a statement of the result to which an examination of the authorities and of the facts of this case has conducted me. The doctrine as to the main question involved, the right acquired by an assignee of the husband in the wife's choses in action, has been most ably commented on in the cases of Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1, and Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 298, and in a note to the latter is found an accurate report of the opinion of lord Hardwicke in Bates v. Dandy. The rule established in Bates v. Dandy, and recognized in both the cases cited after a full review of all the authorities, furnishes the law of this forum, from which it seems to me we have no right to depart. That rule is, that the husband has no power to give effect to a conveyance of property of this description, unless circumstances so turn out as to put him in a situation which would have enabled him to reduce the chose in action into possession. If at the time of the assignment he is in a condition to reduce the chose into possession, the assignment operates immediately: if he is afterwards in a condition to reduce it into possession, the assignment will then have full effect: but if he dies before the event happens on which it may be reduced into possession, the assignment becomes altogether inoperative.

The assignment, to deprive the wife of her right by survivorship, must be for a valuable consideration, and must also be special. A general assignment of the husband's estate for the benefit of cred-

371 itors, an assignment *in bankruptcy, or an assignment under the insolvent laws, would not defeat the wife's right to take by survivorship a present interest, capable of being reduced into possession, but not actually so reduced during the coverture.

Treating the divorce, in the case under consideration, as a civil death, I consider the interest of the wife in her father's estate, at the time of the assignment, as a present interest susceptible of being reduced into possession; that the assignment was a special assignment for value; and therefore that she could not take by survivorship.

I am also of opinion, that by the well settled doctrines of the english chancery court, the wife is entitled to an adequate settlement out of her estate, whenever the aid of the court of equity is invoked by the husband to get possession of such estate, if there has been no previous adequate provision made for her: that the assignee, though the assignment be special, occupies in this respect the same position with the husband: that his doctrine of the chancery court was well established and fully acted on, when courts of equity were first organized in this state: and that the chancery courts here are as much bound by this principle of equity, as by any other principle of equitable jurisprudence (not inconsistent with our institutions) which has not been modified or abrogated by express enactment. In this case the claim was asserted in the answer; and there is nothing in the record which shews that the wife was not entitled to a settlement.

I am further of opinion, that upon a view of all the circumstances, the residue coming from her father's estate would not be more than an adequate provision for her; and that further enquiry was unnecessary. It is proved that the husband had squandered the advances made to him by the wife's father; that he had abandoned 372 *her with a family of small children dependent on her for support; and that in consequence of his misconduct she had obtained a divorce. The extent of the interest in her father's estate can only be inferred by reference to the consideration named in the deed of assignment. Taking the consideration expressed as the criterion of value, the amount would be but a small provision for a wife so situated. And it is not for the assignee to object that the consideration was grossly inadequate; for in so doing, he would shew that the assignment was not made in good faith. The claim was made by the answer, proof was taken to sustain it, and the plaintiff failed to produce any evidence tending to prove that the whole would be more than an adequate provision.

The claim of the wife derives additional strength from her divorce, which deprives her of all claim on the husband hereafter: and as, in consequence of the divorce, she will be entitled to hold as a feme sole, it seems to me that the court did right in dismissing the bill.

BALDWIN, J. I have not formed, and am not to be understood as expressing, any opinion upon the question whether the assignee from the husband, for valuable consideration, of a chose in action of the wife not reduced into possession during the coverture, has a valid title against the wife surviving. Upon a view of all the circumstances of this case, I concur in the opinion that the decree should be affirmed.

STANARD, J. I concur in the opinion of judge Allen, that the effect of the act of divorce upon the rights of the wife is to place her in the same situation as if her husband had then died; and that the assignee from the husband, for valuable 373 consideration, of a present (as *distinguished from a reversionary) interest of the wife, has a valid title against the wife though she survives her husband. I also concur in affirming the decree.

Note by the reporter. A review of the cases brought sir Thomas Plumer and chancellor Kent to very different conclusions in regard to the extent to which provision might be made for the wife. In Beresford &c. v. Hobson &c., 1 Madd. C. R. p. 301 of eng. ed. and p. 199 of american ed. the former concluded his opinion as follows: "In no case has the court given the whole to the wife. The question in most of the cases has been, how much the wife shall have; and in determining that, the court has exercised a discretion and has not tied itself down to any precise rule, but has never given the whole." This case is referred to by chancellor Kent in the opinion which he gave in Kenny v. Udall, (afterwards affirmed in Haviland v. Bloom, 6 Johns. C. R. 180, 81.) that the wife's equity, "If the case be deemed to require it, may be extended to the whole of the real and personal estate devised or descended." The matter about which this difference of opinion existed, it will be perceived, was not particularly discussed by the counsel for the appellant in the present case, it being in his view premature for the court to pass upon it before a reference to a commissioner. In dispensing with such reference, the court has departed from what has been heretofore deemed the regular course; and the reporter thinks he does not go too far, when he ventures to suggest that the precedent furnished by this case for such departure ought to be very cautiously followed. For, upon a reference, facts may appear which are calculated to affect and ought materially to affect the judgment of the court. Suppose, for example, the court in the present case had directed a reference, and upon the report of a commissioner it had appeared "that Joseph Browning and his wife remained divorced only until this case was decided in the court below," and that "immediately afterwards they were reunited in the holy state of matrimony, and have ever since been living together as man and wife;" can it be doubted that the result of the case would have been very different from that which has taken place? It may be said that this is supposing an extreme case, which is not likely to occur. But the reporter is informed by William Green esquire, that the supposition is only of that which actually occurred in this case.

Findlay v. Toncray.

August, 1843, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Elegit—Lien of—Land Conveyed in Trust—General Warranty*—Right of Elegit Creditor against Purchaser under Deed.—Under a deed of trust conveying land with general warranty to secure debts, the land is sold for more than enough to pay those debts. The purchaser institutes a proceeding against the grantor for unlawful detainer, and obtains a judgment against him. And then the purchaser insists, 1. that he was not bound to pay his purchase money (and therefore cannot be charged with interest on the same) until he obtained possession; and 2. that he may retain part of the surplus of purchase money to pay the costs recovered by the judgment on his complaint for unlawful detainer. The claims of the purchaser are objected to by a creditor of the grantor, who obtained a decree against him after the deed of trust, and sued out an elegit within the year. HELD (per totam curiam) the claims so made by the purchaser cannot be allowed.—The purchaser further claims to apply other parts of the surplus to extinguish a dower right in the property existing at the time of the warranty, and to pay taxes

Covenant of Warranty—How Treated.—The principal case is cited in Marbury v. Thornton, 82 Va. 705, 1 S. E. Rep. 909, to the point that a covenant of warranty can never be treated as a covenant against mere incumbrances. See monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167.

Covenant of Title—When Action Lies—Actual Eviction.—The principal case is cited in Jones v. Richmond, 88 Va. 234, 13 S. E. Rep. 414, for the proposition that a covenant of title is supposed to be in fact and in essence substantially the same as a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and it is believed that no action lies upon it until actual eviction, or at least disturbance of the possession.

Same—Same—Same—Principal Case Disapproved.—But in Sheffey v. Gardiner, 79 Va. 315, the court said: "There are, undoubtedly, authorities which hold that there can be no breach of warranty of title, or warranty for quiet enjoyment, and there seems to be no difference between these warranties upon this point, until there has been an actual eviction, and this view has received some slight support from the dicta of certain of the judges in this state. Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Gratt. 353; Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 374. But such is clearly not now the accepted doctrine, nor is it supported by the weight of reason or authority, as a brief reference to a few of the many cases, elsewhere decided, in which this subject has come under review, will show."

Purchaser at Public Sale—Title—Special Warranty—Caveat Emptor.—A purchaser at a public sale of land, made by a trustee, must look to the title of the grantor of the land; and he is entitled only to a deed with special warranty of title. To such a sale the principle of caveat emptor applies. Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 162, citing Petermans v. Laws, 6 Leigh 529; Saunders v. Pate, 4 Rand. 8; Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 237; Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 374; Rawles on Covenants, p. 418; Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 117.

assessed on the property before the sale was made. HELD by two judges (dissentienté STANDARD, J.) these claims also must be disallowed.

Case Approved.—The case of Foreman v. Loyd and others, 2 Leigh 284, recognized as a binding authority.

Rufus Soule executed deeds of trust on certain houses and lots in the town of Abingdon, to secure particular debts specified in those deeds. Afterwards a decree and various judgments were rendered against him. The decree was obtained by Lewis Toncray the 15th of October 1836, and upon it an elegit issued the 13th of June 1837, upon which the sheriff made the following return: "The defendant has no real estate but what is so encumbered by deeds of trust that it could not be extended, and no personal estate liable to this writ." The judgments were rendered some before and some after the decree. Upon all 375 the judgments writs *of capias ad satisfaciendum issued, which were levied on the body of the defendant. Some of them were levied before the decree and some after it; but in no case was the oath of insolvency taken until after the decree. Upon the levy of each the defendant obtained the benefit of the prison bounds; and he remained a prisoner in execution until the 31st of July 1837, when he was discharged as an insolvent debtor.

In January 1838, Toncray exhibited a bill in the circuit court of Washington, setting forth, that the houses and lots conveyed by the deeds of trust were sold in May 1837, and purchased by Alexander Findlay, the trustee in one of the deeds, for 3125 dollars. That the creditors of Soule disputing the validity of the sale, the property was again advertised, and a second sale made in September 1837, when Findlay purchased it for a less sum; but he Findlay admitted that he was bound to make good the first sum. That the debts secured by the deeds of trust, together with the expenses of sale, amounted only to 2964 dollars 65 cents, and the surplus of 160 dollars 35 cents was paid over by Findlay to Jacob Lynch, one of the trustees. That Findlay afterwards drew from Lynch 93 dollars 36 cents, that he might retain 4 dollars 60 cents, part thereof, for the town tax upon the property for 1837, which was charged by the town to Findlay, and might retain another part for a sum paid by him to extinguish the dower claim of Sarah Graham in said property, and the residue thereof as the amount of a judgment he had obtained against Soule, upon a warrant of forcible entry to recover possession of the property. That 66 dollars 99 cents yet remained in the hands of Lynch. The complainant insisted that the lien created by his decree upon the property was superior to that of any of the judgment creditors, and that he had a right to the 160 dollars 35 cents. The complainant farther 376 stated, that in paying over the money, Findlay retained *the interest for 6 months, amounting to 61 dollars 99 cents, which the complainant believed he had no right to retain. Findlay, Lynch and the judgment creditors were made defendants.

John D. Mitchell was allowed to answer with Findlay. Their answer stated, that Soule had conveyed to the trustees in the several trusts under which these respondents purchased, with general warranty, and that all which had been retained by them had been retained as upon contracts running with the land. Upon this ground, they claimed to retain 75 dollars paid Mrs. Graham for her dower; the taxes charged on the lots for 1837; the costs of the proceeding, made necessary by Soule's own act, to oust his possession, and interest on the amount of the several debts paid, from the day of payment till the date at which possession of the property was rendered. With their answer they exhibited a statement, whereby it appeared that if interest were charged on all the debts to the 25th of September 1837 (the time of obtaining possession), and the other deductions made as contended for by them, a balance would be due them of 34 dollars 97 cents. They insisted that whatever they might retain against Soule, they might also retain against the complainant, especially as Soule was insolvent.

The other defendants, though served with process or proceeded against by publication, did not answer.

The cause came on to be heard the 11th of October 1839. On consideration whereof, the circuit court was of opinion that the decree of the 15th of October 1836 constituted a lien in favour of the complainant, subject only to prior liens; that the sale of May 1837 being the one under which Findlay claimed, his claim for interest to September 1837 on the purchase money paid was unfounded; that he had no claim valid against the complainant for the costs of the warrant on the complaint for unlawful detainer; and that as, at the sale, 377 *he purchased only Soule's right to the property, his subsequent purchase of the dower of Sarah Graham gave him no claim to retain any portion of the purchase money. It appearing that after disallowing these claims, there was a surplus in the hands of Findlay of 116 dollars 75 cents, and in the hands of Lynch of 66 dollars 99 cents, the court decreed in favour of the complainant against them respectively for the same, and decreed that Findlay pay the complainant's costs, with the exception of the cost of serving the process and printing the order of publication as to the other defendants.

On the petition of Findlay an appeal was allowed.

The cause was submitted (without argument) by B. R. Johnston for the appellant, and M'Comas for the appellee Toncray. And as the record contained no copies of the deeds of trust, decree and judgments mentioned in the bill and answer, they agreed that the same were correctly set forth therein, and were to have the same effect as if copied at large.

BALDWIN, J. I think there is no reason to doubt that the plaintiff's decree in October 1836 was a lien upon the debtor Soule's equity of redemption under his deed of trust; for though the equity of redemption could not be sold under a fi. fa. and was not extendible, yet the decree constituted an equitable lien thereupon, entitled to priority over subsequent liens by judgment or otherwise. 1 Sugd. on Vend. 542; Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140; Countts v. Walker, 2 Leigh 268. This equitable was equivalent to a legal lien, and paramount to the rights, subsequently accruing, of the schedule creditors. Foreman v. Loyd &c., 2 Leigh 284. It placed the plaintiff in the stead of his debtor, and entitled him to have his debt discharged out of the surplus moneys in the hands of the trustees.

378 1 Sugd. *on Vend. 545. And as this right is by force of the lien on the equity of redemption, it has relation to the date of the decree. The circumstance that the plaintiff's elegit was not sued out till after the sale under the deed of trust, is immaterial; for it is the judgment that gives the lien, which lien continues during the capacity to issue an elegit, except against an elegit actually levied. Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 629; United States v. Morrison &c., 4 Peters 124.

The retainer claimed by the purchasers out of the surplus proceeds of the trust sale can be regarded only by way of setoff, and is therefore subordinate to the lien of the plaintiff. The only item of the claim which can have the colour of a lien is the money paid to extinguish a claim of dower in the property; and that must be, if at all, by force of the covenant of warranty in the trust deed. But how can that covenant be applied to the surplus proceeds of the sale? It was of course no lien upon the property conveyed by the deed, but a personal covenant to secure the title to that property. If the sale had been of enough only of the property to satisfy the trust, the covenant could not have operated as a lien upon the residue; and when the whole property was sold, as a matter of necessity or convenience, the conversion of the surplus from realty into personalty could have no effect upon the question of lien.

If the purchasers have a right to retain the value of the dower right out of the surplus, it must be upon the idea that they did not obtain the whole subject purchased, and so there was a partial failure of consideration. But this is not true in point of fact: they did obtain all that they purchased. They purchased subject to the claim of dower. The trustee sold nothing more than was vested in him by the deed, and with special warranty only. The dower right was not conveyed by the deed, which 379 could not convey or assure *a greater right or estate than the grantor might lawfully convey or assure. 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 99, § 20, p. 368. The purchasers were compensated for the incumbrance of the dower right by the consequently diminished price which they had to pay for the property; and if they are to retain the value of that incumbrance out of the surplus, then they will be twice compensated for the same defect of title. I deem it unnecessary to consider whether an action on the covenant of warranty could in any event be maintained by the purchasers, as assignees of the trustee, against the grantor, by treating it as a covenant running with the land. It is certain that they could maintain no such action until after eviction. 4 Kent's Comm. 471; Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. R. 497. Until then the covenant is unbroken, and the extinguishment of the dower right by purchase can give no right of action against the covenantor, and much less the right to retain out of the surplus proceeds of the trust sale. A covenant of warranty cannot be treated as a covenant against mere incumbrances; and if it could, a covenant against incumbrances is a personal covenant, not running with the land or passing to the assignee.

I think the decree of the chancellor ought to be affirmed.

ALLEN, J. Upon the only question in regard to which there is a difference of opinion in the court, it seems to me that the purchaser at the sale made by the trustee is entitled, as assignee of the trustee, to the benefit of the covenants of warranty contained in the deed of trust; that as between the purchaser and the first vendor, the sale is to be considered as though the conveyance had been made directly to the purchaser by the debtor, instead of being made, as it was, through the intervention of the trustee. So regarding the transaction, the purchaser acquired the 380 vendor's title to the *land, with a covenant of warranty to protect him against an outstanding superior title. As against his vendor, he could not be considered as purchasing subject to incumbrances. He had a right to rely on the covenant of the vendor to protect him against such incumbrances, and whenever evicted, could maintain his action on the covenant. His claim, however, to compensation rested in action until eviction. The purchaser, upon the faith of his title and warranty, agreed to give a specific sum for the property. Upon the surplus after satisfying the deed of trust, the lien of the judgment creditor attached before any breach of the covenant of warranty. Having so attached, it could not be destroyed by a subsequent breach, much less by a mere retainer to satisfy an outstanding incumbrance, when there never had been an eviction, and non constabat that there ever would be. I think the decree should be affirmed.

STANARD, J. The judgment creditors are not contesting before this court the priority that the decree has given to the claim of Toncray, and if they were, that contest would in all probability, under the authority of Foreman v. Loyd &c., 2 Leigh 284, be unavailing. Is the decree right as between Toncray, claiming a lien on the surplus under his decree against Soule, and Findlay the purchaser under the deed of trust, and for whose purchase the alleged surplus, if any, arises?

That Toncray's decree formed an equitable lien on Soule's equity of redemption in the property conveyed by the deed of trust, before the sale under the trust, and on what is properly to be deemed the surplus after the sale, is, I think, free of reasonable doubt. The equity of redemption having been converted before the assertion of the lien, and being represented, when the lien was asserted, by the surplus that might 381 remain after the satisfaction of the claims secured by the trust, *it is to that surplus that the lien in this case attaches. It is, I think, equally free from doubt, that this lien overreaches the lien of any creditor of Soule subsequently accruing, either general by subsequent judgment or decree in favour of other creditors, or specific by subsequent conveyance of the debtor. The consequence is that a purchaser under the deed of trust could not, were he a creditor of Soule, absorb by his debt the surplus of such purchase over the debts and charges secured by the trust, unless the debt constituted an elder lien. In other words, unless the debt, even if due to another, would be entitled to priority, a creditor of Soule could not, by becoming a purchaser at the sale under the trust, put his debt in advance of other debts in favour of which there were elder liens, and thereby give a destination to the surplus different from that it would have had if another had been the purchaser.

Applying these principles to the case under consideration, the result would be, that if the abatements claimed by Findlay from the purchase money were in the nature of retainer or setoff for responsibilities of Soule to him, such abatements ought not to be allowed in derogation of the prior and superior lien which Toncray has by virtue of his decree. The question then is, are the abatements claimed by Findlay of this nature? That which is claimed for the costs of the proceeding for unlawful detainer, is, I think, obviously of this nature, and ought not to be allowed. The claim for interest during the time possession was withheld, (which is in substance a claim for the detention of the possession, the interest being the equivalent for the use and occupation lost during such detainer,) partakes of the nature of the claim for costs incurred to obtain possession; and that too was properly disallowed. But I cannot agree that the abatement claimed for the incumbrances from which the purchaser has had to relieve the property, is in the nature of setoff of a distinct claim 382 against an *amount ascertained to be due as purchase money, so far as the question affects the surplus. To my apprehension, it enters into and forms an essential element in the enquiry (at least so far as respects the ascertainment of a surplus) what is the amount of purchase money that the grantor in the deed of trust, and his judgment creditor claiming under him with an investiture of all his rights and exempt from his independent responsibilities, can justly claim as due from the purchaser? So entering into that enquiry, the amount of purchase money cannot be correctly ascertained until due allowance is made for these incumbrances; and that only can properly be regarded (at least in equity) as the amount of the purchase money in respect to the debtor, and his judgment creditor claiming his equity of redemption or its avails, which is left after abatement for the incumbrances against which he warranted. The deed of trust conveyed the property with general warranty of the grantor. The deed subjected the property to be sold, and the surplus of the proceeds which might remain after discharging the enumerated debts was to be paid to the grantor. The trustees held under the deed beneficially for the creditors to the extent of their claim, and for the grantor to the extent of the surplus. In the execution of the trust by sale, the creditors, so far as they were concerned, may be regarded as vendors with special warranty, and to the extent of their interest the purchaser was bound for the purchase, though there might be a defect of title: and though for that defect the grantor was responsible on his warranty, that could not impair the obligation which the purchaser incurred to the creditors by his purchase. But how is it in respect to the surplus? The grantor to whom that surplus enured, and under whom it is claimed by his judgment creditor by virtue of the lien of his judgment, was, through the agency of the trustee, vendor with general war-

383 ranty. Any defect in or *incumbrance upon the subject sold was, pro tanto, a failure of the consideration, inseparably connected with the contract of purchase, and operating on the nominal amount of the purchase money, not as a setoff of a distinct liability of the vendor against a liquidated amount of purchase money due from the vendee, but as an essential element to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of the purchase money originally demandable of the purchaser. Suppose a sale with warranty had been directly made by the grantor, instead of being (as it was) a sale by him through the agency of the trustee, and there were a defect, either from deficiency of quantity or from an incumbrance within the scope of the warranty; would not the responsibility of the purchaser on his purchase, in a suit to charge him with the purchase money, be the amount stipulated to be paid for the full quantity and unincumbered title, minus the amount of the deficiency or incumbrance? In such a case I think it could not, with any propriety of legal language, be said that the purchaser is indebted the whole price of full quantity and unincumbered title, and the vendor indebted to him the value of the deficiency or the incumbrance, and that the abatement from the price on account of the deficiency or incumbrance is the setoff of the debt for that against the debt for the purchase. The case supposed and that under consideration are substantially the same. My opinion therefore is, that an abatement should have been made from the nominal amount of the purchase, for the taxes and dower right from which the purchaser has had to disincumber the property, and that the decree, which has denied this abatement, is erroneous.

Decree affirmed.

Vendor and Purchaser—Dower—When Precluded by Sale under Vendor's Lien.*—The vendor of land conveys the same to the vendee in fee simple, and receives part of the purchase money, but no security for the residue. On a bill in equity against the vendee to enforce the implied equitable lien of the vendor, a decree is made for the sale of the land, and the proceeds are more than sufficient to satisfy what remains due to the vendor. The surplus is claimed by creditors of the vendee who have obtained judgments against him, and taken him in execution, from which he escaped. With the vendee's assent, a decree is made in favour of those creditors for the surplus. Afterwards, the vendee dying, a bill is filed by his widow against those in possession of the land, to wit, one to whom the purchaser at the sale under the decree had aliened the whole, and two others to whom that one had aliened a part, claiming to be endowed. HELD by two judges (STANARD and BALDWIN) that the land in the hands of the purchasers is not chargeable to the widow, and that her bill must be dismissed; dissentiente ALLEN, J., whose opinion was, that the widow was entitled to dower in the surplus which remained after satisfying the vendor's lien, and that the amount to which she was entitled constituted a charge upon the land in the hands of the purchaser at the sale under the decree, and of those claiming under him.

for 161 dollars each, one payable the 25th of July 1815, and the other the 25th of July 1816, and judgments had been obtained thereon, which remained unsatisfied. The bill prayed that the lot might be decreed to be sold, and the purchase money with interest paid out of the proceeds. A sale was decreed accordingly in 1826, and the proceeds were more than sufficient to pay the charges of sale and satisfy the vendor's lien. A petition was presented by Edwin S. Duncan and John L. Seehon, claiming the surplus, upon the ground that each of them had judgments against George J. Davisson, upon which writs of capias ad satisfaciendum had issued, under which he was admitted to the prison rules, and then escaped. And by consent of the said George J. Davisson, the court decreed to the petitioners the said surplus, to be applied towards the discharge of their demands in proportion to the respective amounts.

After the death of George J. Davisson, his widow filed a bill in the circuit court of Harrison against John Wilson, David Davisson and Deviemann D. Davisson, setting forth, that her husband became seized of the lot during the coverture, and erected valuable brick buildings upon it, and otherwise greatly improved it; that 386 at the *sale under the decree, it was purchased by Charles A. Swearingen for much less than its real value, and conveyed to him by a commissioner of the court; and that Wilson had become the owner of it under some contract with Swearingen, and had since conveyed a portion of it to the other defendants: and the complainant claimed that she was entitled to full dower in the property discharged of any lien for the purchase money, or at least to dower in the same chargeable with a proportionable part of the said purchase money.

The defendants first demurred, but their demurrer was overruled; and then Wilson answered, admitting the facts as before stated, but not admitting that the complainant was entitled either to full or partial dower in the property. He insisted that George J. Davisson only held the lot as trustee for the payment of the purchase money, and that if the complainant was entitled to dower at all, she was only entitled to the extent she would have been if the lot had been mortgaged by her husband before marriage, or mortgaged afterwards by a deed in which she joined; that it would be contrary to all principles of equity to subject him, his vendees, or the property, to any charge on account of said claim of dower, under the circumstances of the case; but she must, if endowed at all, be endowed of one third of the excess produced by the sale, and must look to that excess wherever it may be found.

David and Deviemann Davisson did not, in their answers, admit the complainant's claim; but if it were established, they insisted that as their vendor Wilson was before the court, he should be decreed against

David and Deviemann Davisson did not, in their answers, admit the complainant's claim; but if it were established, they insisted that as their vendor Wilson was before the court, he should be decreed against in the first instance, or at all events, if there should be any decree against them, that they should have a decree over against him.

The cause came on to be heard in the circuit court before Duncan, J., and the following opinion was delivered by him.

387 *"I look upon this as an interesting case, involving principles that I think have not been adjudicated.

"Dower, as I understand it, is purely a legal estate. The wife, although she claims under her husband, derives the right to do so under the law. At the common law, she was entitled to dower in the lands of which her husband was seized during the coverture, of an estate of inheritance; and by statute, which was designed to extend the principles of the common law, she is entitled to dower in the equitable estate of her husband. In the present case, the husband was seized of an estate of inheritance during the coverture. Prima facie, therefore, the wife was entitled to dower, never having relinquished it in the form prescribed by law; and no act of the husband could deprive her of the right. But the right to dower is subject to charges and incumbrances created prior to the marriage, such as mortgages &c. and, I suppose, to the vendor's lien, whether before or after the marriage. It would be strange were it otherwise. Although the right of dower is greatly favoured, yet it should not be at the expense of strangers. The wife's right, as I suppose, is coextensive with the interest of the husband, and cannot be carried further. If a husband, before or after marriage, purchase land and obtain a conveyance for it, and then die, not having paid any part of the purchase money, it would be unjust that the vendor should have perhaps his only security (the vendor's lien) impaired to the extent of the widow's dower. Without entering at large into the reasoning in support of my opinion, I will merely state, that I am of opinion that a widow's dower in her husband's land, on which there is a vendor's lien, must be subject to such lien, exactly in the same way that it would be subject to a mortgage or other incumbrance before marriage, or a mortgage in which the wife joined and relinquished her dower; with

388 this qualification distinguishing the rights of the widow in the *case of a vendor's lien from her rights where there was a mortgage before marriage, that in the former, as the husband was seized of an estate of inheritance during the coverture, the widow has a right to be endowed of the land, not of a mere equity of redemption, as would be the case where there was a mortgage before marriage, or a mortgage in which she joined. Perhaps, after all, this is a distinction without a practical difference. Probably in either case she has the right to redeem, and in neither could she be compelled to do so, but might await a foreclosure of the mortgage, or a sale under the vendor's lien, and then resort to the surplus if there be any, that surplus being in fact the value of the estate out of which she is to have dower. Perhaps, however, the distinction is of importance in another point of view, having a material bearing upon these parties. I have supposed that the widow's right attaches to the land in all cases where her husband was seized of an estate of inheritance during the coverture; that it is a legal estate; that the widow, unless she had relinquished her dower in the manner prescribed by law, could not lose it in toto, but only that it might be reduced to the extent of the vendor's lien. Had the plaintiff not such an estate (and that is the real question) as all subsequent purchasers were bound to take notice of? Can a legal estate, or in other words an estate of dower at common law, be lost by reason of the incapacity of the wife to protect her rights during coverture? The plaintiff was no party to the suit for enforcing the vendor's lien; her husband was then living; she could not be an actor until his death; and in the mean time the estate is sold, and the proceeds of sale are exhausted in the payment of her husband's debts. The case of Heth v. Cocke & wife, 1 Rand. 344, is relied upon by the defendants as an authority against the plaintiff in this case. I think, however, that its tendency is otherwise. But the

389 cases are widely different in many particulars. That was a case of a mortgage before marriage, which the husband never redeemed. Judge Coalter, in delivering the opinion of the court, remarks, that the legal title to dower never accrued, the husband never having been seized during the coverture; but that there was an equity of redemption, in which, under the statute, the widow could claim dower in equity. In the present case, the husband was seized of the legal title during the coverture, and the wife acquired a right to dower at common law: her estate was a legal estate, not an equitable claim to dower. In that case, suit was brought to foreclose the mortgage after the death of the husband: the widow's rights, whatever they were, had then accrued, and she had the capacity to assert them: she stood by, suffered a decree of foreclosure, permitted strangers to purchase the estate, and the surplus to go into the hands of the guardian of the children, by whom it was exhausted; and never asserted any claim until upwards of sixteen years had elapsed after her rights had accrued. In this case, the decree enforcing the vendor's lien was rendered during the lifetime of the husband, before the plaintiff had the right or the capacity to assert her claims; and she instituted suit as soon as she could do so. There are other points of difference between the cases, but I will not stop to notice them. It may be proper, however, to notice a remark of judge Coalter in his opinion in that case, because it is supposed to have a bearing on a question which I must next examine. The judge says: 'Where the mortgage was before marriage, suppose the bill to foreclose is brought in the lifetime of the husband, must the wife be a party? And would the failure to make her a party in such case subject the purchaser to her claim for dower, in case of her surviving her husband? In the case put, I believe it never has been held necessary, since the act, to make the wife a party. It may,

390 however, be well worthy of consideration, how far *it may be the duty of course, in such a case as that, to direct the balance of the purchase money to be paid into court, and to enquire whether there be a wife entitled, and make provision accordingly.' The chancellor who decided the case against Davisson would no doubt have performed that duty in that case, had it occurred to him: but as it did not occur to him, must Davisson's widow bear the loss, and have the laches of that able judge saddled upon her? or ought not the purchaser under his decree to have seen to it, and is the fault not his? For it must be kept in mind that judge Coalter is all the time speaking of an equitable right of dower, and not of a legal right; and I suppose, as mrs. Davisson's is a legal right of dower, that all purchasers were bound to notice it.

"This brings me to the remaining point for consideration: does the plaintiff's right of dower attach to the premises, and was the purchaser bound to see to the application of the surplus purchase money? I think, for the reasons I have mentioned, the purchaser, for his own safety, was bound to see that the surplus was applied to the dower estate of the wife. It is true that her interest was contingent; she might not have survived her husband: yet her right was a legal right, and the purchaser was bound to know it. He could have protected both his own interest and her rights; but she was incapable of doing either. I look upon the claim of the widow as a charge upon the land, of which the purchaser had notice. It is well settled (see Lloyd v. Baldwin, 1 Ves. sen. 173, and 2 Sugden on Vendors, 9th ed. p. 32), that a purchaser will in some cases be bound to see to the application of the purchase money, although the estate be sold under a decree of a court of equity, or by virtue of an act of parliament. And I believe that this is as strong a case of the kind, as could well exist. It may be a hard case on the purchaser and his vendees; but if I am right, it is the law which imposes the hardship.

391 "The decree will be, that the plaintiff have, in lieu of dower, a sum equal to one third of the interest on the surplus proceeds of the sale after satisfying the vendor's lien; which will constitute a charge upon the lot, to commence from the institution of the suit: or, at her election, a gross sum, to be ascertained by the tables laid down in 2 Rob. Pract. 380-382, which I presume is the rule adopted generally; although I am led to believe, from my experience thus far, that the tables of mortality which have furnished the rule are much too favourable to annuitants. As I hope this case will undergo further examination, the rule just adverted to can then be tested, as well as the other matters embraced in this decree."

A report being made by a commissioner, it appeared by that report, as corrected by the court, that the surplus whereof the complainant was to be endowed was 451 dollars 2 cents, one third of which was 150 dollars 34 cents, and the annual interest of that third 9 dollars and 2 cents. The report shewed the complainant to be 48 years of age: and her expectation of life, according to the table of professor Wigglesworth, published in 2 Rob. Pract. 380, 81, being 22 years, the present value of an annuity of 9 dollars and 2 cents for 22 years was calculated in the mode in which, in 2 Rob. Pract. 382, the calculation is stated to have been made by mr. Hilary Baker, one of the commissioners of the circuit court of Henrico, and appeared to be 122 dollars 39 cents. The circuit court held that the complainant was entitled to charge the property with her dower interest, either by way of a yearly charge thereon of said sum of 9 dollars and 2 cents during her life, or by an immediate charge of the present value of said interest. at her election; and the complainant by her counsel electing to take the present value, the court thereupon decreed that the said complainant recover against the defendants the said sum of 122 dollars 39 cents, with 392 interest *from the date of the report until paid, and the costs of suits; and declared the said sum, with interest as aforesaid, to be a charge upon the property itself.

On the petition of the defendants against whom this decree was made, an appeal was allowed them.

William A. Harrison, for the appellants, insisted that the decree was erroneous, 1st. Because the parties had not concurred in preferring a sum in gross. The defendants had a right to insist that, instead of a sum in gross, the interest on one third of the surplus should be paid annually to the complainant. Herbert and others v. Wren and wife and others, 7 Cranch 380; Tabele v. Tabele and others, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 45.

2dly, In holding that an annuity of 9 dollars and 2 cents, during the life of a woman now 48 years of age, is worth 122 dollars 39 cents.

3dly, In decreeing the gross sum against the appellants as their personal debt.

4thly, In decreeing against the appellants jointly, when it appears that they hold in severally separate portions of the premises.

Upon these points the cause was first submitted by Harrison for the appellants, and by George H. Lee for the appellee. But afterwards the court suggested a doubt whether the widow had any right of dower which could be enforced against Wilson or his alienees, and called upon Lee to shew that she had.

Lee argued, that here there was a concurrence of the three requisites to dower,—marriage, seisin, and death of the husband: the wife had therefore a complete legal right to dower; and the only question was, how far this right would be respected in a court of equity. The seisin of the husband, it may be said, was not a beneficial seisin to his own use, but was that 393 of a trustee for *the benefit of his vendor. To the extent of the purchase money, this may perhaps be correct; but after the purchase by the husband, the value of the property was increased by permanent improvements put on it by him, and it was then worth much more than the balance of purchase money. The beneficial interest of the vendor was a very partial and limited one; it was merely an implied equitable right to subject the property to payment of the balance of the purchase money: it can scarcely be called an interest in the property. And as to the residue of the interest and estate in the property, other than this naked lien of the vendor, the husband was seized beneficially to his own use. The widow, therefore, seems fairly entitled to a dower interest in the property itself (into whose hands soever it may have come) by virtue of her complete legal right, commensurate with the residuary interest of her husband, which may be measured by the amount of the surplus proceeds of the sale under the decree.

If the widow's right had attached to the subject prior to the decree and sale, how can such decree and sale, in a cause to which she was no party, oust this right, and convert an interest in the realty into a right to a portion of the proceeds of sale? If the decree and sale had not been made during the life of the husband, her right to dower in the estate, subject to the lien for the unpaid purchase money, could not be questioned. Can the circumstance that the decree and sale were made during the life of her husband, and when she was non sui juris, wholly change her rights, and, by reason of such change, so operate in most cases as wholly to defeat them? The court of chancery, it is submitted, will not change the character of the right, but will restrict its extent, so as to render it commensurate with the husband's real interest, to be measured as before mentioned.

394 *If the property be considered as sold subject to the widow's right of dower in the premises, whatever that might be, the purchaser surely cannot complain. If it was a sale out and out, and the wife's interest be regarded as attaching to the surplus proceeds of sale, then the purchaser should be held bound to see to the application of the purchase money. The policy, and indeed the humanity of the law, forbid a conversion of the wife's interest in the estate of which her husband was seized, from a substance into a shadow. In this country, upon a purchase of real estate, it rarely happens that the whole purchase money is paid at the time of the purchase. And the consequence of a decision against the widow's right here will be, that wherever, upon a purchase of real estate, there may happen to be a balance of purchase money due, as a court of equity (notwithstanding an absolute conveyance in fee simple, admitting payment, and a transfer of the seisin) will, if there be no other security, imply a lien on the property, and subject the same to sale, a husband, by submitting to a decree, in a case to which his wife is no party, for the sale of the property to raise the balance due, however small, will be enabled to appropriate the surplus proceeds to his own use, and thus effectually defeat his wife's dower interest in the estate. The husband ought not thus to be enabled to bar his wife's right of dower by a mode wholly unknown either to the common or the statute law. And the decree, sale, and deed of the commissioner to the purchaser, should not be allowed to defeat the wife's right to dower, any farther than the husband could defeat it by a deed in which she did not unite.

Suppose, in the case before the court, that Davisson the husband had conveyed the property to a third person, who paid him the whole purchase money without any notice of the latent equity of Davisson's vendor; the purchaser of the property
 395 would clearly hold it discharged *of any lien of Davisson's vendor. But though the right of the purchaser from Davisson would thus be complete against Davisson's vendor, such a purchaser could not gainsay the right of Davisson's widow to dower in the estate. And thus it will have to be maintained that the widow's right to dower, though superior to the right of a purchaser without notice, is yet inferior to the vendor's lien, which is itself inferior to the right of the purchaser without notice. Again, the liens of the judgments in favour of the petitioning creditors to whom the surplus was paid, were surely subordinate to the widow's right of dower; yet if she is not to be allowed to look to the land itself for satisfaction of her claim, the creditors whose rights were subordinate to hers will have got every thing, and she will get nothing.

What is the fair inference from the decisions in Holbrook v. Finney, 4 Mass. Rep. 566; Clark v. Munroe, 14 Id. 351; Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. R. 458, and Gilliam v. Moore, 4 Leigh 30, in case the vendor, after making a conveyance to the vendee, had taken no deed of trust or mortgage for the purchase money until a subsequent period, or, as in the case before the court, had taken none at all? If it was the divestiture of the husband's seisin by the deed of trust at the same moment at which it was vested, that defeated the right of dower, then, where there was no such contemporaneous divestiture, it would seem that the right of dower would attach to the land. Again, if a man sell and convey land to another, but fail, at the time of his conveyance, to take any deed of trust or mortgage to secure the purchase money, looking to the vendor's lien only, and subsequently take a deed of trust or mortgage, it is well settled that the implied equitable lien of the vendor will merge in and be drawn down to the express lien. Little &c. v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353. Yet in such case would not the wife, *as against the mortgagee or claimant under the deed of trust (in which she does not unite), be entitled to dower? And would her right not be discharged both of the vendor's lien and the mortgage or trust lien?—of the vendor's lien, because it is extinguished; and of the mortgage, because she did not unite in it? So that, if the vendor's lien ousts the widow's dower, the vendor is better off without an express lien, unless taken contemporaneously with his conveyance; and the right to dower is thus made to depend, not upon the three requisites which prevail at law, but also upon the subsequent act of others, to wit, her husband's giving, at a period subsequent to the conveyance to him, a deed of trust or mortgage (in which she does not unite), and its acceptance by the vendor.

In Tabele v. Tabele and others, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 45, the mortgagor's wife was held entitled to the use of one third of the surplus proceeds after satisfying the mortgage. Can there be any reason for holding the right of the vendee's wife to be less where no mortgage has been given, than where a mortgage has been given in which she united?

In Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. R. 463, the court say that the substance of a conveyance, where land is mortgaged at the same time that a deed is received for it, is, that the bargainor sells the land to the bargainee on condition of his paying the price at the stipulated time, and if he do not, that the bargainor shall be resealed of the land, free of the mortgage; and this, whether one instrument or two be executed at the time. This, it is conceived, is not so in the case of a mere lien of a vendor who has made a conveyance. In such case, the legal title and seisin remain in the bargainee, and the vendor's lien constitutes a mere charge upon the land, to be enforced in a court of equity, by whose decree the interest of the bargainee, whatever it may be, is sold subject to the just rights 397 of the widow. As is *said in some of the cases, it is the folly of the bargainor to make an absolute conveyance of his land, without taking the proper means to protect it against such claim.

In Nash v. Preston, Cro. Car. 190, one seized in fee, by indenture inrolled, bargained and sold land to the husband for 120 pounds, "in consideration that he shall redemise it to him and his wife for their lives, rendering a pepper corn, and with a condition that if he paid the 120 pounds at the end of 20 years, the bargain and sale shall be void." The bargainee redemised accordingly; and his wife having, after his death, brought an action demanding dower, a bill in equity was filed to be relieved against this demand. Upon this question, the judges certified their opinion to the court of chancery, that the wife of the bargainee was to have dower, and that a court of equity ought not to preclude her thereof. "For by the bargain and sale the land is vested in the husband, and thereby his wife entitled to have dower. And when he redemises it upon the former agreement, yet the lessees are to receive it subject to this title of dower; and it was his folly that he did not conjoin another with the bargainee, as it is the ancient course in mortgages."

If the court should be of opinion that the widow is not entitled to relief against the present defendants, but would be entitled to relief against the original purchaser if he were a party, it is submitted that the court ought not to dismiss the bill, but should remand the cause with leave to amend the bill and bring the original purchaser before the court.

ALLEN, J. The amount involved in this case is inconsiderable; but it raises questions for the first time brought before this court for decision. The principles involved deeply affect the rights of many, and are of great practical importance in the administration of justice. Marriage settlements are comparatively rare in 398 *this state. The wife usually depends upon the provision made for her in the will of the husband, or the interest secured to her in his estate by the law. Her right to dower, frequently the only resource left for her own support and the sustenance of her children, is a humane provision of the common law, and has always been much respected. The wife during coverture has a title to dower in all lands of which her husband was seized during the coverture. When he once becomes so seized beneficially for his own use, the title attaches, and at law it is complete. The seisin must be beneficial, and therefore the widow of a trustee would not, at least in equity, be entitled to hold her dower against the cestui que trust. And the seisin must have abided in the husband for some time. Therefore, where the vendor passed the title to the vendee and at the same time took a mortgage for the payment of the purchase money, the two instruments were held to be parts of the same transaction, and the seisin to be that instantaneous seisin, in which the land was merely in transitu, and never vested beneficially in the husband. Gilliam v. Moore, 4 Leigh 30. Where the mortgage is given to secure the purchase money, the bargainor sells to the bargainee upon condition that he shall pay the purchase money at the stipulated time, and if he does not, that the bargainor shall be resealed of the land. In the case under consideration, a conveyance was made to the husband: he took beneficially, entered, and was seized of the absolute fee, and improved the property. He owed a portion of the purchase money; and for this the vendor's lien existed. This was an implied lien, the creature of a court of equity, not recognized at law, and therefore interposing no bar to the legal title to dower. That title attached the moment the seisin rested beneficially with the husband; and though in equity it may be subordinate to the implied lien for the purchase money, upon what principle is it to be held that it shall be divested to any greater extent?

399 *The case is distinguishable from the wife's right to dower in a trust estate created before the marriage, or in an equity of redemption. If the estate is subject to a mortgage in fee at the time of the coverture, and so remains during its continuance, there is no seisin in the husband to which the legal title to dower can attach; the whole legal estate of inheritance is in the mortgagee. The rule would be the same where a deed of trust had been given before marriage. In these cases, the right to dower in the equity of redemption is contingent, and never attaches upon the land during the coverture. Being contingent, it is liable to be defeated by a sale out and out during the coverture; such sale converting the surplus into personalty. So where, during the coverture, the wife unites in a deed of trust or mortgage, she has parted with her legal title to dower in the estate: her claim becomes contingent by her own act, and is liable to be defeated by a sale during the coverture, and a conversion of the surplus. In these cases her right to dower in the equity of redemption does not vest, so as to attach to the subject, until by the death of the husband the equity of redemption descends to the heir. And if, during the coverture, the husband should alien the equity of redemption without her joining, her right would, after the death of her husband, attach upon it in the hands of the alienee. For as the equity of redemption is an interest capable of descending, unless it has been converted, her claim to dower will attach. Such conversion, so as to defeat her contingent claim, could only be made under a deed existing at the time of the coverture, or a deed to which she was a party, executed during the coverture. The reason which deprives the wife of her dower after a sale under a deed of trust or mortgage executed before marriage, (or during marriage, she having united) has no application, as it seems to me, to a case like the present, where the title is a legal one, not contingent, and has actually vested by the beneficial seisin of the husband.

400 *The case of Little &c. v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353, determines that the vendor taking a mortgage of the subject to secure the purchase money, can only claim under the mortgage, as that supersedes his implied lien. Can it be doubted that in such case, where the mortgage was subsequent to the conveyance, and not part of the transaction, the wife's right of dower would be paramount to the mortgage? Such would be the effect, unless the court could give the mortgage relation back to the time of the conveyance; and if it could do so for the purpose of defeating dower, why not with equal propriety give it the same relation for the purpose of defeating intermediate incumbrances?

In the case of a sale by the vendee to a purchaser without notice, put by the counsel in argument, the implied lien of the vendor, as against him, would be gone; yet the wife's right to dower could not be questioned: and then the anomalous state of things would exist, in which a lien, inferior to the title of the purchaser, would be superior to that of the wife, which yet would be superior to that of the purchaser.

Even where a mortgage has been given for the payment of the purchase money, it is not a legal title which a stranger can set up. Thus in Coates v. Cheever, 1 Cowen 460, Coates had purchased of Harmon, to whom he had, at the time of the purchase, executed a mortgage for the consideration money. Coates sold to the defendant, and conveyed to him in fee; and the defendant also procured an assignment of the mortgage. The court held, that where the tenant in possession enters by virtue of a purchase from the mortgagor, then the subsequent purchase of the mortgage by him is an extinguishment of it, and the widow's right relates back to the purchase by her husband, and she shall recover; but that where the tenant entered by virtue of a foreclosure, or after a forfeiture for the nonpayment of the money, then the estate is deemed never to have vested 401 *in the husband, and the widow is not entitled to dower: thus shewing, that wherever the estate does vest in the husband, the legal title to dower attaches upon the land. There is no conflict between this case and Jackson v. Dewitt, 6 Cowen 317. In that case, the vendor and mortgagee accepted the release. There was a merger; but the same act destroyed the mortgagor's title. Up to the time of the release, the wife could claim no dower; and the release extinguishing the title, there never was an instant of time in which the widow was entitled to dower.

The case of Pierce's adm'r &c. v. Trigg's heirs, 10 Leigh 406, establishes no principle affecting the claim of dower in this case. Judge Tucker there said, that real estate purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, and used as a part of the stock in trade, is to be considered to every intent as personal property, not only as between the partners and their creditors, but as between the surviving partner and the representatives of the deceased. The partnership was the cestui que trust, and the holder of the legal title was but a trustee. This is the ordinary case of a trustee, whose widow is clearly not entitled to dower as against the cestui que trust.

If then the wife's title to dower was a vested interest which attached during the coverture, her legal title to dower in the whole subject could not be controverted at law: and in equity, as it seems to me, it can only be treated as subordinate to the implied lien of the vendor, to the extent of that lien, and no farther. She was no party to the suit by which the legal estate passed out of her husband. A court of equity could only treat her husband as trustee for the vendor to the extent of his lien. Upon the surplus she has a legal claim, and she has done no act to divest her estate. The party purchasing from her husband, whether directly, or indirectly through the inter-

402 *a judicial sale, was bound to notice her legal interest. It was his duty to look to the application of the surplus, and see that it received such direction as would protect him from the wife's title to dower. By his purchase, he became a party to the proceeding; he might have seen that the legal title was in the husband; and if he has neglected to secure himself against a title which, to the extent of the surplus, a court of equity must regard as attaching to the subject and running with it, he must suffer, and not the wife, who was not sui juris and could not protect herself. A contrary rule will furnish a new and convenient mode by which, in innumerable instances, a wife may be barred of dower in her husband's estate. He may consent to a sale out and out, of an estate of great value, for some trifling balance of purchase money, and after paying the amount, put the residue of the price in his pocket. Such a rule would be against the policy and humanity of the law.

I think, therefore, that the court was correct in holding the widow entitled to dower in the surplus, and that it constituted a charge upon the land in the hands of the purchaser and those claiming under him.

The court below decided, that the widow had a right to charge the property with her dower, after ascertaining what would be the yearly value of that interest by allowing her six per cent. upon one third of the surplus which remained after satisfying the vendor's lien and the costs; or, at her election, was entitled to a recovery of the present worth of her annuity. In holding that she had a right to elect to take a sum in gross, I think the court erred. Those entitled in reversion should be consulted; and where, as in this case, the property is charged in the hands of the purchaser, it may be convenient to pay the annuity, whilst a decree for the present value of it might result in a sacrifice ruinous to the purchaser. The true rule, it seems to me, is laid down in Herbert &c. v. Wren &c., 7 Cranch 370, where *chief justice 403 Marshall said, that the assent of one party cannot affect the others; that they have a right to insist that, instead of a sum in gross, one third shall be set apart, and interest thereon paid annually to the tenant in dower during life. The rule would hold a fortiori, where, instead of interest to be raised by setting apart a sum of money, the annuity, as in this case, was a charge on the subject.

In ascertaining the present worth of the annuity, the court adopted Wigglesworth's table of longevity, found in 2 Robinson's Practice 381, and the method of calculating the present value of an annuity which is there said to have been adopted by Mr. Baker, one of the commissioners of the circuit court of Henrico. That method is manifestly erroneous, as is strikingly exhibited in the present case. The one third of the surplus is ascertained to be 150 dollars 34 cents, and the calculation gives the widow absolutely 122 dollars 2 cents, leaving to the reversioner, if there were one, but 28 dollars 32 cents. The error consists in calculating the discount at simple interest, instead of compound interest. The true rule, I think, is explained and illustrated very fully in a communication with which I have been favoured by Judge Smith, who has had occasion to investigate the subject, and has furnished me with an exposition of his views, which will be handed to the reporter to be published in a note to this case. There may possibly be some inaccuracies in the calculations, but the principle, I think, is the correct one. For these errors in the details of the decree, it seems to me it should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court.

BALDWIN, J. The vendor's lien is founded in natural justice, and the presumed intent of the parties to the contract. Both forbid that the vendee shall enjoy the property without payment of the con-

404 sideration. *This cannot be prevented, but by a rescission of the contract, which, in the absence of an express provision, is never contemplated by the parties; or by its complete execution, which can only be accomplished, where the personal responsibility of the vendee is inadequate, by subjecting the land to the payment of the purchase money. Such a case falls within the province of a court of equity, which gives relief by a sale of the property, and the due application of its proceeds. This is done without regard to the consideration whether the legal title remains in the vendor, or has been conveyed to the vendee: in either case, that title is employed for the purpose of conferring a complete right upon the purchaser under the decree. The power of the court extends to a sale of the whole property, whatever may be its relative value compared with the amount of the purchase money; but it may be restricted or modified in its exercise, by a discretion arising out of the circumstances of the case. Thus it may be expedient to sell a part only, where the subject is susceptible of division, and the whole is not requisite for the discharge of the incumbrance. On the other hand, the interest of the parties may require a sale of the whole to prevent a sacrifice, though the result may be a surplus of proceeds beyond the lien. These are matters merely for the discretion of the court, and do not affect its authority in regard to the sale; and the right of the purchaser under the decree is in no wise dependant upon a judicious exercise of that discretion.

This lien of the vendor is a kind of equitable mortgage, inherent in the contract of sale, and qualifying the ownership of the vendee, whether that ownership be legal or merely equitable. It is of course paramount to the right of the vendee, and of all succeeding to his interest, in the whole or in part, by operation of law. In equity the vendee is not the owner adversely to the lien of the vendor, but is treated as a trustee for him until payment of the purchase money.
